extent had been followed already—namely, that hon. and learned Members of eminence in their profession should point out in what respect the Bill deserved decided approbation, in what respect its clauses were susceptible of amendment, and in what respect its clauses were to be decidedly objected to. He would deal first with that which was the foundation of the whole system of administration of the law. He referred to the Courts of First Instance. A vast deal more had been said as to the effect of the Bill than was justified by its provisions in regard to those Courts. The Bill, undoubtedly, created one High Court for the administration of the law; but immediately afterwards that High Court was re-subdivided into five separate Divisions, and, to his mind, it was a matter of perfect indifference whether those Divisions were called by the names of Courts or by the names of Divisions. He did not quarrel with that subdivision. On the contrary, in all that related to that part of the subject his opinions went entirely with those expressed by the two Law Officers of the Crown in that House. There was, however, a radical and essential distinction in the nature of things between what was termed Equity and Law; but there were an enormous mass of subjects which were common to both. All deeds, documents, wills, and Acts of Parliament were subject to the same rules of construction both in Law and in Equity. Again, many of the relations between human beings were dealt with both by Law and Equity in exactly the same way. But in our complicated and artificial society there was an inevitable necessity for making a distinction in another class of cases. Wherever there was a trust under a will in which the executor might be taken to represent the external action of the law, and the legatees to represent the internal ownerships and obligations which existed among themselves, or wherever there was a trading corporation, which was an abstract entity, in relation to its property, to the external world, but all the members of which, between themselves, had relative rights and connections, it was impossible to say that such a distinction did not come into operation, and this Bill had nowhere infringed on the distinction wherever it really existed. But the Bill gave the power of administering the two systems in the same Courts. At present, wherever a right which impeded the external relation existed it would be administered in the same Court; but the nature of things made it obligatory for convenience that there should be a Court like the Court of Chancery, as preserved by this Bill, for administering estates, for enforcing contracts for specific performance, and for other things, and convenience gained by having separate Courts. No doubt, it was intended that these Courts should continue distinct, and the Bill also looked to some extent to the practitioners in them. For example, the same Court was to have the Admiralty jurisdiction, the Divorce jurisdiction, and the Testamentary jurisdiction. It was difficult to understand what connection there could be between frail women and frail ships to bring them before the same tribunal; but the reason for the arrangement was that what was called the Civilian Bar had long practised in these subjects, and the civilians would be found to be intimately acquainted with them. He saw no reason to dissent from the provisions of the Bill with respect to these Courts. Some rules were laid down in the Bill to guide the action of the Courts, and it had been provided that where the doctrines of Law and Equity came in conflict the Equity doctrine should prevail. With that provision he also agreed, but the next was one which, he thought, ought not to be in the Bill. It was one which did not affect the administration of the law or the form of the Courts; but it was absolute and actual law itself. It was contained in the 22nd clause, and provided that 10 changes should be made in the law of the land. He was in favour of the proposed changes; but he thought they ought to be contained in a separate Act. The first of the provisions was a very serious one. It provided that if a person died with property insufficient to pay his debts, the property should be administered according to the principles of the Law of Bankruptcy. He did not know what might be the Law of Bankruptcy in England, but in Ireland a fiat in bankruptcy put all claims upon the same level; and if it were the same here, then those who had a priority of claim would be placed on the same footing as the other creditors. That might be very well for the future; but the Bill was retrospective, and deprived those who had such priority of claim or that which was their present right. Again, this was a provision to be administered by the Supreme Court in England, so that if a man went over to Ireland and died there, his estate would be administered according to one law in England and according to another law in Ireland. This Bill said the property should be administered according to the law of England. Another of these provisions—the 9th—provided that—

“In any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault the rules hitherto in force in the Courts of Common Law, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the High Court of Admiralty, shall prevail.”

Now the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty did not apply to domicile, but came into action whenever the ship was attached. Hence it would depend upon whether a vessel, after having been in collision at the farthest part of the world, came into Cork or Liverpool, whether she should be assessed in damages according to the old rule or according to the new. He therefore thought that instead of limiting the administration of these provisions to this new Supreme Court in England, they ought to be embodied in a specific Bill, and made a positive enactment. He came to another matter relating to the Primary Courts. That Bill had been several times called a skeleton Bill. Immense powers were given by it to the Judges to make rules. They were to make rules that would regulate the circuits, which were now regulated by statute. He thought the measure bore a great many more marks of an Equity hand than of a Common Law hand in everything except the rules at the end. The proposed improvements of the Law appeared generally to emanate from an Equity mind. They were told that the Lord Chancellor had been his own draftsman; but he took it there had been a second hand employed on the Common Law part of the Bill, and that hand was not equal to the hand that had been engaged on the Equity portion. At every turn it was assumed in the measure that the Judges might alter the rules which Parliament passed. The Judges were to have a meeting every year, with the Lord Chancellor at their head, to adjudicate upon and make those rules. He was anxious at all times to obtain for the Judges all the respect that was due to their office; still he was not for placing in their hands more than a limited power. Their power should, he thought, be confined to procedure. He begged to ask the Law Officers of the Crown whether the Judges would not have power under that Bill to abolish the Western Circuit. Many minutiae connected with the Bill it was impossible to discuss and decide satisfactorily in that House; and that was a reason for referring the measure to a Select Committee. The patronage involved in a Bill of that kind was a matter of very considerable importance. According to his understanding of the matter, there was to be a very considerable shifting of patronage. In England the Lord Chancellor had, not by a Statute or a Law, but by a sort of comity on the part of successive Prime Ministers, the right to nominate the Puisne Judges in the Common Law Courts; but he had no right to nominate the chiefs of the Common Law Courts, the Vice Chancellors, or the Judges of the Court of Probate and the Court of Admiralty. He would ask for an explanation of a passage in the 5th clause, which appeared to shift from the Prime Minister to whoever was Lord Chancellor a very considerable amount of patronage. When the Attorney General spoke of the appointment of Equity lawyers to the different Courts, the person to whom he alluded as having the right of nomination was the Lord Chancellor for the time being. The clause said that—

“Whenever the office of a Judge of the said High Court shall become vacant, a new Judge may be appointed thereto by Her Majesty, by Letters Patent. All persons to be hereafter appointed to fill the places of the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron, and their successors respectively, shall continue to be appointed to the same respective offices, with the same precedence.”

And it went on to declare that—

“Every Judge who shall be appointed to fill the place of any other Judge of the said High Court of Justice, shall be styled in his appointment ‘Judge of Her Majesty’s High Court of Justice,’ and shall be appointed in the same manner in which the Puisne Justices and Junior Barons of the Superior Courts of Common Law have been heretofore appointed.”

He presumed the intention of the clause was that the Probate, Admiralty, and new Judges should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor; and many members of the English Bar wished him to have the patronage rather than the Prime Minister, but the feeling of the profession on this point ought to be ascertained by a Select Committee. Every chief ought to have the appointment of the referees of his particular Court; but the amount of patronage that was accumulated in the hands of one individual would not be endured in Ireland. There was, however, this fairness in the matter—that the Bill proposing to give this gigantic amount of patronage to one man would not come into operation until the 2nd of November, 1874, being after the time that the Dissolution would have settled which Government would have the patronage. Cardinal questions, such as the Appellate Jurisdiction and the five Divisions of the Court, should be excluded from the consideration of the Select Committee, and it should confine itself to the minutiae specially interesting to lawyers as to procedure and the power of making rules. He believed that with the Attorney General in the chair, and his power of soothing the most obstinate, these questions would be settled with slight mutual concessions, and would not be re-opened in the House; whereas if there was no Select Committee they would be discussed at a length disproportionate to their importance, as was the case with the Ballot Bill and the Juries Bill. As to the Schedule, he could not believe it was drawn by Lord Selborne, and the Government must have discovered that it was an error, and would provoke controversy on the most trifling matters. The length of the discussion at this stage about registries, referees, and small matters of procedure and pleading, foreshadowed the length at which they would be discussed in Committee of the Whole House, and a Select Committee would really expedite the matter. As to the referees, he thought the Chief Judge of each Court should appoint the referees connected with his Court, and that there should be provisions as to salaries and qualifications. Up to this point they had, like true statesmen, reformed and amended, nowhere destroyed. He now came to where they had destroyed and where they had created, and with regard both to the destruction and creation he was equally opposed to the present measure. The question was not whether there were defects in the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords which imperatively demanded interference; but whether it was not their true policy to retain that jurisdiction and amend and improve it. If they adopted another course, history might show that they had been adequate to destruction, but unequal to construction. Not any of the observations which had been made by hon. Members had disposed of the propositions made by eminent Law Lords in former times for making the House of Lords an efficient legal tribunal. The way in which that part of the case had been presented was very singular. His hon. and learned Friend had thrown the authority of the House of Lords itself, and how could he maintain what the House of Lords had cast away? He would pay every respect to the decision of the House of Lords if reasons had been given sufficient to explain the reasons for the surrender of its jurisdiction—namely, that the House of Lords would not place its privileges in the way of the construction of a perfect system. Now the jurisdiction of the House of Lords was no privilege. It was a trust—a duty cast upon it by the Constitution, and the will of the people of England through that Constitution. That House had no right to abandon a sacred trust and a duty. If it was necessary to have a Supreme Court it ought to consist of those who had been accustomed to the discharge of the duty of such a Court. The real question was—and it was one which the House must determine—Was it for the good of the community at large that this paramount authority should be maintained? The jurisdiction of the House of Lords ought to be looked at in two points of view—one political, the other forensic. First, politically, he assumed that the Lords were to remain a second Chamber and an hereditary Peerage. They had had jurisdiction in Common Law cases from time immemorial, and as regarded Equity from the time of Charles II., which was not very long after Equity began. To take away that jurisdiction of the House of Peers would diminish their weight and authority in other and indirect matters. Let the House consider how the great men of the law had been connected with our history, and what influence they had exercised. What brought them there? If there had been no Common Law jurisdiction they would not have been there. What brought them there? The necessity of Governments to strengthen the administration of the Law in that House by the introduction of the ablest lawyers. Then, again, it brought to that House persons of peculiar talent so far as regarded the administration of the law. If the inducement to place lawyers in that House was taken away—which would be the effect of this Bill—it would weaken the strength and power of that body. Looking at the matter forensically, they must arrive at the same conclusion. There was great difficulty in getting legal men to take Peetrages. Almost the sole reason was that it might lead to the Chancellorship. The effect of the Bill would be to diminish the number of lawyers amongst the Peers. The Bar had derived great lustre from its connection with the House of Peers. Every profession was estimated by the head of it, and, as Sydney Smith said, it would be a sad day when they began levelling down. This Bill would tend to dissociate its connection with the highest and greatest body in the country. It might be said that this speculation would not be fulfilled. He would give an instance in point. When the Whigs quarrelled with Lord Brougham, and Lord Melbourne came into office, his Lordship determined to have no Chancellor Peer in the House of Lords, and put the Great Seal in commission. The arrangement went on for a while, but did not last long, and Lord Melbourne had to appoint Lord Cottenham a Peer. The Ministry was thus forced into the creation of a Law Peer. The Minister would consider simply what would suit his purpose, and not the elevation of the Bar. The Law Lords had generally been chosen for their great eminence in the law. The law had been, was, and would be benefited by keeping up this connection. He held in his hand a most able and valuable work of Lord St. Leonard's upon the law of real property, which testified to the great philosophical as well as legal powers of that learned Lord. The decisions of the House of Lords in the Bridgewater and Banbury Peerage, and other important cases, showed that that House was no mere registry of the decrees of the Courts below; that in its decisions it had gone outside mere technicalities of law; and that its decisions, whenever they had gone against technical law, had been founded upon an expansive and broad public policy. He thought it was a tremendous advantage to take the men of any profession out of the immediate atmosphere of that profession when they were required to pronounce a sound and impartial judgment upon a matter affecting the public interests. In referring to the manner in which the Bill dealt with this appellate jurisdiction, he confessed he was astonished at the arguments put forward both by the Attorney and Solicitor Generals. The former hon. and learned Gentleman observed that as the House of Lords sat only half the year, he saw no reason why they should not sit the whole year. And, again, he said that a Common Law case referred to the House of Lords was generally practically decided by a Common Law Lord. And yet the principle of the Bill he proposed was, that a good, intellectual, and well-trained mind was as competent to decide a question of Equity as any lawyer. He (Dr. Ball) totally differed from his statement and his reasoning. He maintained that the decision of the House of Lords was the decision of every Judge in that great Assembly. But the Solicitor General said that there were two or three octogenarians amongst the few Law Lords of that House—and he made that statement in the face of the appeals that were coming from Ireland in the several actions which had been taken against the noble Marquess the Chief Secretary for Ireland and Mr. Burke, the Under Secretary, and other persons connected with the Irish Government, in consequence of the proceedings that had taken place at the Phoenix Park meeting, in every one of which actions a verdict had been returned against the Government. The chief point to be decided, touched, in his opinion, some very serious questions of Government—namely, whether a Minister of the Crown was answerable for the acts which took place in the Park on that particular day, when by his orders the police interfered to suppress such meeting. At such a time as that the Solicitor General took care to prepare the people of Ireland for the treatment those appeals were likely to receive from what he called three or four octogenarian Law Lords. Suppose they should die, and the tribunal be reduced to the Lord Chancellor—a member of the same Cabinet as one of the defendants—and the Irish Lord Chancellor, there would be presented the spectacle of a Ministry judging its own appeal; for, according to the Solicitor General, there was no assurance that any new Law Lords would be appointed. That observation from the Solicitor General appeared to him (Dr. Ball) very like a guarantee that such Peers would not be continued to form that tribunal upon which the Minister had written its doom. The Irish would wish to have the old tribunal preserved; but they had no idea of being consigned to the sort of tribunal which was proposed. The Irish Judges and the Irish Bar had passed some resolutions on the subject, the Judges declaring that it was of essential importance that there should be a right of Final Appeal from the Courts in Ireland to the same tribunal which decided English appeals, and that in the event of a new Court of Appeal being substituted for the House of Lords, a suitable number of Irish Judges, both of Law and Equity, should be associated with the English members of the Appellate tribunal; while the Bar declared that in order to preserve uniformity of decision in the Courts of Law and Equity in England and Ireland, it was essential that there should be the same Final Court of Appeal for both countries; and that as the amount of property involved in many of the Irish cases did not admit of an appeal to England, it was desirable that the Local Courts of Appeal should be preserved. The other day property in Ireland of the value of £50,000 a-year was bequeathed on the same sheet of paper which bequeathed English property also. Were the Irish to be told that the succession to that property might be determined one way in England and another way in Ireland? Was that an enlightened jurisprudence under which one man might be the owner of one property and another of the other under the same will? It was idle to talk of this portion of the Bill as even resembling statesmanship. There was something worse even than that. The great criminal cases which had settled everything came from Ireland. While Ireland had produced the case of "The Queen v. O'Connell," "The Queen v. Mills," and "The Queen v. Gray," there had been a great scarcity of criminal cases from England. If these cases did come the Legislature ought to guarantee that they should be decided by the ablest tribunal that could be procured. If a second O'Connell prosecution should occur, there was not a particle of the language used by the Attorney General that would not recoil upon the English Government at the first moment. He hoped that Scotland, which was equally interested with Ireland, would not slumber on this question. The question also arose what was to be done with the Privy Council? Why had it weight in Ecclesiastical causes? Not because it contained Bishops and men of eminence; but because it contained men who had an adequate knowledge of the law. Under the Bill the Judicial Committee would not have any jurisdiction in English cases except on Ecclesiastical questions. There might be a Minister of ritualistic propensities, and to whom the ambiguity of language constituted its chiefest charm, who might put a Judge on this tribunal with sole reference to its Ecclesiastical decisions. He objected entirely to so great a jurisdiction being left in a tribunal which would be supplied with the sole object of meeting it, and the sole consideration of which would be theology and not law. The only true principle was that the whole Appellate Jurisdiction should be drawn to one great head and fountain which should be surrounded by every accessory of grandeur, hereditary greatness, and tradition that could give it lustre. There was no hurry in legislating on this question, and if the Government contemplated a measure he would recommend them to leave the House of Lords paramount until they were in a position to deal with the Appellate tribunal for the three countries together. The Attorney General stated that the House of Lords, in the O'Connell case, abandoned their jurisdiction at the solicitation of the Duke of Wellington. The Motion was, however, made by Lord Wharncliffe. As to the Appeal Court, he objected to the number of its members. There were to be five ex officio Peers, and nine ordinary members, and there would be power to call in any ex-Chancellors of England or Ireland, or any high judicial functionary from Scotland. Satisfaction would not be given if the decisions of such a man as the Lord Chief Justice of England were to be overruled by any three of the Judges taken from this Court. Under the Bill decisions from the Court of Chancery might be reversed by any three Common Law Judges. He contended that this was a wrong principle. One great advantage of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords was that the members of that tribunal were separated from the members of the tribunal from which they heard appeals. Under this Bill they might have three or five Appellate Courts sitting at once, and they might possibly be adjudicating in a directly antagonistic way to each other. How could there be consistency and firmness in the Appellate Court unless the same men were sitting with unity of purpose, feeling, and decision from day to day? He objected also to calling the whole body of the Judges together for the same purpose, for, as an Irish Judge had observed recently, the number of the Judges destroyed the sense of responsibility. Where there were numbers also they were sure to be divided into parties. He would much sooner have five of the greatest men they could get having no other business but that of hearing appeals; not sitting beside men whose decision they might be called on to reverse, but sitting at an altitude from which they could look down upon all from whom appeals came. The ordinary Appellate Judges were to have £6,000 a-year, whilst if an ex-Lord Chancellor, like Lord Cairns, should become attached to the Court he would have only his pension. Since they had had paid Judges at the Privy Council had they got a single unpaid man to sit there? The very same thing would occur again. The Bill seemed to be constructed so as to shut out every appellate Peer except the Lord Chancellor. When they should have some great criminal case come up it would be a very serious thing that they should have the Appellate Court presided over by the Lord Chancellor, a member of the Cabinet which had, perhaps, advised the prosecution. Such a case there was no provision for, and, indeed, it might have to be decided by Equity Judges. It was true that the Judges might make arrangements among themselves; but he contended that the arrangements for an appeal in such a case should not be left to the Judges to make as they should think fit, but that they should be regulated according to the will and decision of Parliament.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that before they went to a division it would be right that he should say a few words in reference to the debate that had taken place, and mention also those parts of the Bill in which the Government would propose alterations in Committee. In spite of the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball) he would endeavour to show to the House that the general principles of the Bill were such as they might fitly sanction. As to the Appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, to which nine-tenths of the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been directed, that was, he apprehended, settled, or, if not, he trusted it would in the division which was about to take place be settled for the purpose of the Bill. If it had been doubtful what the Government would do as to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), they could no longer hesitate after the speech which they had just heard. That speech was in a spirit of such hostility to the Bill that he asked the House at once to settle the great question that had been raised. Whatever might be the opinions of those hon. Members who had spoken he believed that the public opinion for years had been that the Appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, so far as England was concerned, could not be permanently maintained. It had become generally acknowledged that it only needed a disposition for change on the part of the House of Lords and a vigorous Lord Chancellor to propose it to put an end to the existing state of things. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball) had declared that the people and Judges of Ireland were in favour of the present system; it was precisely for that reason that Ireland had been excepted from the operation of the Bill. But if the people of England desired that the Appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords should be abolished as far as English cases were concerned, why should it be retained because the Irish people wished to retain it for themselves? They had heard of justice to Ireland; but he apprehended that this was a case of justice to England. The right hon. and learned Gentleman expressed his perfect satisfaction with the decisions of the House of Lords. He (the Attorney General) was not equally satisfied. The right hon. and learned Gentleman thought the Brownlow decision, the decision in the case of Lady Wilde, and the decision in the Crimean case satisfactory. But in that he differed altogether from the right hon. and learned Gentleman; neither did he concur in the opinion that the Lords who formed the Court of Appeal in the House of Lords were the greatest statesmen and the wisest men, and perfectly fitted to reverse the decisions of the great Judges of England. There was another matter with which he wished to deal. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews) charged him with not reading the Report of the Committee that sat upon the subject. But he was mistaken. The House of Lords did not recommend Peerages for life, but only that the members of the Court of Appeal should be Peers as such, but not be entitled to sit or vote on any subject of a legislative character. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball) said that three of the heads of the High Court of Justice were to be paid £6,000 a-year; while the remainder of the Judges were to get £5,000 only; so that it was evidently meant to cast a slur on such a distinguished lawyer as Lord Cairns, who would be one of the inferior Judges. Now, his answer to that assertion was that in the original draft of the Bill the salary of all was put down at £5,000 a-year, which was altered in the House of Lords, as the Bill now stood, to £6,000 a-year to the Chiefs of the Court. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had attacked the patronage parts of the Bill. The referees were to be officers of the Court or of the divisions of the Court, and in the latter case the patronage would not rest with the Lord Chancellor, but with the Presidents of those Courts. The right hon. and learned Gentleman should have taken care of his facts before making such allegations. There was one point on which the House was entitled to some explanation. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had dwelt with some warmth on the fact that the new Court of Appeal, which in practice would decide great Equity cases, would, striking out the five ex officio members, consist of a number of distinguished persons, of whom only two would be Equity men. Now, he felt that was not a satisfactory position of affairs. This was a matter in which his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer felt they should not haggle about money. If the thing was worth doing, it was worth paying for to do it well; and what was proposed was this—that instead of the provision in the Bill there should be left to the Queen not an unlimited selection, but a selection with certain qualifications, of persons, not from the Common Law Bar, to fill the places of the three Puisne Judges. This might create a permanent charge; but he thought it not unreasonable, and he hoped it would afford considerable satisfaction to his hon. and learned Friend. There were several other changes, not, perhaps, of any great importance, but which he trusted would meet the more reasonable objections which had been brought forward against the Bill. A reference to a Select Committee meant postponement for another year, which, in the present condition of affairs, meant relegating the whole matter to an unknown future. He begged to thank the great body of the House for the temper and spirit in which the Bill had been discussed. The question about the Vice Chancellor was still under consideration, and might be dealt with in Committee. He had only to express a hope, in conclusion, that the House would negative the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley.)

MR. CHARLEY said, his only object had been to secure a full discussion of the measure, and having attained that object, he wished to withdraw his Amendment. ["No!"]

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 23rd June.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870). AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Elementary Education Act, said:—At this hour I cannot ask the House to listen to me for more than a few minutes. But the Session is getting on, and I trust I shall be allowed at once to bring in this Bill, even though my statement must be very brief. As it is only three years since we passed the Education Act, it may be asked why I bring in an amending Bill? For two reasons—1. Because it is necessary we should finally settle the mode of electing the school boards, the powers given by the Act to the Department to regulate such elections having been only temporary; and, 2. Because the working of the Act has shown some administrative improvements to be desirable. That this should be the case in so difficult a matter will, I think, surprise no one. But I may at once state that we do not contemplate any change in the main principle of the Act. Its chief objects, the House may recollect, I ventured to define in bringing it forward as—

"Legal enactment, that there shall be efficient schools everywhere throughout the kingdom. Compulsory provision of such schools if and where needed, but not unless proved to be needed."—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 444.]

Had time permitted, I would have endeavoured to show that these objects are being attained as quickly as we could reasonably have expected. Before the end of the summer we shall, I confidently expect, have sent out notices requiring the deficiency in school accommodation to be supplied in every school district in which there is such deficiency. This was the result of an inquiry by the Education Department, and of the inspection of 17,000 elementary schools. But meantime the necessity of a compulsory provision has been largely anticipated by voluntary effort. I hope, before long, to have an opportunity of describing and acknowledging the extent of this effort, both in the borough and in the country parishes. I can only now say that—thanks to that educational zeal which has caused the formation of voluntary school boards in almost every important borough, and which in so many rural parishes has made a rate unnecessary by voluntary subscriptions. I could, I believe, prove to the House that there will be very soon a school within the reach of every child of school age in the kingdom. But it may be said, what are schools without scholars? I do not deny that non-attendance and irregularity of attendance are still our great educational difficulties. But we must not suppose that we are not making progress in this matter also. Our Returns up to last year show that scholars have increased as much as schools; but since our last Return I have good reason to believe that the patient, untiring efforts of the school boards, for which we cannot be sufficiently grateful, and also of many managers have succeeded in bringing many more children to school. When I introduced the Act the last previous Return showed an average attendance in the Government schools of a little more than 1,000,000. I shall be much disappointed if the Returns up to the end of next August do not show an average attendance of about 1,500,000. I will now, as briefly as possible, explain the purport of the Bill. I may as well at once state that there is no provision to make attendance compulsory throughout the kingdom. The grounds upon which the Government have arrived at this conclusion I shall be glad fully to explain when time permits. But it is due to myself and to the House to say that, as regards compulsory attendance, I have personally the same opinion as that which I expressed in debate last year. I have not concealed from my Colleagues my conviction that direct compulsion might be safely made the general law for England and Wales. But I do not deny—and those who agree with me will not deny—that if we are mistaken in this opinion a premature step would be fatal to our own cause. These compulsory laws are very difficult matters; it would be most dangerous to set public opinion against us by an over-hasty step, and the failure to pass a general compulsory law would greatly weaken the school boards in their efforts to put in force their bye-laws. There is one step, however, which the House will, I think, allow us to take—I hope with general approval. There are, I believe, in the kingdom at least 200,000 children of school age of out-door paupers—I fear there are more; and from among these children come a large proportion of those whose education is neglected. At present the Guardians may, if they think fit, provide for their education, but must not make that provision a condition of relief. We think the time has come when we may make this provision general, and we therefore propose to repeal the Act generally known as Denison's Act, and to replace it by words which I can most shortly explain by reading—

thirteen years of age, or to any such child, it shall be a condition of such relief that elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic shall (unless there is some reasonable excuse within the meaning of section seventy-four of the principal Act), be provided for such child, and the Guardians shall give such further relief (if any) as may be necessary for that purpose."

But in this clause we also deal with Section 25 of the Education Act, which I need not remind the House enables school boards to pay the school fees of children whose parents, though not paupers, are poor. I will not now repeat what I have frequently stated that the objects of the House in passing unanimously this clause were, I fully believe, the objects of the Government in proposing it—namely, 1. To enable school boards to get children to school; 2. To take from parents, who neglect their duty, a reasonable excuse. Nevertheless many persons, whose opinions we are bound to respect, strongly object to the working of this section; and we are most anxious to meet their views so far as we possibly can. As I stated last year, we think we can best serve the cause of education, and that too without injuring the voluntary schools, by severing as much as possible all connection between these schools and school boards. I am also prepared to show why we think experience has proved that the Board of Guardians is the body best able to ascertain what parents ought to be assisted out of the rates, and we find that very many of those members of the school boards who have been most active and efficient in increasing the attendance are of that opinion. At the same time we cannot interfere with what we consider to be the parents' right; and, as an advocate of compulsory education, I must repeat my conviction that compulsion must fail if we try to punish a parent who is too poor to pay a school fee for not sending his child to school, without, at the same time, offering him assistance; and also if we deprive him of his right of choosing what school he prefers, when there is more than one school which gives such secular education as is acknowledged to be efficient. We, therefore, propose to repeal Section 25, and enact in its place the following provision:—

"If the parent (not being a pauper) of any child required by a bye-law under section seventy-four of the principal Act to attend school, satisfies the guardians of the union in which he resides that he cannot comply with such bye-law because he is unable from poverty to pay the whole or part of the school fees charged for the elementary education of such child, it shall be the duty of the guardians to make him such allowance as will enable him to pay the school fees, or such part thereof as he is in their opinion unable to pay. Any such relief or allowance to a parent as above mentioned shall not be granted or refused on condition of the child attending any public elementary school other than such as may be selected by the parent."

The House will observe that these words do not enact that fees shall be paid to school managers out of the rates, but simply that help shall be given only to those parents who without such help could not obey the compulsory bye-laws. Two other provisions connected with the matter I must mention. We do not think that a parent ought to become a pauper merely by receiving this assistance, and therefore we enact, in accordance with Section 25, that any money paid to a parent for this purpose, shall not be deemed to be parochial relief. We also add these words—

"The guardians shall not have power under this section to give any relief or make any allowance to a parent in order to enable such parent to pay more than the ordinary fee payable at the school which he selects, or more than one farthing for each attendance at such school."

Some such limitation as this is plainly necessary. The limitation we have taken is that fixed by the Liverpool School Board, who have worked the Act under difficult circumstances with great care and success, and both upon economical and educational grounds it seems to us the best we can take. But I may add that it will make it clear that no voluntary school can be maintained simply by the Government grant and by the fees paid out of the rates, or without such aid from other sources as will more than defray any instruction in religious subjects given in such school. I could show if required that no school is thus maintained at present. The Bill will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow afternoon, and I therefore will not at this hour dwell on the other clauses, which with the exception of those relating to the election of school boards are improvements in details suggested by experience. I may state that I have endeavoured to meet the practical difficulties discovered by the school boards in carrying out the compulsory bye-laws; and, as regards elections, we propose to extend the ballot throughout the kingdom. At present the school boards are only elected by ballot in London and the boroughs; but we propose that there should be the same form of election throughout the kingdom. We have also taken power for the Education Department to make regulations as to charges in the conduct of elections in order to check their cost. In moving for leave to bring in this amending Bill, I will only add that I confidently rely on that general assistance and generous forbearance which was so conspicuously shown by the House during the passing of the original Act; based on the conviction then felt—and which I am sure we all feel now—that this matter of education is one upon which we must legislate without consideration for party feeling or personal predilections. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. DIXON said, he could not help expressing his great disappointment at the announcement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman. That disappointment could only be equalled by the satisfaction which must be felt by hon. Gentlemen opposite. When an amendment of the Education Act was promised in the Queen's Speech it was hoped that the measure would be of some value.

MR. RICHARD concurred in the opinion which had been just expressed by the hon. Member for Birmingham. He was bitterly disappointed with the Bill, which would certainly not allay the dissatisfaction existing among a numerous and powerful class in the country.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he was glad to find the right hon. Gentleman prepared to be guided by results, and not by theories.

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^d according to Order.

LORD DUNSANY moved, after clause 4, to add—

"And it shall be further lawful for the said judge, upon the evidence of the high sheriff, of any justice of the peace, any stipendiary magistrate, county inspector, or sub-inspector of constabulary, to remove from the general jurors book or special book the name or names of any juror or jurors who may have been convicted of any ribbon offence, or arraigned for such offence and not acquitted, or who to the best of the knowledge or belief of the justices or sub-inspector of constabulary within whose district the said juror or jurors reside, is or has been a member of any ribbon or unlawful society; provided the said judge shall be satisfied as to the evidence in the case."

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE pointed out that the provisions already in the Bill were only temporary. They would expire in January, 1875, but the Amendment would make the Bill a permanent one.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Marquess of Lansdowne).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he must once more draw attention to the slovenly manner in which these Bills were frequently drawn. The enactments of the Bill consisted chiefly of the enumeration of the sections of previous Acts. The consequences of this were sometimes ludicrous, not to say inconvenient. One of these references in the Bill empowered entry into any dwelling house in Belfast at any hour. One, at least, of the references was incorrect, and this mode of legislation was peculiarly liable to printers' blunders, one of them this Session having confused a provision as to bastard children with Courts-martial in India.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that instructions had been given to the Irish Local Government Board to avoid this practice for the future.

After a short conversation, the Motion for the Second Reading was withdrawn, and the Bills were ordered to be read the second time on Tuesday next.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the hon. Member for Birmingham, Whether it is his intention to proceed with the Notice which stands upon the Paper in his name for Tuesday in reference to the Elementary Education Act?

MR. DIXON said, it was not his intention; but on the second reading of the Bill brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, he should move as an Amendment—

"That no Amendment of this Bill will be satisfactory that does not make attendance of the children at the schools, and the formation of School Boards compulsory throughout England and Wales, and that does not remove the objections generally entertained to the 26th clause of the Elementary Education Act."

ARMY—THE MILITIA—GENERAL ORDERS, No. 52, 1872.—QUESTION.

COLONEL CORBETT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will reconsider the Regulation issued with the General Orders for Militia, No. 52, of 1872, which requires that all officers of Militia who are nominated for commissions in the Line shall have attained the necessary age on May 1st of the year in which they are recommended, as fixing that particular day is calculated to act unfairly towards those who happen to have been born in one of the months nearly following that date; and, whether it would not be sufficient for the required age to be attained at the time when the officer is recommended?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the question was very fully considered, and it was determined that, as the time at which the Militia regiments are called out varies very much, it would not be fair to fix the time at which the officer might be recommended, and that the only fair way was to fix a day in the course of the training season; the 1st of May was accordingly appointed, and cannot now be altered.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA— NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD.

QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If any arrangements are in contemplation to give the Members of this House an opportunity of witnessing the assemblage of ships at Spithead, on the occasion of the visit of His Majesty the Shah to Portsmouth?

MR. GOSCHEN in reply, said, that no arrangements for special trains, special luncheons, or special ships for the Members of the House of Lords or of the House of Commons, or of any of the large public bodies were in contemplation for the occasion to which the Question referred. Every facility would, however, be given to Members of either House of Parliament who desired to be present at it to witness the review.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked on what day the review would be held?

MR. GOSCHEN said, there would be an inspection of ships by the Shah on the 23rd instant, and the assemblage of vessels would remain at Portsmouth a certain number of days, in order that the public who might be desirous of witnessing the interesting spectacle might have an opportunity of doing so.

MR. YORKE: Will no vessels be available for Members of the Houses of Parliament except those for the service of the public generally?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had not said so; but on the contrary, if he knew that a large number of the Members of the Houses of Parliament were anxious to see the review, they would do their best to afford them every possible facility. But the Government did not contemplate any arrangements on the scale of those which were made on the occasion of the Sultan's visit to Portsmouth, when special trains, the splendid vessels belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Company, and other ships, were engaged by the Government for the day, and 2,500 tickets distributed.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he hoped that, as the expense of entertaining Members of the Legislature on the 23rd, would seem to be thrown by the Government on the officers of the ships, no hon. Member of that House would think it right to avail himself of their hospitality.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that would not be the effect of the arrangements they would make.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL C. LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether those Adjutants of the Volunteer Force who were Field Officers in the Army when they were appointed, will be recommended for the step of honorary rank on retirement, according to the principle upon which Adjutants who hold the rank of Captain enjoy that privilege?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, an adjutant, of whatever army rank, serves in the Volunteers as Captain. His Volunteer service, therefore, giving him on retirement a step of honorary rank, it gives him the honorary rank of Major. If a field officer of the Army becomes an adjutant of Volunteers, that service can give him no claim to a step of honorary rank for Army service.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE) BILL.

[BILL 146].

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(Preliminary.)

Clause 2 (Extent of Act).

MR. STANSFELD, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 8, after "Ireland," to insert "save as is in this Act otherwise expressly provided," said, it was intended by it, to extend, as far as possible, the provisions of the Bill with respect to the rating of Government property to Scotland and Ireland.

MR. CRAUFURD thanked the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for having accepted his (Mr. Craufurd's) suggestion, to extend the operation of the Bill, and and also of the one which followed, to Scotland. He was absent from the House on Wednesday last, when the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government spoke upon the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill and he wished now to correct a misapprehension under which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to labour—namely, that he (Mr. Craufurd) had intended that his Amendment should apply to the Bills now under discussion. He had done nothing of the kind. On the contrary, he had expressly stated that he did not intend it to apply to them, and if he thought it would have such an effect he would not have proposed it.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was surprised that such a serious Amendment had been so suddenly produced. With reference to a statement made in a former debate, to the effect that the use of the Crown property in the parish of Canongate was larger than all the rest of the parish, he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) thought it was desirable that the Committee should have some information as to the extent of Government property in England and Ireland. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would receive from the right hon. Gentleman some statements as to the distribution of Government property in different parts of the country, so that some idea might be formed as to the amount of money that would have to be voted annually for the purpose of paying the rate to be levied on such property.

MR. McLAREN said, that the hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Sclater-Booth) had misunderstood the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd), who spoke only of the area of the parish, and not of its rental. The Crown property referred to was the Queen's Park, let as a grazing farm at about £800 a-year; whereas the rental of the rest of the parish, crowded as it was with houses, must exceed £40,000 he should think, although he had not the figures before him. The effect of the Bill would be to relieve the grazing land of the taxation, while that on the property, to the value of £40,000, would continue to pay the same rates as heretofore.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY wished to know whether the only part of this Bill which the right hon. Gentleman contemplated applying to Ireland was Part 2, which related to Government property?

MR. STANSFELD said, that it was his intention to apply Part 2 only of the Bill to Ireland. He was not prepared to commit himself to a statement of the value of all the Government property in the different areas of the country; but if the hon. Member for North Hants wished to ascertain exactly the distribution, he had better move for a Return on the subject.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Abolition of Exemptions.

Clause 3 (Extension of Poor Rate Acts to other property.)

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON observed that the recital of the Poor Law Act was incorrect and should be altered, and with that view, he would move as an Amendment, in page 1, line 13, after "taxation of," to insert "every inhabitant and of."

MR. HIBBERT thought there was force in the objection, but that the proposed Amendment would not effect the desired purpose.

An Amendment made, to insert the words "amongst others," after "taxation of."

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, with the object of asserting that liability to rating should not be limited to real property, rose to move as an Amendment, the insertion, in line 17, after "said Act," of the words—

"And further, at the same time, to provide for bringing into contribution, in aid of the various local burdens now levied under the poor rate, income arising from personal property which is now exempt from such contribution."

He said, it was not his object to get real property exempted; but what he sought to do was to make all other realized property and the wealth of the country share the liability to rating, and to take from it the special exemption which now belonged to it. He complained that the Bill did not touch this part of the question.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that this Bill was the first of several steps which the Government had proposed to take.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, that when the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister spoke of that as the first step, one might hope that it was the first step in the right direction, and that it would be followed by others. As an authority in favour of the principles of his Amendment, he would first refer to a former Bill of the present Government, which had been described as a Bill of shreds and patches, and which did not get beyond the fringe of the subject, and next to the Resolution recently carried by a majority of 100 on the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) which distinctly recognized the hardship and injustice of the taxation of one description of property. So far, however, from doing anything to give effect to that Motion, the Bill made matters worse; and they were so bad, that the country felt they could not be tolerated much longer. In fact, the Bill would afford no relief to towns, which did not contain Government property, mines, or rights of shooting. A Select Committee of the House of Lords, also consisting of 23 Peers, which sat in 1850, reported strongly in favour of the rating of personal property; but no attention had been paid to their Report. The debate of last Tuesday, which came by surprise on the Opposition, was significant in its result, and the conduct of the hon. Member for South Wilts, who had placed a Notice on the Paper for this Bill to be referred to a Select Committee, and who had abandoned that Notice at the eleventh hour, and was not even present to explain his conduct, reminded him of the sketch which showed the legs of Lord John Russell as he ran round a corner after he had chalked up the words "No Popery." The division, too, on that occasion sufficiently marked the sense of the House; the minority of 30 only showed that the feeling in favour of rating personal property was rapidly growing; and the debate fully effected its object, although the Amendment was defeated. He voted for it chiefly as a protest against the Government Bill not dealing with the question of personal property at all; and the debate with such a division was a more useful result than it would have been to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and so shelve it for the Session. While the Bill, as it stood, unsettled much, it settled nothing. It raised conflicting interests without doing any corresponding good, and there could be no adjustment of local burdens while personal wealth paid no contribution to them. This Amendment would afford an opportunity to the Government to state what their intentions were; and the announcement of those intentions would be welcomed if they were in the right direction. As it stood, however, the Bill could not give satisfaction, either here or in the country. He did not think there was any difficulty in the rating of personal property; but, if it were once admitted that justice demanded the rating of personal property, there would be a much greater chance of arriving at a practicable mode of giving effect to the principle. It was not for him to devise the mode of doing it; but, of course, the income from personal property furnished the only means of touching it. He did not see why a man having £20,000 in the Funds should not be taxed equally with the owner of £20,000 in land with regard to the local taxation of his neighbourhood. The late Mr. Crawshay, the Welsh ironmaster, died worth £800,000 in the Funds, which would produce an income of from £28,000 to £30,000 a-year, and yet in respect of that income he did not contribute 6d. towards the burdens of local taxation. It was impossible to justify that while a man with an equal amount of property in land paid 3s. or 4s. in the pound in local rates; for, of course, the man whose income was derived from the Funds had as much interest in the maintenance of law and order, and of police and sanitary arrangements, as the owner of house property and of land. It might be said that the original Act for the creation of funded property exempted that kind of property from taxation. He looked into the Act, and found that the words were—

"And, moreover, no money so lent upon security of this Act shall be rated or assessed by virtue of this Act."

Those words did not, in his opinion, bear the construction which had been put on them by some persons, and referred to the capital and not to the income of funded wealth. The Funds were now made liable to income tax, and if they were further made liable to rates in aid of expenses for local and Imperial purposes, it would be quite consistent with the original Act of William and Mary and with the Act for the imposition of the income tax. If the licences which were locally collected, such as the dog, horse, gun, and carriage licences, were locally allocated, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer could make personal wealth contribute to supply the deficiency thus created in the Imperial Exchequer, it would be a fair way of meeting the difficulty, and would be less liable to objection than taking a lump sum from the Consolidated Fund, part of which was drawn from Ireland and Scotland. He entirely approved the provision in the Bill to exempt stock-in-trade. The class of property which he wished to see taxed was that enormous mass of personal wealth in this country which was free from local burdens, and in conformity with that view, Schedule C and that portion of Schedule D which contributed to Imperial taxation, but not in any degree to local taxation, was the portion which he wished should be made to contribute to the relief of local burdens. He regretted not to see the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister in his place, because he desired to read an extract from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman when Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853, which bore directly on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman, referring to the exemption of Ireland from income tax, said—

"Let me remind the Committee what exemption means. It does not mean that we have got a bottomless purse, and that we can dispense exemptions to one man without injuring another: no, Sir, the exemption of one man means the extra taxation of another—and the exemption of one country" (for one country here let them read one class) "means the extra taxation of another."—[3 Hansard, cxxxv. 1893.]

Those were the words used by the right hon. Gentleman in 1853, and there could not be a stronger corroboration of the argument which he (Sir George Jenkinson) had ventured to advance. He maintained that the exemption of one class was a gross injustice which ought to be amended without delay. When the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) moved his Resolution last year, it was said that those who supported it, came begging to the House. He denied the accuracy of that expression, unless to demand justice was to beg; but if it was so for whom was he begging? He was not begging for his own class, nor for those who were able to come to that House and ask justice for themselves; he was begging for that class of ratepayers in town and country whose lot in life was one of toil and privation, as against those whose life was one of ease, affluence, and luxury. He, therefore, hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would give due consideration to this question, without regarding it as one of party, for it was really a question of the claims of the poorer people of this country upon the enormous mass of wealth which was entirely untouched for the relief of the poor. It was a question which was growing in importance day by day, and if this Parliament would not deal liberally and honourably by it, they would have to answer for their neglect at the general election. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

LORD HENLEY rose to explain why, having voted in the majority last year, he could not give his support to the Amendment. While, as a rule, in favour of taxing personal property, yet in this case he did not see how it could be effected with regard to justice, seeing that the owner of property in the Funds was already taxed as respected the general taxation of this country by the income tax. His object, however, in voting with the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) last year was to show that the subject was one which needed consideration, and that it had not had fair consideration from the Government; but he thought the House had hardly considered it sufficiently to enable them to vote for so strong an Amendment as that being added to a clause in a Bill which, so far as it went, was a good Bill. Whether the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon was keeping silence because he thought the subject was now receiving due consideration he did not know; but he was opposed to the Amendment because it did not touch the main subject, and because it was sufficiently large and important in itself to be a proper question for a Select Committee another Session. The hon. Member for Liverpool had mentioned that the rates in that town were 6s. in the pound; and the immense importance of the subject was forced upon his attention the other day, when in going through the accounts of the town of Northampton he found that the rates there amounted to 7s. 6d. in the pound. Why, a great outcry was made in that House if an additional 1d. upon the income tax was proposed; but in that case the rate fell upon the ratepayers, not by pence, or even by shillings, but by half-crowns. Here were three half-crowns which fell upon the people of Northampton, with the exception of those who lived in very small tenements. That was an enormous species of taxation which required the grave attention of every statesman. He held that property in towns should pay such rates as enhanced its value—for instance, rates for paving, lighting, and sewerage; but it was not at all fair that rates for the poor, for justice, and police should be borne by the inhabitants without aid from the State. He thought the House ought not in its present position to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts (Sir George Jenkinson). They had not sufficiently considered the subject to enable them to vote for such an Amendment, and for his own part he should vote against it.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I rejoice that the hon. Member for North Wilts (Sir George Jenkinson) has called the attention of the House to a subject which has not been fairly considered since the year 1850, when the Committee of the House of Lords reported on local taxation. After all, what is the main intention of the Bill before the House? It is a Bill to abolish exemptions from rating. The Government deserve some credit for their intention of considering the abolition of the exemption of Government property from rating. It may also be right that the House should consider the assessment of woods. There will be some difficulty on that subject; for, on counting the rings in the grain of an oak tree, marking its age, I found 230; so that oak tree must have stood for 230 years, at least; and it will need rather an abstruse calculation to ascertain, how the £12 or £15 that tree, when felled, is worth, ought to have been distributed in the rates over so long a period. There are, however, no limits to the power of calculation, and perhaps that difficulty may be overcome. But there are other difficulties, even in the small adventure of this Bill. It has always been considered unjust to require the royalty of a mine to be assessed as rent, seeing that this royalty represents the sale of a certain portion of the property, from which it is taken, whereas rent only represents the annual return from the land generally, and from the application of capital to the improvement of its surface. I am glad that even these small exemptions are to be dealt with by the Committee. But there remains the great exemption altogether untouched—the exemption of the means of those who do not occupy real property, or rather only occupy some insignificant portion of real property, as do lodgers in a house. Now, I hold that the principle of the Act of Elizabeth was just, which enacted, that every man should be rated according to his means, for such national objects as the provision for the relief of the poor and the administration of justice. I quite agree with the noble Lord the Member for Northampton (Lord Henley), that rates levied and expended only for the improvement or lighting of towns, for the immediate convenience of the inhabitants of those towns, ought to be separated from the rates levied for general and national objects, such as the poor rate, the police rate, and the rate for lunatic asylums. It would be unfair, however, to confuse, in dealing with questions of rating, rates which are laid purely for the local convenience of certain towns, for the mere convenience of their inhabitants, with rates levied and expended for national objects; but I cannot consider that the exemption of personal property from contributing towards national objects is in any degree just. I believe the principle of the Act of Elizabeth, that every man should be rated according to his means, to be the true principle of taxation. Well, Sir, it so happens that I have been inquiring in the library of the House whether it contains any account of the taxation and of the local taxation of the United States of America, and I find that the library is destitute of any information on the subject. But the librarian kindly placed in my hand a pamphlet published for private circulation by the Cobden Club, and printed at Manchester, which can only be obtained on application to some member of the Cobden Club. Now, whatever I may think of the conclusion at which the Commissioners of the City of New York have arrived, as shown by that pamphlet—whatever I may think of the opinions of the Cobden Club, they deserve credit for collecting these statistics and this information, and I cannot help feeling that the House of Commons ought to be in possession of the information to which I have alluded with respect to local taxation in the United States. This information is, it appears, at present confined to the members of the Cobden Club. They only have, since 1871, been in possession of detailed information of the manner and extent in which personal property has always been liable to local taxation in the United States. Now, let the House observe the narrow ground on which the question is treated by this Bill. In the United States, by their constitution, the Federal Government cannot, except in cases of emergency, impose direct taxation on property. The privilege and duty of imposing direct taxation for ordinary purposes has been exclusively discharged by the State Governments. That was the original and constitutional form of taxation in this country, and it remains to a certain degree yet in Scotland. And I believe that to be the sound system of taxation; and yet the financial arrangements of this country have been so conducted during the last 22 years that, while in the Customs duties alone, the House has sanctioned the abandonment of £14,000,000 of revenue, during the whole of the same period they have continued the direct taxation, through the property and income tax, in substitution of the indirect taxation in a great measure levied on luxuries, which has been abandoned. In the United States every species of personal property is taxed for State, that is, for local purposes. They tax mortgages, they tax securities, they tax furniture, they tax every kind of moveable property; and, although the members of the Cobden Club disapprove of that system of taxation, in expressing their disapproval they give us the fact, that in every State of the United States, except Pennsylvania, every kind of property, whether real or personal, is taxed, and even in Pennsylvania, personal property is not altogether exempt from local contribution. Here, in England, we have an income tax locally assessed and locally levied; but instead of its produce being applied to local objects, it goes entirely into the Imperial Exchequer. Common sense sanctions the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts. If personal property is locally assessed and locally taxed, why should not some portion of that taxation be locally applied, as it is in the United States, and in several Continental countries? I may be told that this is a difficult and a large subject with which the House ought not at present to deal. But I ask, why, then, have the Government entered upon this large and difficult subject if they are not prepared to deal with it properly? Why do they propose to abolish these paltry exemptions from rating—paltry, I say, when compared with the great exemption of personal property—compared with this gigantic exemption, how paltry are the exemptions of game, of the right of sporting, of timber, and even of Government property? If we are to deal with the exemption of any property, from contributing to those national objects, which are accomplished by local taxation, let us, I say, deal with the whole of it; for, unless you consider the subject of exemptions as a whole, the probability is that you will do injustice. Looking to these circumstances, if the Government will not undertake to deal with the whole subject of exemptions from rating, I shall vote for the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts.

Mr. WHALLEY said, he believed the present proposal to be utterly opposed to public feeling. It was for the interest of the owners of real property in every country that they should take upon themselves the burden of taxation and to relieve personal property, to relieve the muscle and brain of the country. It was for the interest of the country that every kind of personal property should be free from rating, because it was from that that the landlords real property resulted. By the Act of Elizabeth, stock-in-trade was allowed to be taxed; but the common sense of the people admitted that it would be madness to impose such a tax on personal property of that description; and though the municipal councils of the country had had the power of taxing stock-in-trade for more than three centuries, it was a power which had never been enforced.

Mr. YORKE thought the Committee were indebted to the hon. Baronet who had moved the Amendment (Sir George Jenkinson), although he could not agree in all its details. He wished also to say that he did not think those were correct who supposed that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) approved the course which the Government were taking in reference to the subject of local taxation. The large majority of the House were, he believed, in favour of having some contributions made from personal property to local taxation; but there were difficulties in doing so, which were not to be met by an octroi or by means of the machinery of the income tax. Various other schemes had been suggested for the purpose, and the subject had been very well treated in a small pamphlet which had been published by Captain Craigie, the substance of which was delivered in the shape of a lecture at the Social Science Congress at Plymouth last year. It referred to a system which prevailed in Scotland with respect to the classification of rates, and by which many of the difficulties connected with the question were seen to be obviated. He looked on the suggestion of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts, that the licences and horse and carriage duty should go to the maintenance of the roads, as a very valuable one; and those who objected to public-houses might also allow the public-house licences to be applied to the relief of the poor, inasmuch as they looked upon those houses as the origin of their misery. Some again, were of opinion that it could be done by utilizing the machinery of the income tax; but he did not agree with this, because the working classes would be allowed to escape altogether. Moreover, he did not himself think it would be desirable to have recourse to the income tax machinery, as that was not at the present time the most popular impost, and it was, moreover, regarded by large numbers of people as temporary in its nature. Many other suggestions had been made; but he considered they could not do better than fall back upon the Resolution carried by a majority of 100 last year. The best possible solution, after all, was that of the hon. Member for South Devon, and if the administration of justice, the expenses of the police and of lunatics were provided for out of Imperial funds, the best solution of the question would probably have been attained. Now, although he did not entirely approve the Amendment, he should vote for it as a protest against the course which the Government had pursued. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, in answer to a Question which had been put to him last year by the hon. Member for Cornwall (Mr. St. Aubyn), stated on the subject of local taxation, that, without going into detail, the Government, in dealing with the question, would look very much to the following points:—1st, to the introduction of the representative principle into local institutions, where that principle did not already obtain; 2nd, to equality and justice as between landlords and occupiers of the soil; 3rd, to equality as between the various classes of the community, in respect to the aggregate contributions they made to the public burdens; 4th, to the general revising of public ministration, so that no charges should be imposed or maintained which might be avoided or reduced; and lastly, that nothing should be done to weaken the invaluable principles of local self-government and local self-control which were among the main securities of the institutions of the country. He could not see in the Bills before the House what the right hon. Gentleman had done to give effect to those promises, and he wished by his vote to mark his sense of the manner in which the Government had acted in reference to the subject.

SIR HENRY HOARE felt himself bound in consistency, as he had supported the Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massie Lopes), to vote for the Amendment on the present occasion.

COLONEL BARTELOT thought the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts had done good service in bringing forward the question. He wished, however, before he committed himself by voting upon the Amendment, to understand what was its purport. It declared that personal property which was now exempt from taxation ought to contribute; but if that meant that we were to have an increased income tax, he was not prepared to support it. In the case of burdens imposed by that House for Imperial purposes, and for the general benefit of the country, he thought that the Imperial resources should bear their share; but he was not prepared to vote for an Amendment which might mean something that he did not intend. Under these circumstances, he was unable to support the Amendment of the hon. Baronet.

MR. DODSON thought that if the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts went to a division, he would show rather the simplicity of the dove than the wisdom of the serpent, because such a division would have the effect of weakening the Resolution that was arrived at last year. What appearance would a division on the present occasion present to the public outside. What those who supported the Resolution of last year complained of was, that local burdens fell only on two kinds of property, when they should fall upon all kinds; but how could they complain of the present Bill on that ground when, by assenting to the Budget, they had put it out of the power of the Government that year to give any relief from the contributions of personalty? The present Bill would tax wood, game, and great houses in the country; and hon. Members should be careful how they conveyed to the ratepayers the impression that they wished to prevent property of this kind contributing to local burdens.

MR. CORRANCE thought the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts had succeeded by his Amendment in introducing a very large issue into a very small Bill; but that he was to be congratulated to this extent, that he had shown many cases amounting to great hardship and injustice with respect to the subject of rating. However, after the admissions which the Government had made, he (Mr. Corrance) should support the Bill, and hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. HIBBERT drew attention to this—that the Amendment pointed to no means of carrying out the principle which was embodied in it; and that, if the proposition were carried, it would be necessary that they should have something more—like the transfer of the licence duty, for instance—before effect could be given to it. [SIR GEORGE JENKINSON: Yes.] But the hon. Baronet had shown no method by which they could bring personal property to contribute to local rates. In fact, the line suggested by the hon. Baronet for obtaining relief from local taxation did not seem to be favoured by the House generally, who were rather in favour of the mode of relief indicated in the Resolution of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes). That was not the first proposal which had been made to rate personal property; but all such attempts had been found ineffectual, and one evidence of that was afforded, by the Act passed from year to year, exempting stock-in-trade from rating. It had been expressly decided that money lent upon interest, salaries, and many other kinds of personal property were not subject to rates, and, as Sir George Lewis said, the rateability of personal property in England, though theoretically sanctioned by law, was practically a new question. In Sunderland, under a local Act, there was power to rate personal property, including shipping; but the difficulty of carrying out the Act was so great, that the authorities had almost ceased to put it in operation, and he believed they would be glad to get rid of this power of rating. Parliament would find the same difficulties in enforcing the Amendment. Many years ago stock-in-trade was rated in a part of the West of England, and the result was, that it drove capital away from the cloth district. It might be said that no such result would follow, if the same law were carried out everywhere. But when and how would it be enforced? Take the case of a grocer. Would the assessment be made when his cellars were full or empty? Or in the case of a wealthy fundholder, having seats in the country and a town residence, where would you assess him? Even with the greatest desire on the part of the House to rate personalty, he believed the difficulties of doing so would be found insuperable. The Government had brought before the House their plan. They said this was only one step in the direction they proposed to take. They meant to deal with the question of local taxation, but first wished to pass the Bills now before the House; and those who desired to support the proposals of the hon. Member for South Devon should help to pass these Bills during the present Session.

MR. CRAUFURD begged the hon. Baronet not to press his Motion to a division, because if he did so, he would imperil that which they had at heart. They had obtained very considerable support in the House in the direction of his object; but he was satisfied that if he pressed the Motion to a division on the present occasion, many of his Friends would have to leave the House without voting for it.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he concurred in the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd).

Mr. Dodson

His hon. Friend (Sir George Jenkinson) had done good service in raising what had proved a valuable discussion, but he hoped he would be contented with that result. The Government proposals had made the exemption now attached to personal property more invidious; but he confessed he had never been able to see how personal property was to be assessed, and he certainly was no advocate for rating stock-in-trade. He was inclined to think that the mode which he had proposed for obtaining relief from local taxation was the best mode, and would grow in favour with the House and the country.

MR. DISRAELI joined with those who had urged the hon. Member for North Wilts not to divide the Committee. The labours of the hon. Member in impressing upon the House the necessity of determining upon the liability of personal property to local taxation were worthy of all praise, and he entirely agreed that the House must come to some permanent resolution upon the subject; but the mode of enforcing that liability should be left to a responsible Government. An opposition could only suggest the principle they thought best, and illustrate by instances the injustice of not recognizing this principle. The debate had been very advantageous to the general principle which the hon. Member for North Wilts wished to substantiate; and it was only fair to him to remind the Committee that he had distinctly stated he never contemplated the rating of stock-in-trade. He apprehended that the justice of there being some contribution from personal property in some form would soon be recognized by Parliament, and among those who had laboured successfully to accomplish that object the hon. Baronet's right to be considered one would be acknowledged. At the same time, he thought that, for practical purposes, it was inexpedient that the matter should proceed no further on that occasion. A division on the Amendment would be liable to the greatest misconception; and though he agreed that those who favoured the liability of personal property might consistently vote for it without committing themselves to the principle of a formal assessment upon that kind of property, yet he hoped the hon. Baronet would be satisfied with having originated a debate which would contribute largely to the formation of a sound policy upon this question.

MR. STANSFELD joined in the appeal to the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts to withdraw the Amendment. The discussion then about to terminate had been very interesting, but, with regard to the Amendment, the Committee was clearly of opinion that it would be impossible to carry it out immediately, and considering it was admitted that something should be done shortly to redress the grievance complained of, whether by contributions from the Imperial Exchequer or by direct allocation of Imperial taxes to local purposes, nothing would be lost by postponing the consideration of the question. He thought, therefore, the Committee had no alternative but to reject it.

MR. HENLEY thought that the Committee could not feel surprised at the question being raised, when they recollected the Resolution to which the House had come a year back; and it appeared to him that the Government had rather stimulated the desire to bring the question forward by the way they had dealt with the question of exemptions in their Bill. The hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts, however, proposed that personal property should be rated under the Bill, without indicating the mode by which such an object could be attained. He (Mr. Henley) confessed he was not prepared to follow the hon. Baronet into the wide field into which he had launched, and trusted that he would not divide the Committee upon it.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, in reply, said, in consequence of the misconception which had been put upon his proposal, he would ask permission to withdraw it. ["No, no!"]

MR. NEWDEGATE hoped that the Committee would allow the hon. Baronet to withdraw his proposal, the terms of which were wider than they were prepared to accept. ["No, no!"] He (Mr. Newdegate), however, was prepared to accept the principle laid down, because he thought it possible, with the income tax imposed, to render that source of taxation available for local purposes.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, if he were not allowed to withdraw his Amendment, he should take the sense of the Committee upon it; but after having assented to the appeals which had been made to him from both sides, a division now upon it would not indicate the feelings of hon. Members in respect to it. ["Divide, divide!"]

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN suggested that it was, at least, unusual to refuse an hon. Member leave to withdraw an Amendment in Committee; but if a division were desired, he suggested it should be taken on the Motion for leave to withdraw.

MR. STANSFELD expressed a hope that the Committee would assent to its withdrawal. ["No, no!"]

LORD JOHN MANNERS appealed to hon. Members on both sides of the House who were desirous of the withdrawal of the Amendment, if a division were forced upon them, to vote for the Amendment, not, as it were, agreeing to the substance of it, but as a protest against the hon. Baronet being prevented from withdrawing it. ["Divide, divide!"]

SIR GEORGE GREY expressed a hope that the Committee would allow the hon. Baronet to withdraw his proposal, as it would be very unusual under the circumstances to refuse him liberty to do so. The Rules of the House would not permit such a division as that suggested by the hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten).

COLONEL STUART KNOX moved that the Chairman report Progress rather than that the Committee should go to a division on the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Chairman report Progress."
—(Colonel Stuart Knox.)

MR. RYLANDS expressed surprise that any of his hon. Friends around him should refuse to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn.

MR. COLLINS announced his intention to move that the Chairman leave the Chair if a division were insisted on.

Motion and Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH moved, in page 1, line 22, to leave out "or for growing timber," on the ground that we had not too much of it, and that trees were not delighted in only by the owner.

MR. STANSFELD assented. It had not been the intention of the Government that single trees should be rated, but simply that plantations should not be placed on a better footing than land under tillage.

MR. YORKE asked whether hedge-row timber would be assessed; in his part of the country hedge-row timber was richer than plantation timber.

MR. STANSFELD said, that plantations only would be brought in.

MR. CLARE READ pointed out that hedge-row timber depreciated the value of the land, and the assessment committees therefore rated it lower than if the hedge-row had no timber in it. He submitted that the Amendment of which he had given Notice, after Clause 3, would much better meet the object the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire (Lord George Cavendish) had in view than the proposal he had just made. The Amendment he would propose was to provide a mode of assessing woods; plantations, timber, and game. He contended that the value of the land should be taken in its unimproved and natural condition, whether it had or had not timber upon it. If the Amendment of the noble Lord were simply adopted, the assessment committee would be at liberty to place any value they pleased upon it.

MR. FLOYER doubted whether the provision would have the effect expected of it. He therefore thought it desirable that the Committee should know what the Government thought would be the operation of that section of the Bill. Land with timber on it would not let for more, but for less than land without it. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board really meant to assess the land at a higher rate because some future owner or occupier would cut down the timber upon it, he must say so, and lay down the principle on which he intended to insist. If he did not, the matter would be governed by the Act now in force; and any Judge or assessment committee would say there was no possibility of charging anything more on the rateable value of the property because there was timber growing on it, but much less. Its value under the Parochial Assessment Act was what a tenant would give for the use of it, whilst the trees were growing on it.

MR. STANSFELD, in answer to the question whether the Bill proposed to place any higher assessment on wood land than on other lands, said, he did not anticipate any such result. On the contrary, it might well be that land occupied by a wood should be of less annual value than land not so occupied. Therefore, the rating and assessment of the wood was not in addition to the rating of the soil. The object of the Bill was to say that the soil should be rated, although it was covered with wood. It had been urged that it was impossible year by year to rate the occupier of a wood which might not be cut for many years to come. That was no objection to his proposal. That objection could be answered by the existing law and practice of this country. There was no difference in point of principle between saleable underwood and other wood—it was not necessarily cut every year, but might be cut every five, seven, 12, 20, or 30 years; and the experience of the assessment committees and the records of the Courts of Justice showed that there had been no legal or practical difficulty in rating it. He found that beech woods in Buckinghamshire were now rated under a Local Act. The Bill prescribed no new principle of rating, and therefore those beech woods would be rated under the ordinary law. In some instances woods were at present rated to the highway rate, and in others, where the owners had consented, to the poor rate. It might be also that land already in an improved state was planted with wood. He thought the Proviso of his noble Friend behind him (Lord George Cavendish), to the effect that wood land should not be assessed at a higher value than if it were not used for plantation or wood, would be better in its phraseology than other Amendments of which Notice had been given on that matter. Saleable underwood was, according to the present law and practice, rated according to an annual average spread over a whole term. That principle was fully recognized in a judgment of Lord Ellenborough. In that case, the wood was cut down every 21 years, and at the time of the rate the trees were about the middle period of their growth. The question submitted was, whether they were liable to be rated every year according to the annual average value, or when they were cut down only. The Judge said it had been urged that the property ought not to be rated until the produce had been severed from the land and supplied the occupier with the means of paying the rate; but the Court was not of opinion that any of the produce must actually be realized, but that the property was at all times rateable according to the improvement in the value or in the rent which might fairly be expected from it. In a more recent case decided in 1867 that principle was not disputed.

MR. HUNT thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board did not appreciate the difference between saleable underwood and other woods. Saleable underwood had an annual letting value, because it might be divided into sections, one section being cut down every year, the proceeds of which would meet the outgoing on the whole of the saleable underwood. But when they came to the question of timber apart from saleable underwood, there the difficulty arose, because it must be left to grow till it arrived at a marketable value, and in the meantime there would be no produce from the proceeds of which to pay the rate or other outgoings. He doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman had given that practical consideration to the subject which would enable him to assist the House in that matter. How was the tenant-for-life to be dealt with, because he would perhaps have to pay the rates during the whole of his tenancy, without getting a single shilling benefit out of the sale of the timber, which would all accrue to his remainder-man, who had not paid a farthing of rates. He thought that lands growing timber ought to be brought into assessment, but the question was how it could best be done. He thought the Government ought to take the matter into their consideration, and be prepared to lay down the rules and principles on which these lands should be assessed, and not throw the difficulty upon the local authorities.

MR. STANSFELD said, that the case which he had cited disposed of the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), because in it, Lord Ellenborough decided that growing timber was to be assessed according to what its value would be for a term of years, and not according to its annual letting value.

VISCOUNT GALWAY wished to know whether ornamental timber in parks which was of no pecuniary value to the owners was to be rated. He should like the Government to give a definition of ornamental timber.

MR. BOUVERIE pointed out that, if the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was to be accepted, nobody would give anything at all for growing timber on land on which there was neither underwood nor pasture, and consequently no rate whatever could be levied upon it. He also wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to rate land as bearing growing timber, as well as the underwood on it, because in that case the owner would have to pay double rates for the same property. If the right hon. Gentleman intended to exclude underwood, the exclusion should be expressed as "other than underwood."

MR. STANSFELD said, that of course he did not propose that the land should be subject to double rates. The property would be rated according to its average annual value over a term of years, and not according to its letting value for a single year.

MR. PAGET corroborated the statement of the right hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), with respect to the mode in which underwoods were cropped.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY pointed out that the case cited by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, had nothing to do with the present question, inasmuch as under the Parochial Assessment Act, which had been passed since that judgment of Lord Ellenborough had been pronounced, woodlands were rateable according to their annual letting value, and not according to their average annual value over a term of years. He suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should strike out of the clause the words "growing timber." To take timber from year to year would be simply absurd.

MR. STANSFELD understood the law at present to be founded on the annual value on the hypothesis of a letting simply from year to year.

MR. CAWLEY agreed in the law as stated by his right hon. Friend the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt). The correct principle was laid down in the Scotch Act, as quoted by the Secretary to the Local Government Board.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the debate should be confined to the mode in which the land should be assessed.

MR. HIBBERT stated that there was really no difficulty in rating plantations and timber as had been suggested. There had been no difficulty in regard to rating beech woods in Buckinghamshire, which, he believed, were not cut oftener than once in 30 years. A landlord converted a portion of arable into wood land, and thereby turned it out of cultivation. In Northumberland, many landlords consented to the rating of such lands under the denomination of "plantations and woods;" and he did not know that in these cases any great difficulty arose in regard to the rating.

MR. DISRAELI observed that they were generally cut every seven years.

MR. LOPES said, that underwoods were held rateable simply because they were reproductive; and there was not the slightest difficulty in applying to them the principle of the Parochial Assessment Act—namely, that of the hypothetical tenant, inasmuch as they were cut at certain fixed periods; but when they came to deal with woods and plantations, which were not reproductive, great difficulty would arise; and what he was anxious to know was how they proposed for the future to rate them. Was it proposed to treat the land as arable? He did not think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had correctly laid down the law. Since the passing of the Parochial Assessment Act he had never heard of any other system of rating woodlands than that of assessing their yearly letting value.

MR. GOLDSMID said, that considerable practical difficulty would arise in rating the underwood grown for hop-poles in the county of Kent, or land on which timber was also grown, if the Bill passed in its present form. In Kent hop-poles were cut once in 10 years. The ground was divided into ten portions, and one of these was cut every year. But there were trees growing in the plantations, oak and beech, which required the growth of 80 or 100 years; and then the danger arose of a double assessment, one for the timber, the other for the hop-poles.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE also objected to the clause as it stood.

MR. STANSFELD said, he was quite prepared to accept the Amendment of the noble Lord behind him (Lord George Cavendish).

MR. CLARE READ thought it would be better simply to repeal the Act of Elizabeth under which underwoods were rateable.

SIR HENRY HOARE joined in the suggestion of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read). He thought that woodlands should be rated at agricultural prices, and would point out that it was for the good of the country that woods were grown to protect cattle and crops.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH pointed out that under the Statute of Elizabeth saleable underwoods were rateable as saleable underwoods. If land was to be rated for plantations and for woods, why should not land be also rated for saleable underwood, and the same principle be followed throughout?

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BOUVERIE moved in page 1, line 22, after "wood" to insert "not being land used for the growth of saleable underwood."

MR. STANSFELD assented to the Amendment and expressed a hope that it would be satisfactory to the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read).

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HUNT observed that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was now present. He therefore hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would explain the case which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had previously quoted.

MR. CLARE READ said, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) would give a premium to the growth of timber with underwood.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS— CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR.

MR. DISRAELI said, it would be convenient to the House if the Government would let them know whether the adjourned debate on the Zanzibar Contract would come on on Monday?

MR. BRUCE: It is the intention of the Government to bring it on on Monday, if the Papers on the subject are printed.

AN HON. MEMBER: They are printed.

MR. DISRAELI: That being so, are we to understand that the Government will bring on the discussion early?

MR. BRUCE: The Rating Bill will be first proceeded with. I daresay, however, arrangements may be made for bringing on the Zanzibar Contract at a convenient hour.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PROTECTORATE OF FIJI.

RESOLUTION.

MR. M'ARTHUR, in rising to move—

"That, as the Chiefs of Fiji and the white residents therein have signified their desire that Great Britain should assume the protectorate or sovereignty of those Islands, it is desirable that Her Majesty's Government, in order to put an end to the condition of things now existing in the Group, should take steps to carry into effect one or other of those measures," said, that last year, in bringing this question before the House, he spoke at so much length, that it was not necessary for him now to do more than call attention to the main facts upon which he rested his case. On that occasion he pointed out that the Fiji Islands occupied one of the most important positions in the Pacific; that in the opinion of high naval authorities no better station for our ships of war was to be found in that great highway between America and Australia; that the islands were exceedingly fertile, producing all kinds of tropical fruits, and that they were the natural home of the cotton plant, which could be cultivated to almost any extent; and that so long ago as 1859, the principal chiefs offered the country to the Queen, and that that offer was declined on grounds which were now admitted to be untenable. He also pointed out the interest the Colonies took in the question, and, finally, he urged that kidnapping—that monstrous system of slavery which had grown up in the South Sea—could not be extirpated unless Fiji, the great centre of traffic, were placed under the protection of the British flag. The events of the past 12 months had confirmed his belief that the course he recommended was the right one. He complained of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in reference to this question. It was unworthy of a great country to endeavour to shift the responsibility on to other shoulders and to ask the Government of New South Wales to take either the Protectorate or the Sovereignty of these islands. In acknowledging the de facto Government of Fiji also, and the right of British subjects to throw off their allegiance and to form themselves into an independent State, the advisers of the Queen would be admitting a principle at once dangerous and unprecedented and subversive of the interests of Imperial legislation. Such a course, moreover, would be dangerous to the interests of the native population, who would in that way be left to the mercy of mere adventurers. There had recently been laid on the Table of the House an able and statesmanlike Paper in which Sir James Martin put this view most clearly and strongly, urging that the recognition by the Imperial Government of an independent State formed by a mere handful of British subjects in a group of islands numbering 146,000 native inhabitants would be highly inexpedient. Sir James Martin's view was, that Her Majesty's Government would be perfectly justified in at once establishing a Sovereignty or Protectorate in the islands. It would be in the recollection of the House, that last year the ground taken by the Government was, that no official intimation had been given by the authorities of Fiji of a desire to be annexed to Great Britain, and the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the

Colonies declared that nothing like a formal offer had been made on the part of the islands, that Her Majesty's Government should assume authority over them. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister also said that the Government ought not to be compelled to force the Fiji Islands to become annexed to this country, no evidence of any such desire having been manifested. Now, in 1871 a Memorial had been agreed to by the King, the principal Chiefs, and White residents, praying that the British Government would grant Fiji protection for 10, 15, or 20 years, so that the native Chiefs might have time to create a form of government analogous to that of the Sandwich Islands. The Memorial, which was addressed to Earl Granville, concluded with the following prayer:—"In the event of the Government entertaining this Petition, your Lordships' memorialists pledge themselves to acknowledge all the obligations which the Government deem it wise and necessary to impose." That Memorial was signed by the King, by Mafus, and two others of the principal Chiefs, representing the entire native population of the island. That Memorial was sent to the Foreign Office, and while he exonerated the two right hon. Gentlemen respectively from any desire to lead the House astray, yet the conduct of the Foreign Office was very much to be blamed. A document so important should have received an answer. It was similar conduct on the part of the Foreign Office which offended King Theodore and led to the Abyssinian War, which cost the country several millions of money. Had Theodore's letter been answered, that expedition would not have been necessary. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister told the House that Her Majesty's Government would not annex any territory, without a well-understood wish on the part of the people, authenticated by the best means which the case afforded. That statement, coupled with a similar remark made by the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, was regarded as a pledge, that if the great majority of the people of Fiji were desirous of annexation, the British Government were prepared to accede to their wishes. Since the Petition sent to the Foreign Office in 1871, the feeling had intensified throughout the whole of the islands. Besides the expression of feeling in the Fijian Press in favour of annexation, there was abundance of other evidence which pointed in the same direction. He might refer to the authority of Mr. Thurston, the "Prime Minister of Fiji," who stated that it was his opinion and that of the majority of the settlers, that annexation was a necessity, and that native Government was an impossibility. So strong was the feeling in all the islands in favour of annexation, and in regard to the powerlessness of the native Government to enforce order, that many of the Members of the Legislature unfavourable to annexation had been asked to resign. A Memorial had been got up in Fiji, which was expected to arrive by the last mail, and which was being signed by all the White inhabitants of Fiji. It was from Her Britannic Majesty's subjects and others resident in Fiji, likewise addressed to Earl Granville, and was in favour of annexation to Great Britain. The Memorial dwelt upon the increasing supplies of cotton, the fertility of the soil, the growth of tobacco, and the undeveloped resources of the Fijian Archipelago. The petitioners went on to state that the friendly feeling frequently expressed by a large section of the aborigines towards Her Majesty's subjects in Fiji, and the regard they entertained for Great Britain and the Queen, indisputably proved the strength of the wide-spread affection of the Fijians for the British people. Further, they stated that the United States had recently taken possession of an island belonging to the Navigator's Group, which, from its proximity to our Australian Colonies and New Zealand, might, under certain complications, be menacing to British commerce in the Pacific Ocean. That was an additional reason why the Fiji Islands should be forthwith included in Her Majesty's dominions. The petitioners also urged the advantages afforded by Fijian waters for the establishment of a permanent naval station, and in connection with it a Vice Admiralty Court, which would be the means of placing the labour trade on a basis of beneficent security. The Petition proved, to quote the language of the Prime Minister, that there existed in Fiji "a well-understood wish for annexation, frequently expressed and authenticated by the best means the case will afford." Under those circumstances he (Mr. M'Arthur) asked Her Majesty's Government to fulfil the implied pledge they gave last year, that on ascertaining the wish of the inhabitants they would be prepared to take this question into consideration with a view to annexation. Turning next to the political aspect of the question, he had no hesitation in expressing his belief that, considering their geographical position, the Fiji Islands were as important to us in the Pacific Ocean as Malta was in the Mediterranean. Captain Washington said in his Report—

"In looking over the subject, I have been struck by the entire want by Great Britain of any advanced position in the Pacific Ocean. We have valuable possessions on either side, as at Vancouver's Island and Sydney, but not an island or rock on the 7,000 miles of ocean which separates them. We have no island on which to place a coaling station so that we might get fresh supplies."

Similar opinions had been expressed at the colonial conferences held in Melbourne and Sydney. With regard to the commercial advantages it was obviously important for us to have a station on the great highway between British Columbia and San Francisco on the one side, and Australia on the other. The exports and imports of Fiji had steadily increased, their value being $50,000 in 1869; $90,000 in 1870; upwards of $120,000 in 1871; and upwards of $300,000 in 1872. Moreover, that country, which lately was so deeply degraded by the most dreadful crimes, now contained a population advancing in education, civilization, and Christianity. An official statement, made by Mr. Clarkson, the treasurer of the Government in Fiji, showed that the population of the islands numbered 150,000, of whom about 2,000 were Whites; that there were in the islands 611 chapels, 1,389 schools, with 45,243 scholars, while the number of attendants at public worship was 107,250. He regarded all that as a remarkable fact, in connection with the history of the Fiji Islands; and he felt sure that if they gave those islands a strong Government, capital would flow in, people would resort there, and they would add to the dignity and strength of the Empire. With regard to the philanthropic view of the question, he believed it would be utterly impossible for any Government to put down the slave trade in the Pacific Ocean, unless those islands were placed under the protection of the British flag. To show the character of that infamous traffic, he would cite the testimony of Captain Palmer, who stated that on one of the islands slaves were flogged, Cayenne pepper was applied to the wounds, and a toe of one of them was cut off. The Reports of two officers in Her Majesty's service, Captain Palmer and Captain Markham, showed that a traffic in natives, which was really a slave trade, was carried on, natives being torn from their homes and often brutally treated by men calling themselves Englishmen. According to Vice Consul March, girls—sometimes only 13 or 14 years of age—were bartered and sold to planters in the most disgraceful way, the settlers regarding this as a normal and inevitable state of things. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) had, it seemed, an Amendment on the Paper, to the effect that any attempt on the part of Great Britain to assume the Protectorate or Sovereignty of the Fiji Islands, by suppressing the de facto Government of Fiji, would be contrary to public policy, and an unjustifiable interference with the rights of an independent people; but he (Mr. M'Arthur) contended that it was unnecessary, from the fact that the existing Government, though more respectable than its predecessor, was not recognized by the majority, either of the White or Black population, and it was unable to enforce the law, to prevent the slave trade, or to repress scenes of turbulence and bloodshed. A requisition to one of the Representatives, asking him to resign, in order that the country might come under the protection of England, stated that self-government had been a signal failure, that the country was deluged with worthless Treasury notes; and that the price of many articles had doubled; while in complying with the requisition, that Gentleman said he endorsed all its statements. As to the objection that a large expense would be involved in annexation, he denied that it would throw any charge on the Imperial Revenue. The requisite officials would not cost more than £6,000 a-year, and a small Native Force with one or two gunboats at the Governor's disposal would suffice, while the Treasurer, Mr. Clarkson, anticipated a Revenue of not less than £30,000, and believed in two years it would reach £100,000. Considering, moreover, that, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, £250,000 had been spent in five years in putting down the East African Slave Trade, and that the men-of-war now stationed in the Pacific were unable to suppress a similar traffic, it would be an economical measure to take possession of Fiji. Colonel (now Major General) Smythe, who, when sent to report on the matter, gave an opinion adverse to annexation, now admitted that it did not apply to the existing circumstances. He stated that the condition of affairs had undergone such a change that he was now of opinion that our best course would be to accept the offer of the Sovereignty of the group which had been made by the Chiefs. He was glad to find that a communication had been made to the Government by the Government of Fiji through Mr. Thurston, in which that gentleman stated that he had been officially authorized by the King to put the question of cession direct to Her Majesty's Government, and if they were willing to entertain it the Fijian Government would make a proposition to them. That Paper the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had promised to lay on the Table of the House in a day or so, and he trusted our Government would duly consider the matter. In concluding his remarks, he (Mr. M'Arthur) wished to make a personal appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. Last year the right hon. Gentleman did not express himself as hostile to the spirit of the Resolution; but he deprecated premature or precipitate action before circumstances made the duty of the country perfectly clear. They had waited a whole year, which was surely sufficient time for deliberation. In the space of that year new outrages had taken place. Slave ships had scoured the South Seas in search of their human prey. Slavery practised by Christian Englishmen had fastened its roots more deeply in the soil of Fiji, and the best and most orderly of our countrymen, with the full sympathy of the native chiefs, had again and yet again prayed the mother country to give them the blessing of a stable government based upon just laws. The right hon. Gentleman had filled the office of Colonial Minister. He was therefore no stranger to the traditions of that office, and to the glorious history of our colonial dominion. He knew that the Motion accorded with the best of those traditions, and with a just view of both the interests and duty of the nation. Would he then take upon himself the responsibility of a further policy of delay—a policy of ignoble timidity and vacillation—a policy which would perpetuate in the year to come, as it had done in the year that was past, those crimes and outrages which Her Majesty in her Speech from the Throne had so fervently deplored? Our representatives in Fiji and Australia had done their duty, while public opinion both there and at home had urged the Imperial Government to perform its duty. It, therefore, remained for the right hon. Gentleman to decide whether he would allow the present state of things to remain, or whether he would realize the legitimate wishes of his countrymen, and by accepting the annexation of Fiji, open out new fields for British commerce and British enterprise, and thus add another to those magnificent colonies in the southern hemisphere which had contributed so largely to the wealth, the prosperity, and the power of the British Empire. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD, in seconding the Resolution, observed that the propositions made to our Government by the inhabitants of Fiji had been for either annexation or a protectorate. He should support the Resolution in the sense of annexation, for he knew what that was, but he could not tell what a protectorate really involved. For his own part, he had no confidence in the present White Government of Fiji, as the Members of it were participators in the slave trade and slave owners. This had been stated from the bench of the Supreme Court in Sydney. He referred to the horrors of the bloodstained ship Carl, and the murders which had been committed on the natives who had been caught and imprisoned in the hold and fired upon; a Member of the Government being the consignee of the cargo, and having actually disposed of the survivors at a commission of 5 per cent. At that moment one-half of the Whites repudiated their authority; so much so, that the Government had been obliged to ask for assistance from Her Majesty's ships to reduce the Whites to obedience. The Premier Woods had been dismissed, first of all, from Her Majesty's Navy, and then from the Australian Navy; and another Member, Smith, was the owner of one of the most notorious slave ships the Nukulau. The effect of the policy of treating the Fijian Government as an independent de facto Government had tied the hands of our naval commanders, had weakened the authority of our Consul, and had lowered the dignity of Her Majesty's Representative in New South Wales. The Governor of New South Wales had recognized Woods as Premier, and he had been remonstrated with by his responsible advisers for doing so; and it had been also decided that the jurisdiction of the Australian Courts might be exercised in the case of British subjects who complained of acts of violence if they declined to recognize this Fijian Government and its Courts of Law. He trusted that the exertions made by the Consul March to put down the slave traffic and to bring to justice those who had been engaged in the recent massacre were appreciated by Her Majesty's Government. Had Mr. Consul March truckled to the de facto Government of Fiji, he might now be a prosperous plantation owner; but he did not. On the contrary, he risked his own life in the endeavour to bring the guilty parties to justice, and in this effort he had succeeded. His acts in that respect had incurred for him the bitter hostility of the Fijian Government, and apparently had brought him into bad odour with our own Government, as he had been transferred to a part of Brazil where two of his predecessors had lost their health. Such a proceeding on the part of the Government was not very likely to encourage British Consuls to interest themselves in putting down the slave traffic. He supported the Resolution, mainly because he believed that annexation was the only way in which this traffic which brought such reproach on the British name could be put a stop to. He did not see with what justice or consistency the English Government could force the Sultan to put down the slave trade at Zanzibar, while they permitted an equally bad slave trade to be carried on in those islands, almost entirely in British ships and by British subjects, when they could effectually suppress it without spending a shilling of money, and with the entire approval of the English people. The native inhabitants had now asked on two separate occasions that the Government of the Queen should assume the Protectorate of their territory; the de facto Government had applied to them very recently to the same effect; and under those circumstances the objections urged to the Resolution being thus removed—he trusted Her Majesty's Government would accept and the House adopt the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as the Chiefs of Fiji and the white residents therein have signified their desire that Great Britain should assume the protectorate or sovereignty of those Islands, it is desirable that Her Majesty's Government, in order to put an end to the condition of things now existing in the Group, should take steps to carry into effect one or other of those measures,"—(Mr. M^r Arthur),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GLADSTONE said, with every respect for the abilities and character of his hon. Friend who had seconded the Motion (Sir Charles Wingfield), he could not but regret some of the statements he had made. With one portion of his speech he fully concurred—namely, that which referred to the course adopted by Mr. Consul March. That part of the speech he thought he could deal with in a way that would be satisfactory to his hon. Friend, for he might at once dismiss from his mind the apprehension that the services of that gentleman were, by anything they had done, attempted to be at all depreciated by Her Majesty's Government. On account of changing circumstances, it was deemed wise by the Secretary of State that Mr. March should receive another appointment, and he had been removed to another post, which did not greatly differ in point of emolument from that in the Fiji Islands, although the salary was somewhat higher than that he enjoyed there, and it was not necessary to construe the transfer as involving any censure upon Mr. March. As to the other part of the personal matter, he felt a still stronger regret. His hon. Friend had catalogued the Members of the Government of the Fiji Islands, and had described them as men engaged in the slave traffic, as men tainted with crime, and degraded with dishonour. ["Hear, hear!"] That he found was cheered; but it was a serious matter that at this end of the world, at the opposite point of the diameter, and in a House where there was no one to meet the charge, they should be set down as men who ought to be standing at the bar of a criminal Court. That was, he repeated, a very serious matter, and not consistent with that equity and fairness which required that they should not enter upon criticisms of that kind upon the character and conduct of gentlemen—or if that term were objectionable—of persons who were not present to defend themselves. It would have been desirable that his hon. Friend, before he so blackened the character of these men in a speech which would go forth to the world, and when weeks and months would elapse before they would have an opportunity of replying, should have given some Notice of his intention, so that some inquiry on the subject might have been made in the country itself to see if there were a unanimity of testimony in support of his statement. Of course, he (Mr. Gladstone) could not say that they were not engaged in the slave trade; but accounts which reached the Government from persons, probably not less trustworthy than those who informed his hon. Friend, were by no means so unfavourable to the character of the persons composing the Government of the Fiji Islands. He meant Naval officers who commanded the ships of Her Majesty in those waters, and they did not find generally in the proceedings of the Fiji Government a disposition to render nugatory the measures for the prevention of the abuses and cruelties of the labour traffic. One of those gentlemen was Mr. Thurston, whom his hon. Friend had by implication severely stigmatized as an accomplice of those men. He sat in the Cabinet; he was Premier, and succeeded another Premier; Premiers were dismissed in that hemisphere as well as in this. Another gentleman was Mr. St. Julian, who filled the office of Vice Consul on behalf of Australia in the Fiji Islands for some time—a person who enjoyed general respect, as he believed was the case also with Mr. Thurston. Far be it from him to assert that every one of those gentlemen was immaculate in the absence of distinct information; but, in the absence of distinctive information, he hoped some reserve would be shown in endorsing a sweeping and indiscriminate condemnation of men who had not the opportunity of securing anyone to defend them in that House. He came now to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth (Mr. M'Arthur), which was a matter requiring great thought and care, and while premising that there was much of abstract opinion contained in it which he was not prepared to adopt, he thought it would be well if he stated where he agreed with, and where he differed from, the hon. Gentleman; but at the outset he would assure him Her Majesty's Government did not propose to treat the matter either in a negative spirit or with indifference. The hon. Gentleman's speech divided itself into three branches—the territorial, the commercial, the philanthropic, and incidentally, the financial. He would not follow him into the territorial part of the question, but he would observe that in his experience there was nothing more popular with the House, or with that portion of the House who felt a lively interest in this class of questions, than speeches tending to incite and encourage the Government towards the annexation of new territory; nothing was easier than to make out a plausible case for appropriations of this kind, and nothing was more acceptable; the hon. Member's heart must have been cheered by the warm expressions of approval which accompanied those portions of his speech in which he insisted on the advantages of enlarging the territory of this country; but, he must add, nothing in the world so much excited the odium, suspicion, and displeasure of the same portion of the House as the manifestation in any other country of a similar disposition. Now, he commended to all the philosophers of the 19th century, and to all practical politicians, the desirability of having one and the same measure of justice for ourselves and for other people. It might be the chill of age which was coming upon him; but he confessed he did not feel that excitement for the acquisition of new territory which animated the hon. Gentleman, especially as, with all the efforts which Parliament made to meet the wants of the territories we already governed, the arrears were accumulating in advance of the most persevering efforts they could make. Similarly, with respect to commerce, we had, by asserting the principle of liberty in trade, opened the world to the commerce of Great Britain to such a degree that our ingenuity, enterprise, skill, manual power, and machinery were scarcely able to cope with expanding opportunities; and, under those circumstances, he could afford to say he did not feel the great pressure of the argument for securing particular guarantees for our commerce in this distant part of the world. England had mounted so high by the assertion of sound principles of trade, and had felt so greatly the advantages resulting to themselves and the whole world from them, that they did not feel the pressure of the argument which had been used in favour of this country acquiring the commerce of the distant islands of the world. When the hon. Gentleman referred to not allowing Australia to interfere with the commerce of the Fiji Islands, he would ask him whether he knew what was going on in Australia at this time. The hon. Gentleman said it would be of immense importance to us to prevent the commerce of the Fiji Islands with this country being restricted; but the hon. Gentleman should remember what Parliament had been doing this Session. They had passed a measure enabling the Australian Colonies to restrict their commerce by creating differential duties between themselves; and it would be difficult to confine the operation of that measure to those colonies. He now came to what he regarded as by far the most important part of the speech of the hon. Gentleman—namely, that which he had called, in no taunting spirit, the philanthropic part of the speech. As he agreed in the main with what the hon. Gentleman said as to the deplorable nature of some of the occurrences which happened in the region of Fiji, it was not necessary to follow the speech in detail; but he desired to say that both he and his Colleagues felt very strongly the importance of that country taking all proper and reasonable steps in order to put an end to a state of things in which British subjects, removing themselves from the territorial jurisdiction of the Home or Colonial Governments, planted themselves in a region of the earth having no political relation with us, and defiled that region by what was, either avowedly or virtually, a traffic in human flesh, with its usual accompaniments of moral degradation and physical cruelty. This country had endeavoured to prevent that traffic in human flesh, and had made it a part of its duty to diminish in that respect the woes of mankind, and therefore the hon. Gentleman would understand that he did not deny that what had taken place in the Fiji Islands was a serious matter and would call for the careful consideration of the Government. He did not deny that the hon. Gentleman was right in basing certain expectations on remarks which fell from himself and his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) in the course of the debate last year, but he desired that those expectations should be well understood. The hon. Gentleman said it was declared or implied in those speeches that, in the event of a clearly-expressed and well-authenticated wish for annexation to England on the part of the White and native populations of Fiji, Her Majesty's Government would proceed to annex the islands. Let him in the first place consider whether, according to the statements of the hon. Gentleman, the condition had at the present moment been fulfilled. The hon. Gentleman said the Government of Fiji had already made an application for annexation, and that there was now on its way to England a Petition to the same effect signed by the natives; but would he say further that in that state of things the case was ripe for the specific step which he called upon the Government to take? He did not think that view could be held, even if the hon. Mover and Seconder of the proposition under discussion possessed a tolerably good opinion of the Government of the islands, which was not however the case, so far, at any rate, as the hon. Seconder of the Motion was concerned. It had been stated further that the Government was entirely powerless, and was not recognized by the majority of the people. If that was so, what weight or authority could attach to its declaration when made the basis of a demand for annexation to the British Crown? How much weight and authority could also be attached to a Petition, which had not yet arrived, emanating from such a Government? In the absence of precise information on the subject, he could not enter into a controversy with regard to it, but he recommended the point to the consideration of the hon. Gentleman. There had been cases in which the Government of Fiji had struggled successfully in the cause of right and justice; but it might also be that they preserved a little indulgence for their own personal views and predilections. Then, with regard to the Petition which was said to be on its way to this country, it was not as yet known by whom the document was signed, and, in the absence of information on the subject, he did not think the House should be asked to adopt a proposal of so definitive and conclusive a character as that now before the House. The Government would, however, take steps to procure such accurate information as would enable them to cope with the difficulties under which they undertook to investigate a complicated question at the other end of the world. At the commencement of his speech the hon. Gentleman contended that it was a most dangerous doctrine to lay down that British subjects might by withdrawing themselves from the British Empire, throw off their allegiance, become de facto Governments in other lands, and claim to treat with England as independent States. There was a great difficulty in the way of any such admission, but did the hon. Gentleman close his eyes to the difficulty on the other side? Were they, because they admitted the difficulty which had been pointed out, to rush to the extreme of declaring that wherever any body of British subjects, in the use of the personal liberty provided by the law, transported themselves into a foreign land, and became an important community, the British Government was bound to follow, and establish a dominion over them? The hon. Gentleman surely would not make any such monstrous assertion, for if one doctrine was dangerous the other was little short of absurd. Under those circumstances, the Government were taking what appeared to them to be the rational and only real means of making progress in the handling of the question by instituting a responsible and trustworthy inquiry into the facts which bore upon the conduct of the case in all its essential particulars. The hon. Gentleman had studied and learnt much with regard to the question of Fiji, and he (Mr. Gladstone) hardly knew how to express the sentiment with which he heard the statement that a population of about 140,000 natives and some 2,000

Whites produced 107,000 attendants upon Divine worship.

Mr. M'ARTHUR said, he made the statement on the authority of Mr. Clarkson, one of the missionaries engaged in the islands.

Mr. GLADSTONE did not dispute the accuracy of the statement; he only felt surprised to hear that the Fiji Islands furnished a larger proportion of attendants on Divine worship than any country in Christendom. The hon. Gentleman would admit that there were a great many other points connected with this question upon which it was absolutely necessary to obtain further information before any decisive step was taken. He would not say that the experience of New Zealand had been unsatisfactory; but he would say that even in that case, it would have been desirable to have obtained a clearer view beforehand of the responsibilities England was about to undertake, than they actually possessed at the time when the annexation occurred. They ought to have known that they were about to be involved in a charge of about £10,000,000 for military expenditure, and in all the waste and destruction of life and property which the expenditure involved. There was no country in which missionary labour had been so zealous, prolonged, and successful as New Zealand when we annexed it, yet many of the difficulties which had since occurred in New Zealand might have been avoided if the Home Government had had a more careful investigation of the circumstances in New Zealand, before they finally took it upon themselves. Therefore, the Government were desirous—and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would join in that desire—to profit by their past experience, and not to commit the same errors with regard to the territory of Fiji which they had committed with regard to New Zealand. It appeared to them necessary that they should consider a number of points which he would briefly run over, and that there would be a variety of courses open. They did not agree with those who thought that the alternative should be absolutely cast aside, of using the Government actually established in the Fiji Islands as the instrument of governing the country. It was clear that if it could be done, and if the philanthropic measures of the hon. Gentleman could be attained through that measure, it was the best measure of attainment. If the Government really warranted the character given of it by the hon. Member who seconded the Motion, it would be by no means desirable to make use of that Government; on the other hand if the Fiji Government were shown to be one of tolerable capacity, if it exercised a tolerable amount of authority, and if it had the power of adapting itself to the wants of the people, these would be great recommendations. That Government had, however, one great recommendation in its favour—namely, that it had sprung out of the soil, it had its roots in the soil, it was born upon the spot, and it had made a certain though limited way towards the true character of a Government. The House must not suppose that he meant that it was a Government which they could treat as if it were a recognized Government in a civilized country. His hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth said, that Her Majesty's Government had recognized the Government of Fiji. They had, however, only recognized it as a de facto Government. His hon. Friend had illustrated his argument by referring to the Government of Spain, our recognition of which, he said, was equivalent to a full and unlimited recognition. If his hon. Friend would ask any of the gentlemen who formed the present Government of Spain, whether our recognition of that as a de facto Government was equivalent to a full international recognition, he would find himself undeceived. Every country drew an important distinction between that mere unofficial recognition of a Government—a thing which existed for the moment and for the necessary transaction of business, and a free and formal recognition of one independent and civilized State on the part of another. Such a recognition might be given to the Fiji Government, but only on certain conditions. It would first be necessary to ascertain that it would be practicable through the means of the Government, and by distinct covenants with it, to obtain practical securities for putting down the abuses now complained of. That would be the first question which it would be the duty of the Government to examine. Another method of proceeding which had been recommended and might be taken was to arm the British Representative in the Fiji Islands with a personal jurisdiction over British subjects, supported, of course, by adequate means for its enforcement, and arranged, as it must be, with the goodwill of the local authorities. He would not give any opinion as to the preference between one mode or the other at the present time, because a thorough and impartial examination was the duty which the circumstances of the moment imposed upon the Government. The third method of proceeding was, that which his hon. Friend had embodied in his Motion, but which his Seconder had thrown overboard—the assumption of a Protectorate in Fiji. He (Mr. Gladstone) would not venture to throw overboard that method of proceeding; but he thought there was, however, great force in the objection that that would involve the responsibility of annexation. Lastly came the proposal of annexation itself. That was a very large question, involving many consequences deserving of careful consideration, and requiring special examination of its own. For example, if these islands were to be annexed they would present to us, in the most aggravated form, the difficulty arising from marked differences of race, which occurred already in some of our colonial possessions. Where the superior race was very large in numbers, and the less developed and less civilized race were small, the difficulty was little felt. In Porto Rico, for example, although there was a very large number of negroes—now, happily, no longer slaves—yet the number of Whites was extremely large in comparison, and the slave emancipation had been effected without difficulty. Jamaica was not like Porto Rico. The Whites were very small in number in Jamaica compared with the less developed race. There had been a struggle to maintain free institutions from 1834 to 1864. Yet the Imperial Parliament had been reluctantly compelled to give up the attempt, and establish a Government which was no longer founded on the principles of liberty and representation. Fiji contained a population variously computed at 140,000, 160,000, and 200,000. Among the native Blacks were perhaps not more than 2,000 Whites, made up of several nationalities, although Englishmen were in the majority. Among these white settlers were men who were the agents in transactions almost more disgraceful than the avowed and open slave trade. How serious then were the political questions which opened to view. Could such a country be governed on the principles of freedom? Were the people to be allowed a share in the Government, and what was the share to be? The contention of the Government, and which he believed that public opinion would approve, was that no final step should be taken until after the Government had obtained the fullest knowledge on this question. With regard to the question of finance, he thought the estimates of his hon. Friend were too sanguine. He (Mr. Gladstone) knew of no country where 140,000 or 160,000 people were governed at an expense of £7,000 a-year. But that was a matter for examination, and another matter for inquiry was the demand likely to be made upon this country for the maintenance of a standing military force in these islands. This was a question not only of expense but of policy. For years past successive Governments in this country had laboured to correct the vicious system of dispersing the Army of England in little knots over the face of the world, to be exhausted in barren and worse than barren conflicts with aboriginal tribes in uncivilized countries. There must be no risk of anything like the recommencement of such a policy here; and it was important therefore to consider by what means the peace of the Fiji Islands was to be maintained. Would a military force be necessary, or could the natives themselves preserve the peace of the islands by something like a civil or a police force? An immense object would be gained, morally and socially, if we could find among the native population the means of maintaining order. The question was one upon which no positive opinion could at present be passed; but what was known as to the character of considerable numbers of the natives did not exclude the hope that their services might be made available, in case it should be the duty of the British Government to provide for the future tranquillity of these islands. No doubt, something must be done to put a stop to the abuses which his hon. Friend had assailed, and that something must be determined by the exercise of the best judgment of the Government. As yet, however, they knew next to nothing about the interior of the Fiji Islands, the character of the islanders, or to what extent the authority of the King and of the two Chiefs who had joined him extended in comparison with the entire population. Above all, we knew nothing of that vital question—the tenure and occupation of the land. It was defective knowledge on the subject in New Zealand which involved us in all our difficulties there. We must not again fall into that error, but must ascertain in Fiji how land was held and inherited, and in what way land could be lawfully and peaceably acquired by Europeans. For the purposes of inquiry on these points the Government had secured the services of two trustworthy and competent men. One was a naval officer of distinction, Captain Goodenough, who had just sailed for Wellington, New Zealand, from which point or from Sydney he would take his start in company with his coadjutor in the inquiry. There was no profession the habits of which produced in the minds of those who held command in it greater readiness for practical dealing with affairs than the Navy. Captain Goodenough, moreover, was known for general activity, intelligence, and resources; and to the prospect of his aid in the case, the Government looked with satisfaction. His coadjutor was the brother to our Minister at Madrid (Mr. Consul Layard), who had been appointed Consul at Fiji, and only waited his instructions to proceed by the mail route to Australia, so that in the autumn of this year these two gentlemen would apply themselves to their task and would prosecute it with all the despatch which was compatible with thoroughness of execution. He hoped his hon. Friend would concur in the course taken by the Government, who were sensible of the gravity of the subject and anxious to deal with it to the satisfaction of the House and the country.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, he was glad to observe that the valuable services of Mr. Consul March were recognized by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, but he must appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether those services had not been very ill requited by his country. It was admitted that Mr. March had rendered great service, and his reward had been to be recalled from Fiji and nominally promoted, but the promotion was to the pestilential climate of Para, and the inference was that his conduct had not been approved by the Government. Laudatur et alget, and he would submit to the House whether the inference drawn would not be that Mr. March who had rendered such services to humanity had not been recalled because he was disliked by the slave traders of Fiji. He should be one of the last persons to recommend any increase of territory by improper means; but there need be no such means here; and these islands would form a most valuable station for naval purposes, and also for effecting the suppression of the slave trade. He hoped the Government would avail themselves of any opportunity to put an end to that horrible traffic, and that the House would pause before they rejected the Motion.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, he would only make a few common-sense remarks in support of the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth (Mr. M'Arthur). He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), in thinking that we were not bound to interfere in cases where English colonists had settled in distant parts of the world. Not a century had elapsed since we took possession of Australia for our own selfish purposes, and now that those purposes were more than served, it would be the most contemptible policy to repudiate the responsibilities arising from our having changed the whole face of a large portion of the globe. It would have been wrong on the part of any Government to ignore the existence of these colonists, but if our own sense of duty did not point out the course which we should pursue, then Foreign Governments would have the right to claim from us the regulation of the proceedings of our subjects who had gone to these islands. There could be no doubt that a trade was carried on which would in olden times have been called a slave trade, and that the Government of Fiji was formed upon slave-trading principles; and that was clearly shown in proceedings which had taken place in Criminal Courts in reference to vessels which had carried on this illegal trade. Last year, it appeared 2,300 Polynesians were introduced into the Fiji Islands, for the return of whom to their homes, bonds for £7,000 were demanded from the planters by the Government. This amount was nearly equal to £3 a man, and could it be supposed that so small a penalty would be efficacious in accomplishing its object? The Government of Fiji was not only founded on the slave trade system, but was carrying on a traffic which, if carried on in Arab dhows, would be slave dealing, but which, being conducted through British ships, was called labour traffic. With respect to domestic slavery, last year Thakombau, with the assistance of the White settlers, had surrounded and made prisoners of the whole of the Livoni tribe, whom he afterwards disposed of to different planters. His informant had purchased the labour of men of that tribe for £3 for five years, £3 10s. for women, and 30s. for children. So much on the subject of slavery. There were strong reasons for connecting the former Fiji Government with this traffic. It was impossible for the present Government to properly regulate it, as it was not strong enough to do so, and consequently it could not insist on the men being returned to their homes after their term of service had expired. The land in Fiji was also disposed of in a most unsatisfactory way, and he had instances before him in which Members of the Government had played into each other's hands in making the grants, coolly disposing of them in fee simple—a tenure unknown to barbarous nations. If the British nation were to protect the rights of those unfortunate islanders, the only thing to do would be to establish some strong restrictive Government amongst those lawless Whites, otherwise, he believed that the tragedies of New Zealand would be repeated in Fiji. He desired to say, however, that he had not alluded in any way to the regulated coloured traffic which was carried on in Queensland; and in conclusion he hoped that the exertions of Consul March would be so recognized by Her Majesty's Government as to prevent the Fijians from believing that his removal was connected with the displeasure of the Home Government at his conduct.

MR. EASTWICK thought that the proposal of the Government ought not to be accepted; but before referring to that he wished first to speak of the services of Mr. March. He must remind the House that that gentleman was a most distinguished officer before he went to Fiji. He had, when Vice Consul at

Admiral Erskine

St. Sebastian, in 1867, performed one of the most gallant exploits ever recorded in saving life at sea. On the night of the 7th of December in that year the French ship Nouveau Caboteur was cast on shore in the Bay of Zurriola during a frightful tempest. The sea was running so high that no one would venture to attempt to swim to the vessel, whereupon Mr. March plunged in alone and brought a rope from the ship to the shore, by which the crew were saved. One of them, however, a lad, lost his hold, fell into the sea, and sank; whereupon Mr. March, though benumbed with cold and exhausted with his former efforts, again plunged in, dived, and succeeded in bringing the boy to land. For this noble exploit he received the Albert Medal of the First Class, the French Imperial Gold Medal de Sauvetage, and the Humane Society's Medal of the First Class. In his endeavours to put down the slave trade at Fiji, his life was more than once exposed to imminent danger, insomuch that the respectable inhabitants of Levuka enrolled themselves in a Volunteer rifle corps to protect him. The life of his child also was attempted by a ruffian, who hurled a huge stone at it, but luckily missed. The same ruffian, encouraged by the support of the so-called Government at Levuka, actually spat in the face of the Consul in public; and received for that brutal outrage at the hands of Consul March the chastisement he deserved. And now, after doing so much to stop the traffic in slaves, Mr. March had been removed in the midst of his useful career. That was a most impolitic step, and the source of triumph and gratification to all the dealers in slaves. It was said by our Government to be done with kind intentions to Mr. March; but the first result was a frightful calamity to him, for both his wife and child had died on their way home. It was, indeed, a strange kindness to remove a deserving officer and send him to a pestilential climate, where his last predecessor but one, Mr. Hemans, had not long since died. He trusted the Government would revise their kind intentions, and bestow on Mr. March a post more suited to his merit. He would come now to the proposal of the Prime Minister, which was simply one for further inquiry. But there had been sufficient inquiry already, and what was wanted now was not inquiry but action. Mr. Pritchard, our first Consul at Levuka, came to England in February, 1859, with a proposal from Thakombau, who called himself King of Fiji, with a proposal to cede the whole group to Her Majesty. In 1860, Colonel Smythe, R.A., was sent out to make inquiry respecting this proposal. He found that Thakombau was only one of the principal Chiefs, and not really King of the group; but that the other Chiefs were also desirous of becoming subjects of the British Crown. Colonel Smythe reported against accepting the cession; but the reasons he gave for this course were so insufficient, so puerile in fact, that they were evidently a mere cloak to conceal the real reason. That reason was that the cession involved a payment of $45,000 to the United States, which it was not in accordance with the dignity of the British Government to make. The claim for this payment arose in 1847, when the United States Consul in giving a salute set fire to the thatch of his house, which was burned to the ground. The natives, under pretence of rendering assistance, carried off some of the Consul's things, worth probably less than £200; but the claim was gradually magnified to $45,000, and Thakombau was so alarmed by the menaces of the United States Government, that he offered to cede the islands to the English provided they would pay the money for him. This would have been unadvisable, and no doubt Colonel Smythe was right in declining to recommend such a step. But things were now altered, and the cession no longer involved disagreeable consequences. It had also become more requisite to assume the government of the group, as in no other way could the objectionable Government which had been set up by Thakombau be put an end to. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Member for Lambeth would not accept the proposal for inquiry, but take the opinion of the House upon it.

MR. KINNAIRD also considered that the time for further inquiry had passed, and for this reason, that Her Majesty's Government had urged the Government of Australia to do the very thing which they were now themselves asked to do. The Government ought not, he thought, to leave this duty to any Colonial Government, but to do it themselves. If his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth (Mr. M'Arthur) pressed his Motion to a Division, he should certainly support him.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Government had not, as the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down alleged, discouraged the Australian colonies in their wish to put down the slave trade.

MR. KINNAIRD: I stated quite the contrary, and that the Government had sought to throw upon the colonies a duty which it ought to undertake itself.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the House was not in possession of the expression on the part of the Fijian Chiefs or the White residents of their desire to be annexed, and that the document before them emanated from the Government, the authority of which hon. Members disputed. He agreed that nothing could be worse than to allow the present state of things in Fiji to continue. Either it would be necessary to have some distinct understanding with the authorities there, that a state of things which was perfectly intolerable should be put an end to; or that other steps should be taken; but the Government felt that if they desired at that moment that annexation should take place, they had not the slightest information before them as to the disposition of the Fijians, or as to the terms upon which they would consent to be annexed. He hoped the House would agree, therefore, that further information was necessary, and in the meantime they were not indifferent to the state of things which existed, but were taking the best measures they could to deal with it on the spot by their own agents.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE expressed his surprise at the defence which the Prime Minister had offered of a Government, which consisted of a set of the most unmitigated ruffians in the world.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, on the part of the Foreign Office, begged to corroborate all that had been said in favour of Consul March, and to assure the House on behalf of his noble Friend (Lord Granville), that in transferring Mr. March from Fiji to another position, he did not mean to reflect, in the slightest degree, on the professional services which that gentleman had rendered during the time he held the Consulate of Fiji.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO, alias TICHBORNE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE AND A RETURN.

MR. WHALLEY, who had given Notice to move—

"That in the case of 'The Queen v. Castro, alias Tichborne,' Copies be produced of the Application to the Lords of the Treasury for aid to the Defendant, and of the Reply thereto; of the Correspondence between Mr. Whalley, M.P., and the Solicitor to the Treasury on the subject of the said prosecution; and for a Return of the sums allowed by the Treasury in respect of Fees to Counsel and other expenses incurred by prisoners in Ireland during the last ten years," said, he would avail himself of that opportunity to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary a Question of which he had given him private Notice. He could not give Notice on the Paper, because it arose out of a communication which had been made to him since the House met. The right hon. Gentleman had informed him, that he should oppose the Motion which stood on the Paper, and he knew it was hopeless to expect that against such opposition, he should succeed in obtaining the Returns. The Tichborne prosecution had now proceeded for near 40 days, and it was stated in the report of the proceedings, that the evidence against the defendant would probably occupy the Court for at least three weeks to come. That prosecution was carried on upon the sole responsibility and management of the right hon. Gentleman as he had himself informed Parliament; and whatever else might be in doubt, it was certain that the public expenditure was something enormous, more probably than the cost of all the other public prosecutions for an entire year. Now, he desired to know on what grounds it was that the right hon. Gentleman considered himself justified in subjecting the country to this enormous outlay. The right hon.

Gentleman was, no doubt, well satisfied that the defendant was not the person he had sworn himself to be, and that he was guilty of the offence of perjury for which he was at present under trial. If anyone should entertain a contrary opinion, whether derived from his own personal knowledge, or from reading the report of the proceedings, he was not at liberty to give public expression to it; the most flagrant of all the forms in which the Court discovered that it was treated with contempt having been declared by the Judges to be the statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow), that he believed, in spite of the evidence, that the defendant was not guilty. Now, he asked, if that was so, what was the reason for that interminable calling of witnesses? What was the reason for bringing witnesses, at a cost of £500 a-piece, from the end of the earth, when they found in the tattoo-marks, and the evidence of officers and others, conclusive testimony that the defendant was not Tichborne? He considered he was entitled to demand, on the part of the public, at whose cost this extraordinary trial was then going on?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose to Order. He submitted that it was a most improper proceeding to criticize matters connected with a trial then going on.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is certainly out of Order, in discussing proceedings that are at this time sub judice.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would, after that ruling, discuss the conduct of Her Majesty's Government and the prosecution. He had often asked before, on what ground it was that the Government, if they found it necessary in the first place to take up the prosecution in relief of the parties directly injured by this imposition, and who could and ought to have exposed and punished it within a month of the man's appearance in this country—if he were an impostor—why, he repeated, having so taken it up, should they ransack the whole world for circumstantial and secondary evidence, when the Judge of the Common Pleas and the jury at whose instance they did not take it up, were satisfied with the half-dozen witnesses who spoke to the tattoo marks? Now, the Government, though repeatedly asked, had never given the slightest information on that point, and he considered that every day the trial proceeded justified any Member of that House in demanding again and again such explanation. He now came, however, to the question that still more urgently demanded attention and reply. He had on several occasions urged upon Government the necessity of satisfying the public that the defendant would have a fair trial, and that that could not be unless he was enabled to bring forward such evidence as he might have to offer in his defence, and in support of that appeal he had again placed on the Paper Notice of Motion for certain Returns which bore upon the statements of the right hon. Gentleman and of his Department as to the practice of the Government in respect of the provision for the cost of witnesses, &c., to persons in the position of the defendant.

MR. SPEAKER: I have again to explain to the hon. Gentleman, that it is entirely out of Order to discuss the proceedings of a trial now at issue in the Court of Queen's Bench.

MR. WHALLEY: If the Government were advised that the guilt of the defendant was as clear as those witnesses declared it to be, what need existed for all that vast expenditure, and such prolongation of the trial as deranged the administration of justice and was a scandal and a discredit to our judicial procedure? And if the right hon. Gentleman should reply to that, that it was necessary, in order to meet and anticipate the case which the defendant might be enabled to set up in reply, he asked whether every day and every hour and every witness that was called against him, did not strengthen the appeal that he should not be deprived—as he had been by the past course of proceedings, and was more and more so by every hour his trial was prolonged—of the means of offering such defence. The right hon. Gentleman knew, or might know, that above 500 witnesses had already declared on oath that he was Tichborne, but not one of them could be brought before the Court and jury unless he had money for that purpose, and he had none, and the Papers that he had asked to be laid on the Table of that House, and which the right hon. Gentleman refused to produce, went to establish the fact that the Government did know that he had material evidence to bring forward, and that he could not do so in consequence of the course which they had taken against him without precedent, as the right hon. Gentleman had admitted, in its hardship, practical injustice, and cruelty. For that purpose, he repeated, he ventured to put on the Paper a Motion for the Return of expenses voted for murderers and traitors in Ireland—deeper-dyed criminals than the Claimant was alleged to be. Was it without precedent that the public money should be granted for the defence of persons in the position of the Claimant? The hon. Member concluded by moving for the Copies of Correspondence referred to in his Notice.

MR. GLADSTONE rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman was not now criticizing the proceedings of the Government but the conduct of a trial not yet finished.

MR. BRUCE said, he would briefly explain why he refused the Returns. In Ireland, in capital cases, it had been the practice for the Government to provide counsel for the prisoners and pay them; but that had never been done in this country.

MR. SPEAKER here interrupted the right hon. Gentleman, and called attention to the fact that the hon. Member for Peterborough had concluded his address with an inquiry whether a Return would be granted for which he had given Notice that he would move. It was irregular thus to anticipate under cover of a Question on going into Committee of Supply, the discussion of a Motion which was set down for future consideration.

Motion agreed to.

Copies ordered, "of the Application to the Lords of the Treasury for aid to the Defendant in the case of Queen v. Castro alias Tichborne, and of the Reply thereto."

"And, of the Correspondence between Mr. Whalley, M.P., and the Solicitor to the Treasury, on the subject of the said prosecution."—(Mr. Whalley.)

PETITION OF LEONARD EDMUNDS, ESQUIRE.

LORD REDESDALE, in rising to move—

"That the petition of Leonard Edmunds, esquire, presented on the 26th day of May last, be referred to the Comptroller and Auditor General, with directions to him to examine the several accounts mentioned therein, and any other accounts which may be submitted to him relating to the matters set forth in such petition, and to report thereon to the House," said, that he had been induced to call their Lordships' attention to the case of Mr. Edmunds, because he considered that without the examination he proposed it would remain for ever doubtful as to whether their Lordships had acted justly towards Mr. Edmunds. He was certain that every one of their Lordships would admit that it would not be honourable or fair on their parts if they did not act with full and perfect justice towards a gentleman who had for so many years held an official position in their Lordships' House. The subject ought not to be considered as a party question. For himself, he could truly say that he had taken no steps in the matter that could indicate that his desire was to make it a party question.

He had not asked for a single vote from any noble Lord, and only wished that the House would deal with Mr. Edmunds as one gentleman ought to deal with another. ["Hear, hear!"] He was glad to hear that expression from the opposite side of the House, as it was an assurance that the question would not be regarded in that quarter as a party question. In order to make the matter intelligible to their Lordships, he would just state as briefly as he could the facts of the case, which were as follows:—Mr. Edmunds had passed 34 years and upwards in the public service, for 17 of which he was Reading Clerk and Clerk of Out-door Committees to their Lordships, and he was appointed to the office of Clerk of the Patents by the Crown on the 23rd of August, 1833, holding the office until the 29th of July, 1864; and during those 31 years no less a sum than £1,516,888 passed through his hands, of which there was no audit whatever in reference to the items involved in that large sum. He might here observe that so satisfied were their Lordships with Mr. Edmunds' conduct as Clerk in their Lordships' House that, on his resigning the appointment in 1865, the usual acknowledgment of it was made by the House, and a pension was granted to that gentleman. Soon after doubts arose as to the propriety of granting that pension, in consequence of certain transactions in connection with Mr. Edmunds' conduct as Clerk of the Patents. Considering the length of time that Mr. Edmunds held the office of Clerk of the Patents, and the large sum of money that had passed through his hands of which there was no audit, it was not surprising that some complications might arise. But that was no reason why there should not be a full inquiry into the whole matter. The result, however, was that an inquiry was ordered by the Treasury, upon whose finding certain Reports were consequently drawn up. And here he might say, in passing, that he did not think that Mr. Edmunds had managed his case well; he had not exercised due judgment, which, however, might happen to any one of their Lordships if they had to conduct a case in which they were personally concerned. It was then determined by their Lordships to appoint a Committee, though he (Lord Redesdale) objected to the unfairness of examining a man who might be prosecuted for a criminal offence, and who was not allowed counsel or to examine witnesses. The inquiry took place, and all the evidence brought forward consisted of the Reports prepared by the Treasury with regard to the accounts. The Report of the Committee went against Mr. Edmunds, and he appeared in Court on the charge of misappropriation of public moneys, where he failed, from the vastness and complexity of the accounts, and the length of time over which they ranged, coupled with the fact that as little indulgence as possible was afforded him, in satisfying the Committee of his want of culpability in the matter. The order for his pension was rescinded; and not only so, but their Lordships refused his request to be heard at the Bar of the House before judgment should be given against him. That was a hard measure on the part of their Lordships' House, for now Mr. Edmunds' character was destroyed, his pension had been taken from him, he had been subjected to proceedings which had brought him almost to ruin, and now he came to the House in his old age, praying for a statutory audit of his accounts. He (Lord Redesdale) contended that the inquiry which that gentleman asked for was necessary, if their Lordships desired that the case should be fully investigated. He urged that Mr. Edmunds had been obliged to accede to arbitration, and the result was that the accounts were never properly examined. It seemed to him that the question lay between the House of Lords and Mr. Edmunds, and that the House of Lords having granted and then taken away the pension, it was only right that Mr. Edmunds should be allowed full opportunity of clearing up anything in connection with the matter that might be in doubt. In 1868 the case was tried before the late Lord Justice Giffard, Mr. Edmunds having previously submitted his accounts to a public accountant, and laid a statement with regard to them before the Court of Chancery. In his judgment, Lord Justice Giffard stated that the defendant's evidence had removed any imputations that could be justly or fairly cast upon his character, his liability having arisen from a mistake under difficult circumstances, partly due to the refusal of the audit he had asked for; and that, having regard to all the circumstances, the very difficult position in which he was placed, and the fact of the audit being refused, he certainly should not make the defendant pay any costs. Surely their Lordships would not deny Mr. Edmunds the opportunity of again bringing forward that evidence, so that the truth might be ascertained. The matter, however, did not rest there. At the instance of the Government it went to arbitration, Mr. Edmunds at first declining it, and, after having been persuaded to agree to it, vainly trying to get out of it. He believed that had the arbitration resulted in Mr. Edmunds' favour, the House of Commons would very probably have refused to vote the money awarded him until the accounts had been submitted to the statutory audit; and he contended that the Government, instead of proposing arbitration ought to have submitted the accounts to the audit prescribed by the Act passed the year after the Report of their Lordships' Committee. As to the arbitrators' award, it was based entirely on the Treasury Reports, no audit being entered into. If their Lordships were to determine to reject this Motion, they would be laying down the principle that it was not necessary to have accounts like these submitted to audit. For those reasons, he did hope their Lordships would be prepared to do Mr. Edmunds that justice which he asked at their hands. The case was this—They had granted him a pension for his services in that House, and they subsequently took it away from him because of certain charges which had been brought against him. Now, these charges were involved in the question of audit of those accounts, and unless those accounts were audited in the manner he proposed, their Lordships could not come to the conclusion that they had not done him an injustice. The objection to re-opening the matter he would meet by urging that the arbitration did not fully bring out the merits of the case, and that failing the statutory audit now asked for by Mr. Edmunds, the House could not be satisfied that they had shown justice towards a gentleman who long served them with satisfaction and fidelity. He could not see what possible objection could be urged against the Motion, or who could oppose it, unless those who, having already made up their mind on the subject, were afraid that something in favour of Mr. Edmunds might come out upon the inquiry. Mr. Edmunds had been singularly unfortunate, for he had been defeated in every attempt which he made to have this matter put to rights, but always on some technical objection, for the Court of Queen's Bench, when refusing him the mandamus for which he applied in the matter said, that while he had no legal right to call upon the Comptroller and Accountant General to audit the accounts, yet, as a public officer, he had a moral right to such an audit; and Mr. Justice Blackburn said Mr. Edmunds had a moral grievance if the Treasury had refused it on insufficient grounds, but held that the remedy would lie in shaming the Government by the voice of public opinion or of Parliament. He would, therefore, urge that their Lordships were bound to inquire whether the pension had been withdrawn on proper grounds, and that Mr. Edmunds was entitled to a statutory audit, to determine whether he had acted properly or not. That being so, if their Lordships did not take steps to come to a just and sound conclusion on that matter, they would not be doing that which was consistent with the feelings of gentlemen. He (Lord Redesdale) trusted their Lordships would accede to the proposition he was about to make.

Moved, That the petition of Leonard Edmunds, esquire, presented on the 26th day of May last, be referred to the Comptroller and Auditor General, with directions to him to examine the several accounts mentioned therein, and any other accounts which may be submitted to him relating to the matters set forth in such petition, and to report thereon to the House.—(The Lord Redesdale.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he felt bound to state reasons which, he hoped, would satisfy their Lordships that they should not agree to the Motion of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. The noble Lord had said that he did not bring the matter forward as a party question. He (the Lord Chancellor) should be sorry to see the time come when a matter like that could be treated as a party question. It was a personal matter to a great extent, but it certainly involved also public considerations of great importance, and the principles of sound government and jurisprudence, in which all shades of politicians might well take an interest, irrespective of party. The noble Lord had moved—

"That the petition of Leonard Edmunds, esquire, presented on the 26th day of May last, be referred to the Comptroller and Auditor General, with directions to him to examine the several accounts mentioned therein, and any other accounts which may be submitted to him relating to the matter set forth in such petition, and to report thereon to the House."

He (the Lord Chancellor) was puzzled to know in what capacity their Lordships were to adopt the Motion—whether in their judicial capacity of which the noble Lord was so earnest a champion; or in their legislative capacity as one of the two Houses of Parliament; or in some other capacity with which he was not at present acquainted, it was hard to say. They could not of their own vote alter the Act of Parliament, which clearly laid down the duties of the Comptroller and Auditor General; and from a careful perusal of it, he could say neither their Lordships nor any one else except the Treasury had the power to refer to him any accounts to be audited. The Treasury, however, might, if they thought fit in their discretion, require an audit of any public accounts. Mr. Edmunds applied to the Court of Queen's Bench to give directions that his alleged accounts should be audited; but the Court decided it had no power to do so, because the Act had given that power and authority to the Treasury only. In point of fact, there were no accounts of Mr. Edmunds to be examined into, the whole matter having been disposed of by competent tribunals. The course adopted by the noble Lord last Session when he proposed an Address to the Crown, praying for such an inquiry as that which he now asked for, was not, in point of form, open to the same exception with the present Motion; and, as the form of the present Motion might be altered, if the substantial object proposed by it were right, it would now be proper to consider the substance of the case. The noble Lord, in introducing the subject, seemed to depend entirely upon the statements of Mr. Edmunds, and based much of what he said on the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench; but that Court itself could not, and did not, profess to know anything of the facts of the case, except as they happened to be then represented to them by Mr. Edmunds. What the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Blackburn said was, that an accountant to the Crown, having unsettled accounts, which he wished to get audited and passed, ought to have the means of doing so, and of thereby obtaining his quietus. To that proposition, no exception could be taken by anybody. But, in Mr. Edmunds' case, there were, in fact, no unsettled accounts to be passed; and there was not a single word in the Act of Parliament which empowered the House or the Treasury, or the Auditor General to do what was proposed. Nothing could be a greater mistake than to suppose that Mr. Edmunds was then an accountant to the Crown, or had any account whatever to pass or to render. Upon that point, he would shortly explain how the facts really stood to their Lordships. Mr. Edmunds' own statement was, that he was from 1833 to 1864 a principal public accountant to the Crown, or otherwise accountable, within the meaning of the Exchequer and Audit Act of 1866. He admitted, and the fact was incontrovertible, that the employment and receipt, in respect of which he alleged himself to be so accountable, terminated in 1864. At that time, there was no provision made by law for any audit, by any public authority, of the accounts of the office held by Mr. Edmunds. But there was another method of passing and settling those accounts, more conclusive than any audit—namely, by having them taken, either in the Court of Exchequer or in the Court of Chancery. This method the Crown determined to adopt; and, accordingly, in May, 1866, more than a month before the Exchequer and Audit Act of 1866, received the Royal Assent, and nearly a year before that Act came into operation the Attorney General filed an Information in Chancery, for the express purpose of taking the whole of Mr. Edmunds' accounts; asking, at the same time, for declarations from the Court as to the principles on which those accounts should be taken with reference to certain disputed points. This Information Mr. Edmunds resisted. He denied his liability to account to the Crown at all in Chancery; he asked that the Information should be dismissed. That point, however, was decided against him at the hearing—as were all the other disputed points—by Vice Chancellor Giffard, who expressly said—"A decree for an account in this Court would, beyond all question, be a complete discharge." That decree was accordingly made: that complete discharge, subject only to his paying what might be found by the result of the account to be due from him, Mr. Edmunds—although against his will—obtained. The whole account was ordered to be regularly taken in the Court of Chancery; and it would have been so taken, if Mr. Edmunds had not himself preferred that it should be done by arbitrators rather than by the Court. The only effect of that substitution of arbitrators was, that their award took the place, by the consent of both parties, of a final judgment by the Court. It was equally binding and conclusive in law; it was an equally complete discharge to Mr. Edmunds, provided only that he paid the money found due from him. It put at end, once and for ever, to the former position of Mr. Edmunds, as an Accountant to the Crown; there was afterwards no further or continuing account, which could, by any possibility, be audited. To suppose that what might have been done under the decree in Chancery, or what was done by means of the arbitration, ought to have been, or could have been, done by a public audit under the Exchequer and Audit Act of 1866 was a complete mistake. Not only was the suit in Chancery already pending when that Act passed and came into operation—not only was there nothing in that Act which could possibly deprive the Crown of the right to continue the prosecution of that suit—but the powers and duties of the Auditor General, under that Act, were wholly inadequate to the decision of the questions raised in the suit between Mr. Edmunds and the Crown. The Auditor General was not a Judge with the authority of a Court of Law; he could only pass, or refuse to pass, any accounts which might be laid before him. If he passed them, the debtor obtained his quietus; if he refused to pass them, the debtor did not get his quietus; but he would not be bound by law to submit to any disallowance, or surcharge, which the Auditor General might have thought it his duty to make, and the Crown, notwithstanding any opinion on such points which the Auditor General might have formed or expressed, would still be obliged to go into a Court of Law or Equity to enforce its rights against the defaulting accountant. One, at all events, of the most important questions raised in the suit, and that on which the largest claim of the Crown against Mr. Edmunds was eventually established by the award—the question of Mr. Edmunds' liability for profits made by him by discounts on stamps purchased with public money—could never have been raised at all in the ordinary course of an audit of those accounts. Mr. Edmunds, however, seemed to have succeeded in persuading the noble Lord that he was aggrieved by the proceedings of the Arbitrators, and that the award itself ought to be treated as a nullity. The noble Lord had, apparently, been content to take his law, as well as his facts from Mr. Edmunds; but he could assure the noble Lord that if their Lordships were to allow themselves to be made a Court of Appeal for suitors against whom awards had been made, they would find there were disappointed suitors without number who, after awards or decrees were made against them, would make representations, quite as plausible, and as probable as any now made by Mr. Edmunds, as to the circumstances under which they had failed in their suits; so that, if their Lordships were to permit themselves to be constituted in those matters Courts of Appeal for the redress of such supposed grievances, they would soon have plenty to do. As for the conduct of the arbitration, he knew that the two gentlemen chosen—the present Baron Pollock by Mr. Edmunds himself, and the present Mr. Justice Denman by the Treasury—were as honourable, able, and experienced lawyers as could have been selected, while the Umpire they named, Mr. Manisty, was also an able lawyer. There was no foundation whatever for Mr. Edmunds' notion, that it was not competent for the Crown when it filed the information and obtained the decree to take an account afterwards to refer it to arbitration. It was as competent for the Crown to refer the matter to arbitration, as it was for any other person to adopt such a course under similar circumstances; and, in fact, as he had said before, it was not the Crown but Mr. Edmunds who wished the matter to be referred to arbitration. The reference was made a Rule of Court, and when the award was made, no attempt was made to set it aside; and yet they were asked to give credit to the statement, that the Arbitrators rejected valid evidence, and that they had failed in their duty. That was precisely the sort of thing disappointed suitors always said. It was not the habit of Courts of Justice to listen to such after-assertions, and, except he mistook their Lordships very much it would not become a habit of theirs. The decision of the Arbitrators was as binding in law as any judgment pronounced in their Lordships' House. There were no longer any accounts to be audited or passed, and Mr. Edmunds had got his quietus, which resulted in his ascertained liability to the Crown in a large sum of money. He was no longer an accountant, he was a judgment-debtor, to the Crown. With respect to the merits of the case, he did not wish to press upon Mr. Edmunds with any undue harshness; but he was compelled to remind their Lordships that the case had been three times investigated, and always with the same result. First, by Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, to whom the accounts between Mr. Edmunds and the Crown were referred by Lord Westbury and the Treasury in 1864, two very honourable and very competent Gentlemen, of whom no one could say that they had any personal motives for doing injustice to Mr. Edmunds. They investigated the matter and reported that a very large sum was due from him to the Government. Upon the footing of their Report, in October, 1864, Mr. Edmunds voluntarily paid £7,872 as due from him to the Crown, of public money that had not been previously accounted for by him. That sum was paid by him, and received by the Treasury, without prejudice, on either side, to the question, whether he was or was not under any further liability. Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch considered that there were further claims, of large amount; and the matter was not suffered, by either House of Parliament, to rest without further inquiry. In 1865, a Committee of their Lordship's House, including men so eminent, so just and honourable, as the Duke of Somerset, the late Lord Derby, the late Lord Clarendon, the Duke of Montrose, Lord Malmesbury, Lord Chelmsford, and Lord Taunton, examined the whole matter most carefully and impartially. They took the evidence of Mr. Edmunds himself, during the whole or part of five days; they heard everything which he had to say in his own justification; and their Report, so far as the matters in question between Mr. Edmunds and the Crown were concerned, was unanimous. As to the principal charges against him — on which the claims afterwards established by the award of the Arbitrators depended — their findings were these —

"The first charge," they said, "is for having between the 23rd day of August, 1853, and the present time, in concert and combination with Thomas Ruscoe, improperly caused to be obtained and applied partly to his own use and partly to the use of the said Thomas Ruscoe, allowances of discounts to a large amount upon the prices of stamps purchased from Her Majesty's Stamp Office, for use in Her Majesty's Patent Office, such stamps having been purchased with public monies, for which he or the said Thomas Ruscoe to his knowledge was accountable to Her Majesty."

"The discovery of the fact of Mr. Edmunds having obtained these discounts seems to have been one of 'the more serious matters relating to the conduct of Mr. Edmunds,' to use the language of the Preliminary Report, to which the attention of Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch was unexpectedly drawn during the early part of their inquiry. They express their opinion 'that the taking discounts on stamps, by a public officer, is a novel practice, introduced by Mr. Edmunds into the Patent Office.' The practice itself, however, seems from the evidence of the Master of the Rolls not to be so novel as Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch suppose; his Honour said—'There is great difficulty upon the whole question of discounts. Even now, upon applying to the Stamp Office with respect to the mode of paying for the stamps upon Patents, I understand that the Stamp Office say that the better way is to allow one of the officers in the department to take the discounts.' And Mr. Greenwood in his reply to Mr. Edmunds's statement says—'No such practice—of taking discounts on stamps—was objected to by us; what we objected to was the practice of buying stamps at wholesale prices with the public money, and putting the profit into the private pocket of a public salaried officer.'"

"In considering this charge it is necessary, therefore, to distinguish that part of it which depends upon the mere fact of taking the discounts, from that which relates to the alleged application by Mr. Edmunds of public money to this purpose."

They then proceeded to observe upon the results of the evidence, including the statements and admissions of Mr. Edmunds himself, concluding with the declaration of their opinion—

"That so much of the first charge as relates to the purchase with public monies of stamps upon which allowances of discounts were obtained by Mr. Edmunds is fully established by the evidence."

Then they said—

"The second charge preferred against Mr. Edmunds is, 'for having improperly retained in his hands, or under his control, between the 9th August, 1852, and the month of July, 1864, without duly paying the same over into Her Majesty's Exchequer, divers large sums of money received by him for fees on Patents, which ought to have been from time to time paid by him into Her Majesty's Exchequer. Very little need be said on this head of charge, because it is distinctly admitted by Mr. Edmunds, that the last payment which he made to the Exchequer before the inquiry by Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch was of a sum of £1,722 1s. on the 9th August 1852. He says that 'by accident, certainly not by design, he, unfortunately, within the year 1853, did not pay over any sum to the Consolidated Fund. Finding that out in the following year,—in what may be called the most absurd cowardice,—he intermitted and made no subsequent payments.' It is difficult to understand how the nonpayment could have arisen in the first instance by accident. On the 14th May 1834 the Treasury, on receipt of a letter from Mr. Edmunds of the 26th April preceding, sent him the form of an affidavit prescribed for all the officers of the courts of law, by whom accounts of the receipt of fees are rendered, and requiring his affidavits to be made in that form. Mr. Edmunds says he is quite certain he never received any such order, and yet, the very next payment which he made after the date of the Treasury letter in August 1834 was verified by affidavit in the form thus prescribed by the Treasury, and the affidavit with the account was transmitted to the Treasury and there filed. From that time no affidavits were sworn by Mr. Edmunds, but forms of affidavits were prepared quarterly by Ruscoe and delivered to him; and during the time that he continued to make his payments to the Exchequer, he endorsed upon them the sums to be paid. From the time that he suspended his payments he appears to have paid no attention to the affidavits, although they were regularly delivered to him. The delivery of the affidavits to Mr. Edmunds is distinctly shown in the Preliminary Report of Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, which states that they, having prepared an account of sums payable to the Consolidated Fund in each of the years beginning at 1852 and ending in 1864, Mr. Edmunds 'admitted the account to be correct, and that Mr. Ruscoe sent to him a formal account and affidavit to be sworn as directed by the Statute 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 84. in respect of each of the items.'"

"There can be no doubt, under the above circumstances, that the second charge is fully proved against Mr. Edmunds."

"It might have been considered as some mitigation of the serious misconduct on the part of Mr. Edmunds, if the fact had been that the money paid into the Patent Office account had remained untouched, though unaccounted for, during so many years; but that this was not the case will appear in considering the third charge, to which the Committee now proceed."

"The third charge is 'For having from time to time improperly caused to be transferred to the credit of his private account with Messrs. Coutts and Co., bankers, from a 'separate account kept by him with the same bankers for the public purposes of Her Majesty's Patent Office, and having applied to his own use divers sums of public money for which he was accountable to Her Majesty."

As to this, after a short statement of the facts, the Committee said, that they "cannot hesitate to come to the conclusion that the third point is completely established against Mr. Edmunds." On all these points the subsequent conclusions of the arbitrators were in entire agreement with those of Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, and of the Committee of their Lordships' House. And on the only point—that as to the allowance of the cost of parchments—on which their Lordships' Committee, in accordance with the later opinion of Vice Chancellor Giffard, held that Mr. Edmunds might have a moral claim to be exonerated from a legal liability, the arbitrators gave him the full benefit of that opinion; being, in substance, and in the practical result, exonerated from that portion of the claim by their award. Nevertheless, the sum found due from him by the Arbitrators, under the first head of charge—that of profits made by discounts on stamps purchased with public money—exceeded £5,000; making, with the £7,872 already paid by him in October, 1864, a total liability to the public established against him—in round numbers—of £13,000. As to the representations made by Mr. Edmunds concerning the manner in which the Arbitrators discharged their duty, he could not do better than refer their Lordships to the statements made in this House by Lord Hatherley, when the same subject was brought before the House last year by the noble Lord, the Chairman of Committees. His noble and learned Friend then stated, that the Arbitrators, at the desire of Mr. Edmunds, held public sittings; that their inquiry occupied many days; that they had heard able counsel on the part of Mr. Edmunds; and that, nevertheless, they were unanimous in their decisions—one of them having been nominated by Mr. Edmunds himself, and both of them being now Judges held in universal esteem—without any necessity for the intervention of their Umpire. Their Lordships would be able now to appreciate the probability of the statement—that these Arbitrators refused to receive any evidence which ought to have been admitted, and that they did not give Mr. Edmunds the opportunity of properly proving his case. There remained only one other subject on which a few words of explanation might still be necessary; namely, the opinion expressed by Vice Chancellor Giffard—when deciding the questions of principle raised between the Crown and Mr. Edmunds in the Chancery suit adversely to Mr. Edmunds—that the character of that gentleman had been cleared from all imputation. He (the Lord Chancellor) should have been perfectly content to leave Mr. Edmunds in possession of any advantage which he might derive from what passed upon that occasion, if Mr. Edmunds himself had not insisted on having all these matters raked up. But since those remarks of Vice Chancellor Giffard were so constantly referred to, it became necessary for him (the Lord Chancellor), having been Attorney General when the information in Chancery was filed, and having also been one of the counsel for the Crown before the Vice Chancellor, to explain to the House under what circumstances those remarks were really made. The noble Lord the Chairman of Committees assumed, and he had repeated more than once in the course of his speech, that the Vice Chancellor then had before him all the materials necessary for a final judgment, including the evidence taken by Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, and the Reports of those gentlemen. No doubt the noble Lord had been led, by Mr. Edmunds' statements, to believe that this must have been the case. Nothing, however, could be more remote from the truth. Neither the Reports of Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, nor that of the Committee of their Lordships' House, nor any part of the evidence taken before Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, or before their Lordships' Committee, was, or could have been, offered in evidence before the Vice Chancellor; nor was any other evidence offered to the same or the like effect. On the contrary, for reasons which would easily be understood by those noble and learned Lords present, who were familiar with proceedings in the Court of Chancery, great care was taken, on the part of the advisers of the Crown to confine the allegations of fact in the Information, and the evidence offered in support of them, to what was absolutely and strictly necessary, for the purpose of obtaining a Decree for an Account. Their reasons were, first, that it would have been oppressive to Mr. Edmunds himself, and also contrary to the practice of the Court, to go into the particulars of the account proposed to be taken, in that stage of the Suit, when the only question was, whether any account should be taken at all. Secondly, it was necessary, for the purpose of that proceeding, to keep off the record everything like the suggestion of a criminal charge against Mr. Edmunds. He (the Lord Chancellor) had stated, when he was examined as Attorney General before their Lordships' Committee, that the advisers of the Crown, whether rightly or wrongly, were of opinion that the facts would have warranted criminal proceedings against Mr. Edmunds; but that it was not considered right to take such proceedings, having regard to the manner in which Mr. Edmunds had been interrogated, and to the acceptance by the Treasury of £7,872 paid by him, on the footing of a civil liability. It was, therefore, inconsistent with the nature and the object of the proceedings in Chancery, to raise unnecessarily any questions of character, or to aggravate the case against Mr. Edmunds by unnecessary personal imputations. If anything criminal had been alleged, the counsel for Mr. Edmunds, without admitting his guilt, might very properly have contended that the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction to inquire, under colour of a suit for an account, into a criminal charge. For these reasons the counsel for the Crown abstained, as far as possible, in their pleadings, evidence, and arguments from all criminatory matter, and from going into any items of account, beyond such as were absolutely necessary to lay a foundation for the decree asked. On the other hand, Mr. Edmunds produced his own evidence, and that of his accountants and others, to put the colour which suited him upon the questions at issue, and to give his own version of the probable results of the account; and his counsel went very largely into arguments, founded partly upon this evidence, and partly upon the limited extent of the proofs then offered by the Crown, for the purpose of eliciting from the Vice Chancellor some expression of opinion, exculpating him from moral blame in these transactions. That they should have succeeded in this attempt, was, at the time, a matter of considerable surprise to the advisers of the Crown; because, although there never was a better Judge than Vice Chancellor Giffard, the expression of any such opinion, at that time, and upon such necessarily imperfect materials, before the final results of the account to be directed could possibly be known, was certainly unusual, and extra-judicial; and of this the learned Judge himself afterwards became sensible; for it was publicly stated by Mr. Denman in the House of Commons, after the award of the Arbitrators, that Sir George Giffard had told him, that, if he had been aware of the contents of the Reports of Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, and of the proceedings before the Committee of their Lordships' House, he should not have said what actually fell from him in Mr. Edmunds' favour, whatever else he might have thought proper to say. He (the Lord Chancellor) trusted, that it was unnecessary for him now to add anything further, to convince their Lordships, that, notwithstanding the high authority of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, they ought not to allow themselves to be influenced, by the mere fact that this unfortunate gentleman had been some time ago an officer of that House, to create in this instance a precedent totally unlike anything that had ever happened before, and such as he thought would tend greatly to shake the confidence of all persons in their Lordships' discernment as to matters connected with the responsibility of public accountants, and the administration of justice.

LORD REDESDALE, in reply, said, he still thought, after what had fallen from the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) that the House was not in possession of all the information which it ought to possess in reference to that case. He, however, felt the responsibility now resting upon him, and should have desired to hear some of their Lordships express their opinion as to what ought to be done on the subject. As, however, no one thought proper to do so, under all the circumstances, he did not feel himself justified in dividing the House.

LORD DENMAN said, that if the result had been more favourable to Mr. Edmunds we should not have heard any complaint of it. He added, that whether willingly or unwillingly Mr. Edmunds had named Mr. Fitzjames Stephen one of the Arbitrators, but on that gentleman's going to India he named Mr. (now Baron) Pollock. The Arbitrator named on behalf of the Crown was his learned relative Mr. (now Justice) Denman, who made it known that he would not accept a reference, as on a mere retainer by the Crown, but with a view to impartially deciding on both sides of the case. It would be unfortunate if such an award were indefinitely re-opened, and he regretted the consequences of it to Mr. Edmunds as much as the noble Lord who brought forward this Motion.

INDIAN APPEALS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in calling the attention of the House to the necessity of extending the powers for hearing Indian Appeals contained in the statute 3 & 4 William IV., c. 41, said, the principal objection which, he believed, would be made to the proposition that it was necessary or expedient to provide for appeals of Indian Princes in cases in which they were aggrieved by acts of subordinate officials was, that those acts were acts of State, and that appeals against them to a tribunal might weaken the Executive Government. In reply to that, he would point out that in almost all the cases that he was acquainted with an appeal was desired not so much against the decision of the Government, as against the grounds, or absence of judicial grounds, upon which the Government might have decided. This view was confirmed by a case which had recently been heard by the Judicial Committee. An Indian Court had rejected a claim on the ground that an act of State was impeached. The Judicial Committee heard the appeal and decided that there was no act of State, but it rejected the appeal on other grounds. Granting, however, for argument's sake, that the acts complained of were acts of State, he could cite precedents which went far to prove that no such evil consequences need be apprehended from a course which would substitute the reign of law for that of caprice. It was the rule in Portuguese India for Governors before returning home, to give a strict account to law officers, who not only inquired into their accounts, but also sat in judgment over them, and received depositions of witnesses and any complaints which might be made. In the Philippine Islands the Chief Judge and Supreme Court exercised a supervision over the acts of the Government, and on some occasions condemned and prevented military expeditions, and in case of the death of the Governor the Supreme Court conducted the Government until the arrival of a new Governor. Again, by the Constitution of the United States the Supreme Court judged and revised or disallowed the legislation of the States in all cases in which that legislation might appear contrary to the Constitution. It was a subject of complaint in France that though all Frenchmen were supposed to be equal before the law, yet, in fact, they were not, since a Frenchman could not prosecute or sue a Government official even of the lowest class, without previously obtaining the sanction of the Conseil d'Etat. The state of Indian Princes and of the other subjects of Her Majesty in India, under the statute of 3 & 4 William IV., c. 41, was, therefore, similar to that of Frenchmen; they could not plead against Governmental acts, unless the Government itself consented to allow them to do so. Unless further powers of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council than those contained in the statute of William IV. were granted, the Princes of India would now be in a worse position than that in which they stood under the Company's Government, and previous to the Proclamation by Her Majesty on her assuming the Government of India, which was intended to better their status and give them confidence and security, because previous to that Proclamation, India was under a double Government, or was supposed to be so, and it was by raising a cry against a double Government that the East India Company was extinguished. But that double Government had this advantage for the Princes of India, that it was easier for them to appeal to the Imperial Government, and easier to obtain a hearing from Parliament; and there was also this advantage for the Imperial Government, that it was then easier to revise any act without appearing to retreat from a position already taken up. As the Princes of India could not be brought before Her Majesty's Courts in India, they had no locus standi for an appeal to the Privy Council. There remained to them, it was true, the possibility of appealing to Parliament; but Parliament had not time, nor was it a very fitting tribunal, for judging of such matters as might be wished to submit to it. But that resource was now almost cut off, because insinuations had been made, and had been repeated in public prints, which now made it very difficult for any Member of Parliament to take up any case, however much he might be convinced of its justice. The necessity for some independent tribunal to decide between the Princes of India and the local officials, moreover, would be very much increased by the great extension of railways in India. These enterprises would necessarily give rise to disputes about property and jurisdiction, arising from the conduct of the constructors of railways, which sometimes led to quarrels even in our own country. The Princes of India, who formed part of what was the Mogul Empire, were subject to the paramount Power, and ought to possess the right of appeal of subjects of Her Majesty. It was also objected that by giving to the Princes of India a right of appeal to a supreme tribunal, they might be deprived of their Sovereign rights. But this objection was rather frivolous, since these Sovereign rights, whilst debarring them at present from a legal remedy, did not prevent their being dethroned by the Indian Government. But not only the Princes of India, but also Her Majesty's Indian subjects, were not on a footing of equality with Her Majesty's British subjects for obtaining redress, or even a hearing of their complaints. For instance, there were some endowments known as the Hooghly endowments for the education of the Mussulmans of Bengal. These endowments were taken away and thrown into the common fund for the education of the Hindus. This was done by an administrative act, and, consequently, no ground for an appeal existed. But it could not be said that the Imperial Government was interested in this act of a subordinate official or in maintaining it. The matter in question was not one of policy, but of rights, to be settled by the Law Officers of the Crown. A similar case happened at Penang, where Sir William Norris, who was Recorder of the Straits Settlements from 1837 to 1847, appropriated some endowments belonging to Mussulman schools to the education of Chinese and their conversion to Christianity. It would be easy to bring forward many cases in which it would have been advantageous to the Imperial Government, whose principal object and interest was to establish its reputation for justice, to have allowed an appeal, instead of simply confirming an act, often without further information than that furnished by the person whose act had given grounds for complaint; but he would limit himself to one case, in which it would be easy to show that the Government had acted without sufficient information. He referred to the case of the Nawab of Tonk. The India Office was unacquainted with the facts of the case, and even with elementary facts. It could not be supposed that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India would mis-inform the House of Commons, and he, therefore, must have been himself mis-informed. The hon. Gentleman stated that the deposed Nawab of Tonk was the grandson of a notorious Pindarree. Now, it was well known that the Pindarrees were Hindus of the Maharratta territory, and the Nawab of Tonk traced his descent back for 1,200 years through Mussulman ancestors. If the name of "Pindarree" was misused for "freebooter," it was equally inapplicable, since the grandfather of the Nawab of Tonk was in the regular service of Holkar. Further on, the hon. Gentleman stated that the Nawab of Tonk's men were "Pathans, notorious cut-throats, men of the same tribe as the murderer of Lord Mayo." Now, Pathans were men born in India of Afghan descent, and had nothing in common with the Afreedees and other mountaineers born and bred in Afghanistan. So that in these two statements there was ignorance of elementary facts. He would now give an instance of ignorance of the facts of the case; the Under Secretary had stated that "there were 15 of the Lawa men killed, while on the Tonk side only one man fell." Whilst the fact was as appeared from the Papers laid before Parliament, and the depositions of seven Hindu witnesses, that 17 men were killed in all—10 men on the Lawa side, and 7 men on the Tonk side, one of whom was a Mussulman, and the other six were Hindu sepoys. He would not, however, rely much upon those errors in the statement of the hon. Gentleman, nor upon the fact that 84

Members of the other House were in favour of an Address praying Her Majesty to refer this case to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But he thought that much weight should be attributed to the opinion given by eminent counsel to questions put on this case—

"We are of opinion that if the Nawab were treated as a delinquent he was entitled to notice that the investigation was to be made, and that he would be held personally responsible, and that according to the ordinary principles of justice, which require that a man shall be duly informed of any charge brought against him, and shall have full opportunity of defending himself. The only step we could suggest to secure the Nawab's release, or a proper investigation into the circumstances of his case, would be the presentation of a Petition to Parliament, or a Petition to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to give effect to the power contained in the statute 3 & 4 William IV., c. 41."

He did not think it was a strained interpretation of that opinion of counsel to suppose that, according to it, the Nawab of Tonk's case had not yet received a proper investigation, and to show its weight he need only say that it was signed by the present Lord Chancellor, Mr. Vernon Harcourt, and Mr. Farley Leith. That case alone, he thought, was sufficient to show that some alteration in the present system was necessary.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had raised a very large and very important question in the most inconvenient form possible. When he (the Duke of Argyll) read the Notice, he had not the remotest suspicion of the subject to which he was about to refer. Under the form of calling attention to the necessity of extending the powers for hearing Indian Appeals, his noble Friend had raised a wholly independent question—namely, whether a new tribunal should be constituted to extend to the Government of India and to the native Princes of that country, the same principles of appeal in political and criminal jurisdiction as already existed in civil matters in the case of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He need not explain that the subject to which the noble Lord's question referred had nothing to do with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which was a body constituted for the purpose of hearing appeals, in the legal sense of the term, brought by persons whose suits had been previously adjudicated upon in the primary Courts. As, however, there was no Court of First Instance in India that was empowered to deal with political questions, it was clear there could be no such thing as an appeal in political cases. His noble Friend might, of course, contend that a political Court should be established in this country, and he listened attentively with a view to ascertain whether he would have a Court of First Instance, or a Court of Appeal from some Court to be established in India; but he could not quite collect his views on that subject. If he thought that a Court sitting in London as a Court of First Instance could decide on the many difficult questions which arose between the Government of India and the native Princes, he (the Duke of Argyll) could not conceive a proposition less likely to receive the sanction of Parliament. There was not the machinery for the purpose. How could a Court in London determine matters which depended upon local evidence, and the fact whether witnesses were speaking the truth or committing perjury? Then, as to a Court of First Instance, it would be a Court of criminal jurisprudence for the Princes, and of political jurisdiction for the Government of India. Such a Court would largely supersede the functions of the Government, for it would, of necessity, be a Court to which the Princes of India would be amenable, and it would also exercise large political powers over the Government. It would thus have the power to substitute itself for the Government of India in regard to nearly every great question that might arise. There were three possible cases in which they might have to deal severely with the native Princes. The first divided itself into two branches, one, that of suspicion of political treachery against our Sovereign power, and he need hardly say there had been such cases; the other, that of disaffection to the Sovereignty of the Queen, of which a case occurred in the person of the King of Delhi, who on the breaking out of the Mutiny, made himself particeps criminis, and he and his family were dispossessed. Another case was that of the Rajah of Sattara, who was deposed in 1838. Could the Government of India delegate the power they exercised in those cases to any tribunal whatsoever? Was it not evident that it was a political function which must be kept in the hands of the Government of India? Then there was the case, not of political disaffection, but of gross political mismanagement of their own territory on the part of the native Princes. That was a much more delicate and difficult question to deal with, and it was one which the Government of India must reserve to itself to settle. However cruel or oppressive Princes might be to their subjects, the British Government never allowed civil war. Were they, then, to delegate to any tribunal the decision of the question whether the government of a particular Prince had reached such a point as to justify the interference of our Government? He would refer to but one case, that of the great Kingdom of Oude and the deposition of its King in pursuance of the decision of the Government of India and of the Cabinet of England—a decision which he, for one, did not regret. The House would recollect the long-suffering of the Government of India with regard to the King of Oude. The action of Lord Dalhousie in reference to the Government of Oude was abundantly justified, as the noble Lord would find on reference to the Papers relating to the annexation. In fact, the misgovernment of Oude had reached a point which rendered it the absolute duty of the Imperial Government to assume the administration of the affairs of the Kingdom; but such a question was for the Government and not for a Court of First Instance. Then there was a third case, not of political treachery or of general mismanagement, but of individual and particular crime—happily a very rare case, but of which there had been one or two instances in the course of many years. One took place in 1838, and judging from it, he contended that Government should have the means of dealing with particular crimes. He would not, however, say that there might not be some amendment in the mode in which the Government of India dealt with the case of native Princes accused of crime. The ordinary course had been to secure a careful report from our Political Resident after he had inquired into the case. The report went through the hands of the higher political officers until it reached the Supreme Government. In that course of proceeding amendment might possibly be suggested. Instead of taking the report of a single political officer, it might be advisable to send down to him a strong commission, containing, perhaps, a judicial element, to inquire and take evidence on the spot as to the alleged crime. Such an amendment as that might very well be considered by the Government of India and the Government at home. But of this he was quite sure, that if amendment were required, it would not take the form of an independent Court. He threw that out merely as a suggestion, but strongly deprecated the proposition that the Judicial Committee in London or a Court of First Instance in India should be vested with political power to intervene between the Government of India and the native Princes.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

ARMY—THE MILITIA RESERVE— ANNUAL BOUNTY.

THE MARQUESS OF EXETER, in asking Her Majesty's Government, Upon what grounds the Annual Bounty was refused to men of the Militia Reserve who enlisted in 1868 and whose term of service did not expire till after the training of 1873; Also, whether the withholding of the bounty is not in contravention of paragraph 16 of the Regulations under the Act 9th May, 1868, and further explained by paragraph 10 of the Memorandum of Conditions of Service in the Militia Reserve, 23rd April, 1869, A (Militia) 136, in which commanding officers of regiments are expressly ordered to read and explain to the men three times during each training—said, he felt it necessary, though a commanding officer, to bring the matter before the House, because the men in his regiment had expressed themselves dissatisfied with what had been done to them. He considered that the clause was perfectly clear, and that the men who enlisted under it were to receive on attestation £1 bounty and another at the close of each annual training during the period of their service. That was a matter of much importance, and if it were desired that the Reserve men should not be dissatisfied, the payments which were promised should be made.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Exeter) was mistaken in supposing that any instalment of bounty to which those men were entitled had been withheld. They had received the last instalment at the end of the training of 1872. Their original engagement was made at the end of the training of 1868, when they received £1 in the nature of a retaining fee. The noble Marquess would therefore see that for their five trainings they had received £5. He felt bound to acknowledge that the original Regulation might have been framed more clearly, but as far as he was aware there had never been any doubt as to the amount to be paid, and no misapprehension had arisen except in the case of two regiments.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE pointed out that the precedent which had been made by the War Office was not a good one, and complained of the way in which the regulations had been drawn; for as they stood they admitted of two interpretations, and the men might reasonably consider that they were entitled to another £1 each. He understood that some 300 or 400 of the men to whom reference had been made were so discontented that they would not enter into a new engagement. Would it not be a proper thing for the Inspector General of Militia to look into it at once, and see if the services of these men could not be retained?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he could not understand how any misconception could have arisen.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, the difficulty had, without doubt, arisen through the ambiguous wording of the Memorandum, and that it was extremely to be regretted there should have been any hitch in reference to Militia engagements.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— SCHOOL BOARDS.—QUESTION.

LORD BUCKHURST said, while he did not wish to embarrass the Government on the subject of education, it was highly inconvenient to the public that any doubt or ambiguity should exist as to the intentions of the Government with regard to a question of such great importance. He thought it might be assumed that the subject of compulsory education would not be further proceeded with by Her Majesty's Government, but still there remained the question of school boards. Now it was quite clear that there might be compulsory education without school boards and school boards without compulsory education. No doubt much good had in many instances resulted from the establishment of school boards, but it must be remembered that school boards had imposed upon the ratepayers very heavy additional burdens—and in some cases still increasing burdens. It should also be remembered that school boards possessed the very great power of compelling parents to send their children to school. Under those circumstances, he thought it was not unnatural that some anxiety should exist as to the future intentions of Her Majesty's Government with regard to making school boards generally compulsory. It was not, therefore, without some surprise that he read a statement reported to have been made not long ago by a noble Earl opposite who not unfrequently represented Her Majesty's Government in that House. The noble Earl was reported to have remarked at a public meeting on educational matters, held in the West of England, that it would be a great advantage to have the system of school boards universal and compulsory, as in Scotland. Further, the noble Earl was said to have stated for the guidance of the meeting, that he had reason to believe that before long steps would be taken for the establishment of a school board in every parish or district in England. In conclusion, he begged to ask, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any further steps relative to the establishment of school boards, and especially with reference to making them compulsory? No doubt, the noble Earl had been misrepresented, and the answer to the Question now put to the Government would possibly give an explanation.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he wished to furnish the desired explanation. The report alluded to caused him as much astonishment and consternation as it had produced in the mind of the noble Lord opposite. The words he used were most inaccurately reported; and besides, he merely expressed his individual opinion at a school meeting in his own parish in the West of England. He said there might eventually be a general system of school boards throughout the country; but he never thought his words would have found their way into the London newspapers, and still less did he think they would be considered as spoken by the authority of the Government. He had not the slightest knowledge of the intentions of the Government, and, if he had known them, he trusted their Lordships were satisfied that he would not have been so injudicious as to state them on that occasion. He only expressed an individual opinion as to what might be the ultimate result of the school board system.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX hoped his answer would be equally as satisfactory as the explanation just offered. Whatever doubt there might have been as to the intention of the Government a week ago, there could hardly be any misapprehension now, after the statement recently made in the other House by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Education Department. The right hon. Gentleman paid a tribute to the great voluntary exertions which had been made in all parts of the country to establish elementary schools, and stated that he anticipated the continuance of these voluntary exertions. Under those circumstances, the Government did not think it desirable to make the establishment of school boards compulsory where they were not necessary.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA—THE NAVAL AND MILITARY REVIEWS. QUESTION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is their intention to give directions to insure accommodation for the Members of both Houses of Parliament and their wives at the naval and military reviews, as well as at any other public entertainments given at public expense in honour of the visit of the Shah of Persia to this country?

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, the visit to the Fleet would partake more of the character of an inspection than of a review, because the iron-clads at Spithead would be at anchor, and the Royal Yacht would pass between them. If any of their Lordships wished to be present, he had to request that they would be good enough to place their names as early as possible on a paper, which would be left in the Prince's Chamber for the purpose, and a ticket would be forwarded to each from the Admiralty. That ticket would admit the bearer to a Government vessel, which would accompany the Royal Yacht on the inspection. Special trains would not be provided at the expense of the Government, as on a former occasion; but he had no doubt that that matter would be satisfactorily attended to by the Railway Companies.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

LABOURERS' HOUSES (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has given up his intention of bringing in a Bill to increase the facilities for the erection of Labourers' Houses in Ireland?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, however much he might sympathize in the subject-matter of the hon. Baronet's Question, he feared he should not have an opportunity of bringing in a Bill that Session.

METROPOLIS—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any plan for the appropriation of the ground to the West of the Palace at Westminster, acquired under the Act of that a further survey should be made; that, on their appearing on remand, the official record is, "No prosecutor appeared, and the men were discharged." If there be any compensation for the men who have been thus imprisoned; and, if it is a fact that this vessel, twenty-five of whose crew have been thus imprisoned, is marked with a black mark in "Lloyd's Register," as unfit to be placed in any class?

MR. CARTER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reference to Mr. Gilpin's question, If he could state to the House whether, when the Cardiff magistrates discharged from custody the five men brought before them on the 27th of January, and remanded until the 29th, charged for refusing to go to sea in the "Wimbledon," because no prosecutor appeared, they (the magistrates) took any steps to procure a remission of the sentences upon the twelve men committed on the 24th of January, and the three men committed on the 25th, on the same charge?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that the Question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin) and also that of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Carter) would be best answered by reading a succinct statement of one of the magistrates on the subject, from which it appeared that on the 8th of January, 1873, while the ship was in harbour, a portion of the crew, without giving notice to the master, refused to go further with the ship. They stated that the meat supplied to them on board was bad and deficient. They returned on the following day. The Court directed a survey to be made, and the meat was ascertained to be good and wholesome. The defendants still refused to proceed with the ship, and the Court sentenced them to imprisonment. On the 23rd of January five other men of the crew were charged with the same offence. On the 16th of January the ship left Cardiff, and had got as far as Lundy Island, when she met with bad weather, and was anchored in the Roads on the 20th. On the 20th some of the crew refused to proceed further with the ship, alleging that she was unseaworthy. A survey was made of the ship under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1871, and on the 24th a Report was made to the Board of Trade that the ship was not unseaworthy, and that the defendants were therefore not justified in their refusal. On the 25th of January, ten other men, part of the crew, were charged with refusing to proceed to sea on the ground that the ship was unseaworthy. The case against these men was adjourned till the 29th of January, on which day the master did not appear and the charge was dismissed, the owners, to avoid the expense, having engaged another crew at Liverpool. The magistrates did not think, however, that because the captain did not appear against the men on the 29th, the ship must have been unseaworthy. They believed that the owners, smarting under the heavy expenses caused by the detention of the vessel, determined to abandon the prosecution and let the ship get away. The magistrates had taken no steps to procure a revision of the sentences which had been passed on the men who had been previously brought before them; and they did not think such a course would be reasonable or expedient. He (Mr. Bruce) had in his hand the Report of the Inspector, which entered into details; but the substance of it was this—On the whole, he regarded the ship as being strongly built and well-found in every respect. His hon. Friend the Member for Northampton asked whether this ship had not been put on the Black List at Lloyd's. The ship was built in 1864 as an A 1 ship; but at the end of eight years, a fresh examination was necessary, in order to ascertain whether she should be continued on the Register. She was examined at Liverpool, and certain alterations were reported to be necessary by Lloyd's in order to re-instate her. The owners refused to make those alterations, and proposed such alterations as they deemed proper. They were therefore unable to continue her on the Register at Lloyd's.

MR. GILPIN: In point of fact, then, the ship was uninsurable at the time.

MR. BRUCE wished to add that the ship had since made her voyage in safety.

METROPOLIS—STREET TRAFFIC REGULATIONS—QUESTIONS.

MR. LIDDELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the rapid rate of speed at which large and cumbrous spring carts and vans now traverse the streets of the metropolis at all hours: And whether, in view of this practice, and with regard to the public safety and convenience, he will consider the desirability of making some further regulations of street traffic than those apparently in force?

VISCOUNT MAHON desired at the same time to ask, Whether further regulations were contemplated with regard to cabs which carried no fares, and which, by going through the streets at a foot-pace, constantly impeded the public traffic?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, it is somewhat inconvenient to answer a Question of so much importance in this form, because if I give a very succinct answer, I shall neither do justice to the efforts of the police to diminish the danger of the streets, nor bring before the House a full picture of the state of things. I am also very loth to detain the House at any length on the matter. The Acts imposing penalties on persons for furious driving or for driving so as to endanger life or limb, or do bodily harm, are 2nd & 3rd Vic. c. 47, and 24th and 25th Vic. c. 100. The police have power to enforce those Acts by taking out summonses, or by apprehending offenders; but have no power to make regulations as to speed, the only power they have being that they can regulate the order which vehicles should take through the streets on certain occasions. During the year 1872, 328 summonses were taken out for the offence of dangerous driving, and 351 apprehensions were made. The number of police specially employed in regulating street traffic has been largely increased during the last four years, and it now amounts to 176, besides 280 stationed at fixed points: these are mostly in busy thoroughfares, and pay special attention to the traffic, and I believe, I am within the truth in saying, that some General Henderson has been Chief Commissioner over the number of police specially told off for this duty, have been increased fourfold, while the strict standards to enforce the law have been issued to the police, and printed notices on the sides of the law have been extensively placarded. I am sorry, however, to say that while the number of deaths has slightly decreased, the number of injured has not decreased in proportion to the exertions thus made. The number of persons killed during the last four years has been—in 1869, 128; in 1870, 124; in 1871, 120; in 1872, 118. The agents in the deaths were—vans, 30; heavy carts, 19; light carts, 18; waggons and drays, 19; omnibuses, 14; cabs, 10; private carriages, 6; and ridden horses, 2. On the other hand, the number of injuries inflicted has considerably increased—namely, from 1,706 in 1869, to 2,677 in 1872. The population of the metropolitan police district was 3,110,654 in 1861; in 1871 it was 3,810,744, being an increase of 700,090, or at the rate of 70,000 a-year. The present population is probably 3,950,000. On examining the scenes of these accidents it will be found that they happen with comparative rarity at crossings in crowded places, where policemen are generally stationed, and where the crowded state of the streets prevents vehicles from moving rapidly. Accidents are more frequent in less crowded and and less well-guarded thoroughfares. Thus the largest number of accidents occurred in the district of Highgate, and a large proportion of these were in the streets which were used by children as their playground and by full-grown persons as a footway. The difficulty in enforcing the law arises from the necessity of proving "furious driving." The race must be a matter of opinion, and the evidence of the police is very liable to be questioned. However, it is the intention of the Chief Commissioner of Police to increase the number of the police in crossings and busy thoroughfares; but his success cannot be complete without the co-operation of the passengers themselves, who often display an extraordinary indifference to danger. With respect to the Question of the noble Lord the Member for East Suffolk (Viscount Mahon), I admit the evil. I think that loitering or crawling cabs add much to the obstruction of traffic, and to the safety of even prudent passengers; but the war waged by the Chief Commissioner against them was the subject of continual expostulation in this House, where it seemed to me that there was a disposition to pour private convenience to public safety. Crawlies are largely patronised, and it is difficult to enforce a law when so many are conspiring against it, and the magistrates show a disinclination to convict except where actual obstruction is proved. The number of cabs has increased from 5,687 in 1869 to 8,160 in 1872, and there will be a very large increase during this year. The Chief Commissioner has done what he could to diminish any justification for loitering by increasing the number of standings from 292 in 1868 to 498 in 1872. During the last year 1,383 summonses were taken out against loitering cabs.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES—SALFORD AND MANCHESTER

QUESTION.

MR. CAWLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, How it has come to pass that in a Return to this House, bearing date "7 May 1873," and authenticated by his signature, "of all places in England and Wales having Stipendiary Magistrates, with the dates of their first appointment, and their present salaries," there is no mention made of the borough of Salford and the division of Manchester, for which places there is a Stipendiary Magistrate; and, if he can inform the House whether there is any other place not mentioned in the Return which has a Stipendiary Magistrate?

MR. BAXTER said, the reason of the omission was, that Salford was in the Duchy of Lancaster.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA—REVIEW IN WINDSOR PARK.

QUESTIONS.

MR. WALSH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any space will be set aside in Windsor Park, on the occasion of the Review before the Shah of Persia, for the carriages of such Members of both Houses of Parliament as may wish to witness the Review?

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any arrangements will be made for giving opportunity to the Members of both Houses of Parliament to attend the proposed review of troops in Windsor Great Park, on the 24th instant?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I must premise by saying that the arrangements in Windsor Park are not under my direction; but I have informed myself upon the subject in order to be able to answer these Questions. Arrangements have been made to enable Members of this House to witness the Review, and His Royal Highness Prince Christian, the Ranger of Windsor Park, has sent to Mr. Speaker 500 tickets for the Stand and 50 for carriages within the enclosure.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What facilities it is intended by Her Majesty's Government to afford to Members of the House and their families who wish to be present at the Naval and Military Reviews about to take place in honour of the Shah of Persia?

MR. GOSCHEN said, that he had been requested by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to answer in regard to the proposed arrangements. In order to prevent disappointment, he must repeat that the gathering of ships at Portsmouth would not be a Review. There would be no evolutions, but simply a gathering of ships. On the occasion of the visit of the Sultan, arrangements were made for a formal Review; but the weather being unfavourable it ended in a simple inspection. There would now be two naval inspections—one at Dover, where a large squadron—in fact, two squadrons—would meet the Shah, and an inspection at Portsmouth, which would not have the same interest as if there were evolutions. With regard to the attendance of hon. Members at Portsmouth, the Government had found themselves in a position of some difficulty. According to the precedent of the Sultan's visit, they would have issued about 3,500 tickets, would have hired special trains, and provided at Portsmouth an entertainment, of the cost of which he could give some notion when he said that in the case of one ship, which accommodated 300 visitors, a bill was sent in for £450. If the same general issue of tickets had been repeated on the present occasion, it would not have cost less than £8,000 or £9,000, including the chartering of steamers. Finding it would be inexpedient to distribute tickets broadcast, it had been resolved to gratify the natural wish of hon. Members of the Houses of Parliament to be present in a way which was most compatible with the public interest. There would be no special trains provided, and instead of chartering a steamer, the Government proposed to appropriate to the service two steamers already at their disposal, and such arrangements would be made as would prevent hon. Members being under the necessity of having recourse to the hospitality of Naval Officers. He purposed placing himself in communication with Mr. Speaker as to the best mode of ascertaining the wishes of those who might wish to be present.

In reply to Viscount GALWAY,

MR. CARDWELL, said, tickets had been sent to Mr. Speaker for Members and their friends.

THE MAURITIUS—ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, considering the opposition shown by members of all religious denominations in Mauritius, and the strong and so far successful resistance made in the Legislative Council, to the proposed disestablishment and disendowment scheme propounded by the Colonial Office, the Secretary of State for the Colonies will undertake to direct the Acting Governor of that Colony not to take any further steps towards an alteration of the existing Law affecting ecclesiastical establishments until the inhabitants shall have had sufficient time to make their views known, and, if necessary, until the subject shall have been discussed and decided by Parliament?

MR. KNATCHBULL-EUGESSEN: I hope, Sir, that the Papers in connection with this Question will be delivered to-morrow. By them my hon. and gallant Friend will find that we have anticipated his wishes, and that the Officer administering the Government of Mauritius has been instructed to defer the legislation in question until full time has been given for considering the views expressed by the colonists.

ARMY—DEPUTY ASSISTANT ADJUTANT GENERAL FOR MUSKETRY.

QUESTION.

MR. MALCOLM asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Officers holding the post of Deputy Assistant Adjutant General for Musketry are to be made supernumerary in their regiment according to section 21, Clause 207, of the Royal Warrant of December 1871?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the Royal Commission on Military Education recommended that the inspection of musketry in the various military districts should be intrusted to officers on the Adjutant General's Staff in the respective districts. This recommendation has been carried into effect, and, like other Staff officers of their rank, the officers discharging this duty are no longer supernumerary.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS—CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he wished to put a Question with reference to the course of Business that evening. The second Order of the Day was the Adjourned Debate upon the proposed confirmation of the Mail Contract between the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar. He, therefore, wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he intends to proceed this evening with the Motion for the confirmation of the Contract for the conveyance of the Mails between the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar with the Union Steamship Company; and, whether his attention had been called to an omission on the part of the Treasury which he (Mr. Bouverie) imagined rendered it impossible to go on with that Motion until the omission had been supplied? The Standing Order of the House of 24th July, 1860, required that all Contracts extending over a period of years, creating a public charge, actual or prospective, for the conveyance of Mails by sea, should be laid upon the Table of the House immediately, if Parliament be sitting, or within fourteen days after its assembling, accompanied by a Treasury Minute setting forth the grounds on which they had proceeded in authorizing it. The Contract in question was entered into on the 8th of May of the present year, and was duly laid on the Table of the House in compliance with the Standing Order; but he found, on inquiry at the Library, that there was an entire omission to lay on the Table any Minute of the Lords of the Treasury. There was a letter of a Clerk of the Treasury appended to the Contract; but that was not a Minute of the Lords of the Treasury; and the best evidence that no such interpretation could be put upon this letter was, that to each of the other Contracts upon this subject, of which there were three, which had been entered into in the course of the last six months, there had been appended, in accordance with the Standing Order, a Minute of the Lords of the Treasury setting forth their reasons for approving of the Contract. Under those circumstances, he apprehended that it would not be competent to the House to proceed with the consideration of the Contract until such time as the Minute had been laid on the Table.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it had been the intention of the Government to proceed that evening with the Zanzibar Contract; but since the meeting of the House it had been intimated to him that a difficulty of the nature referred to by his right hon. Friend existed. The difficulty, as he understood, was a purely formal one. The common practice was to lay the Contract upon the Table together with the Correspondence, which Correspondence contained the view of the Government with respect to the Contract; but, in compliance with an Order of the House, there was likewise a formal Minute referring the House to the Contract and Correspondence; and he believed that, in that instance, the mistake had been committed of omitting to supply the formal Minute. The question became one entirely of the Orders and Rules of the House, and he thought it would be convenient if Mr. Speaker would give his judgment in the question, whether the Orders of the House had been so far complied with that they might proceed with the Motion. If the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman should be that the Orders of the House had not been complied with, then the proper course, he apprehended, would be to move that the Order for the resumption of the Adjourned Debate should be discharged, and to give fresh Notice on the subject.

MR. SPEAKER: Before the meeting of the House the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock drew my attention to the matter, and I have been able to inform myself on the subject. The Standing Order of which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken is very clear and explicit. It lays down the Rule, that every Packet and Telegraphic Contract shall be laid on the Table of the House, accompanied by a Minute of the Lords of the Treasury setting forth the grounds on which they have proceeded to authorize it. Now, the Contract in question has, no doubt, been laid on the Table of the House, and it has been accompanied by a letter from an officer of the Treasury to the Postmaster General; but such a letter in no sense fulfils the requirements of the Standing Orders, and therefore, in my judgment, that Contract is not in a condition to be considered in its present shape by the House. I submit, therefore, that the proper course to be taken in the matter will be, when the Order is read for resuming the Adjourned Debate, to move that the Order be discharged, and then the House will take what course it thinks proper.

MR. HUNT asked the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, Whether any reason could be given for the unusual course which had been adopted with regard to the Contract; whether any Minute has been passed by the Treasury; and, if not, whether any Minute will be passed, and when it will be laid on the Table?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the omission had not been a deliberate act; neither he nor his right hon. Friend had any cognizance of it. He would suggest that the Order should be read at once, with a view to its being discharged, and then his right hon. Friend would be able to renew his Notice of Motion for the disposal of the matter—probably, on Thursday. It would then be proper to move for a Committee to inquire into the whole question.

MR. HUNT said, he should like to know when the Government proposed to take the opinion of the House upon the Contract?

MR. GLADSTONE replied, that the Government would take it as soon as they could conveniently do so. If the Order was now discharged, the discussion might take place on Thursday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that the Order be read, for the purpose of being discharged.

Motion agreed to.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate thereupon [9th June] read, and discharged.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)
BILL—[BILL 146.]

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preliminary.

Clause 3 (Extension of Poor Rate Acts to other property).

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 23, after the word "wood," to insert the words "not being land growing saleable underwood"—(Mr. Bourverie.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. J. LOWTHER thought the subject of the rating of timber had hardly been fully considered by the Government.

MR. GOLDSMID observed that the rating of underwood was a most extraordinary anomaly, and the best way out of the difficulty would be to make underwood no longer liable to rates, and instead to rate the land upon which the underwood grew, just as the land was rated on which any other crop grew.

MR. LOPES asked the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for some explanation of the law of the case?

MR. PEASE said, that if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid) were adopted, its effect would be to land us in greater confusion than ever. The Committee, would, in fact, be repealing portions of the statute of Elizabeth. He, too, believed the whole difficulty on the subject arose from no defined principle of rating being laid down by the Government.

MR. STANSFELD said, he could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), that any difficulty was created or increased by the principles laid down in the Bill. He had promised, in reply to the right hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), to state frankly whether he found the law was as he had stated it. Now, having consulted the Law Officers of the Crown, and referred to the case on which their opinion was founded, he had no hesitation in stating that he remained of the opinion that the statement he had made was correct—that the 1st section of the Parochial Assessment Act had made no change in the law; and left the judgment of Lord Ellenborough practically unaltered. He would leave his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General to speak for himself.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the hypothetical tenant was introduced by the Parochial Assessment Act, and thus the question arose how saleable underwood should be rated. Say it was cut at the end of every seven years, then if the cutting produced £700, the hypothetical tenant would be rated at £100 a-year. That was the principle on which rent was rated in "The King v. Mirfield," and the decision so far was not disturbed by the words of the Parochial Assessment Act, that—

"The rate shall be made on an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments, rated thereunto: that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year."

after deducting therefrom certain rates and taxes and tithe-rentcharge and the average cost of insurance and such repairs and expenses as would be necessary to maintain them in the condition to command such a rent. The question then arose as to how such casual profits as saleable underwood were to be rated. The Judges decided that the words of the Act were not intended to mean that they should not rate any property except at what it could be let for one year; but that they should take the average annual value as the rent the hypothetical tenant should pay. There were a great many decisions on the subject. In the cause of "The Queen v. the South-Western Railway Company," Lord Denman said—

"It is clear that the enacting part of the Act introduced no new principle of rating. Both parties appealed equally to this criterion. The provisions of the Parochial Assessment Act declared that the principle of rating was not to be altered or affected by it. It was, therefore, important to consider how, under the law in this case, the company would have been rated if the Act had not passed."

The same thing was laid down subsequently by Mr. Justice Mellor in another case. Substantially, the Parochial Assessment Act had made no alteration in this respect. There were agricultural crops that were not cut within the year, and they must be rated entirely on the same principle as saleable underwood cut every seven years. The average value was to be ascertained for the term, dividing it by the number of years, less discount. That would give the average sum on which the premises ought to be rated.

SIR HENRY HOARE hoped the Government would accept the proposal on the Paper, that land of the kind in question should not be assessed at a higher value than if it had been used for a plantation or wood. That would make the whole thing clear.

MR. DENT hoped the question would be settled without any legal dispute. The simplest way would be to take the woods at the agricultural value of corresponding land and rate them accordingly.

MR. BEACH thought that, with respect to saleable underwood, it would be best to act upon the law as it stood. It would be manifestly unjust to place the rating on the land rather than on the underwood.

MR. STANSFELD said, there were two questions which seemed to him to have been somewhat confused on the present occasion. One of these questions was, whether it would not be better and simpler to take saleable underwoods out of the Act of Elizabeth, and deal with them by one enactment. He thought that was a question upon which it would be advisable to arrive at a decision before they came to the question as to the method of valuation of plantations and underwoods.

MR. CLARE READ thought it was essential that saleable underwood should be taken out of the Act of Elizabeth; otherwise there would be the danger that ground under the composite crop of saleable underwood and timber might be rated under both of those heads.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE pointed out that, as by the Act of Elizabeth saleable underwood might be rated, and it was proposed by the present Bill to rate plantations, the grower of a composite crop might be rated twice over—as a grower of underwood, and, secondly, as a grower of an acreage of timber, which might be computed to its full extent. He thought that if they repealed that portion of the Act of Elizabeth which exceptionally rated the growing crop of underwood, assessment committees could in each case fairly go into the value of the land. Every tract of woodland should pay one rate, irrespective of whether it was covered with timber or underwood.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he had known in extreme cases, in the county of Kent, underwood of 10 years' growth sold at £1 and £40 per acre; although, in the latter case, of course, the net profit was not £40, but, if the average expenses were taken at 50 per cent it would leave the net value of the land something under £2 per acre, regard being had to the fact that the rent was for nine years a deferred one. From this the House would see what differences existed in the value of the underwood to be rated, and he (Mr. Goldsmid) could only repeat that in his opinion the best way out of them was to take underwood from the assessment and repeal the exemption in the Act of Elizabeth, and allow the land on which underwood and timber grew to be rated and pay all that it ought to pay.

MR. LOPES expressed his dissent from what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, with reference to the decision of Lord Ellenborough in regard to the rating of saleable underwood, and asked, if the Parochial Assessment Act was not to apply to the rating of woods and plantations, how the latter were to be rateable? Would the assessment committee rate them upon the principle of what, a tenant from year to year would give for them? The whole thing appeared to him to be left to mere guess-work, so far as the Bill before the House was concerned.

MR. DODSON maintained that underwood should be left in its present position as regarded rating, otherwise, in many cases, owners of underwood would escape with lighter rates than hitherto. The Bill before the House was not one for reducing the rating of underwood.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM was of opinion that to repeal the Act of Elizabeth, as had been suggested, would be likely to be a dangerous step, seeing it had existed for 300 years, and that a great many judicial decisions had been pronounced upon it. He should support the Amendment, which, if carried, would prevent a double rating.

COLONEL BARTELOT thought it would be better to leave the Act as it stood with regard to the rating of underwood, because there was no difficulty in understanding the law. If it was saleable underwood it was not to be rated as timber-growing land.

Mr. MUNTZ said, the measure they were passing would interfere considerably with the Act of Elizabeth, because one of its most important clauses would make perpetual an annual Act to exempt stock-in-trade from rating. If the Committee were at liberty to make so great a change, surely they might repeal that part of the Act of Elizabeth which referred to underwood, and he did not see how the Committee could meet the difficulty without doing so.

Mr. CAWLEY said, the difficulty of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), in accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), might be met by introducing the words, "not being land used solely for the growing of saleable underwood." That would leave such land under the Act of Elizabeth, and land growing timber would come under the measure.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) was extremely favourable to persons growing saleable underwood and timber together, and he did not think it would effect the object desired. The worst saleable underwood grew along with timber trees; but it was saleable, and therefore would be rated at the lowest rate, while the land would escape so far as the timber was concerned. This was not what was intended; and his impression was, that the best way to deal with the matter was to take care in future rating that we dealt with the land as far as we could, whatever it grew. If we went on balancing one thing against another, as saleable underwood against timber, we should find that we were reducing instead of increasing the rates.

Mr. STANSFELD said, that having heard the arguments on both sides of the question, he was disposed to take the view just stated. There would be nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the Bill in taking saleable underwood out of the Act of Elizabeth, the simplicity of which he admitted; but it was felt that to adopt that course, and to enact for the first time that growing underwood should be subject to rateability, would produce some disturbance of the law as it had been laid down by the Courts, and therefore it would be wise to find a solution of the difficulty without dealing with the Act of Elizabeth. He would suggest that saleable underwood should be left rateable, as now, and that to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) should be added the words, "not being land growing saleable underwood." Then, adopting the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, provision should be made for the case of mixed crops of timber and saleable underwood, by declaring that the value of the timber should be included in assessing the value of the underwood. ["Oh, oh!"] He did not say this course might not be open to some objection, but still it appeared to him to be the best.

Mr. HUNT said, the plan had not the advantage of simplicity, and he preferred the simpler plan of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) which followed Scotch precedent. At first, it was denied by the Government that there was any difficulty for the House to solve, but now it was admitted there was.

Mr. GOLDSMID said, the plan proposed was so complicated, that no assessment committee in the county of Kent would know how to work it. The plan of the hon. Member for South Norfolk commended itself by its simplicity, and it followed the precedent of Scotland, where land was rated, and not the crop which grew upon it. In fact, it would be just as reasonable to rate the cabbages in a kitchen garden instead of rating the kitchen garden, or the wheat instead of the land on which it grew.

Colonel RUGGLES-BRICE said, he was prepared, as an owner of woodlands, to submit to an increase of the rates on that portion of his property, on the full understanding that such increase should not be made until the question how far the local burdens were to be relieved by Imperial taxation was settled.

Mr. CLARE READ said, he objected strongly to the principle that the same land was to be subjected to a double assessment, as would be the case under this measure.

Mr. BOUVERIE said, he was glad that his Amendment had given rise to a valuable discussion. In moving the Amendment, he had pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman that he was proposing to rate not only the woods on their estimated annual value, but also the land upon which such woods grew. Such a proposal in his (Mr. Bouverie's) opinion was quite preposterous. In the West of England there were vast tracts of underwood which grew upon very poor land, which was fit for nothing else; and the result would be, if those underwoods were rated as well as the land, that every effort would be made to destroy them, which would have a very deleterious effect upon the climate. In France, it having been shown that the destruction of woods rendered the climate arid, there was a positive law to prevent their being cut down. The practical conclusion that he had come to was that if, upon the whole, the Committee preferred the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read)—under which the land on which underwood grew should be assessed at its rateable value as unimproved land—to that which he had moved, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. STANSFELD said, he would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) on the understanding that it was not to be assumed that the Committee, in assenting to the Amendment, expressed any opinion on the subject of how lands covered with underwoods were to be valued.

MR. FLOYER thought that, instead of making progress, the Committee were going back; because last week, on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire (Lord George Cavendish) it was decided that land growing timber should not be subject to rates. It was now proposed to take a course which would disturb the assessments in every Union in the whole country, and that for no good at all. As to the rating of woods which had been planted for centuries, who could tell what was their value when they were planted, or what was the improved value of them? If they wanted to assess woods and plantations, let them do so; but do not let them do it in a way which would lead to difficulties and litigation altogether uncalled for. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) would persevere with his Amendment.

LORD HENLEY suggested the insertion of the following words, "where ther growing timber or saleable underwood, or both."

MR. HENLEY thought that as the words "growing timber" had been struck out of the Bill, it had become immaterial whether the words which were under discussion were put in the Bill or not.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. STANSFELD proposed, in order to carry out the intention of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) to insert in page 1, line 22, after the words "lands used for plantation," "or for the growth of saleable underwood."

MR. DODSON thought the former Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was preferable to that which he had subsequently suggested, inasmuch as the latter appeared to be ambiguous.

MR. HUNT hoped a Law Officer would tell the Committee whether "wood" would not cover saleable underwood.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I think not.

MR. HERMON thought the right principle was to rate land and not woods.

MR. STANSFELD said, that if it were considered desirable by the draftsman that the Amendment should be modified, it should be done on the Report.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH moved in page 1, line 22, after "wood," the addition of the following Proviso:—

"Provided, That such land shall not be assessed at a higher annual value than it would have been assessed at if it had not been used as a plantation or wood."

He was willing to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) if the House preferred it.

MR. PERCY WYNNDHAM trusted that the Amendment would be withdrawn; because if it were adopted, it would be in the nature of a direction to assessment committees, that they might rate land upon which timber was growing as high as they rated the adjoining land.

MR. CLARE READ said, he believed that there was very little difference between the Amendment and the following one which stood in his name; but certainly the Amendment of the noble Lord did not instruct the assessment committee upon what principles they were to assess the land. He proposed, therefore, that the Proviso should run—

“Provided, That the gross value of such land shall be taken to be the rent at which such land might, in its natural and unimproved state, be reasonably expected to let one year with another for agricultural purposes.”

These words followed the Scotch Act, substituting agricultural for pastoral purposes.

Amendment (Lord George Cavendish), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

After the word “underwood,” to insert the words, “Provided, That the gross value of such land shall be taken to be the rent at which such land might, in its natural and unimproved state, be reasonably expected to let one year with another for agricultural purposes.”—(Mr. Clare Read.)

Mr. FLOYER suggested that the condition should be “as pasture or grazing lands.”

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by leaving out the words “for agricultural purposes,” and inserting the words “as pasture or grazing land.”—(Mr. Percy Wyndham.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed. “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment.”

Mr. J. S. HARDY said, he did not like either of the Amendments. He thought it would be more satisfactory for all purposes that land should be valued according to the crop which it carried. He disapproved rating worthless woodland at the value of adjacent land. Woodland in the neighbourhood of comparatively barren fields might be properly assessed at the value of those fields; but it would be obviously improper to assess woodland at the same rate as highly cultivated farms.

Mr. J. LOWTHER suggested the time had come when some definition should be given of the words “plantation” and “wood” and “growing timber.” It sometimes took 30 years before a man who planted a wood saw the return of his money, and it was not good policy to discourage the planting of timber. He asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would object to the addition to the Amendment of the words—“And that no assessment shall be made until a saleable crop has been obtained therefrom.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL suggested that none of the proposals which had been made were necessary. A simple principle had already been laid down by which the assessment value would be that which any person would give for the land as a tenant, and upon that value the land should be rated. Hitherto, land occupied for particular purposes had escaped rating altogether; but by the clause land occupied as wood, plantation, or saleable underwood was to be brought into the rating on the annual value which any person would give for it. It was a fallacy to say there was no valuable occupation of a wood except when it was cut down. That formed its greatest value, no doubt, but the produce was gathered at rare intervals. Woodland was used as cover, and it produced lop and top.

Mr. HUNT said, he did not know what lop and top a proprietor would get from his property before he felled his timber. There was some timber which grew for three lives before it was cut down, and how could there be a revenue in the meantime out of which to pay the rates? There ought to be some provision introduced to enable a limited owner to cut wood under certain restrictions, otherwise the rating might soon place him in The Gazette. He begged to direct the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General as to the annual value of wood before the trees were cut.

Mr. PEASE said, that the Committee had, in that matter, another instance of the blindness with which the Bill had been brought before the House. His right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board must know that from 15 to 20 years after a wood was planted, so far from there being any return, there was considerable expense attending it. He would submit that the words “in its natural and unimproved state” should be omitted.

Colonel MERTON LEIGH said, they had been so long in a wood and involved in brambles—which in his youth they called “lawyers”—that they did not know where they were. In many places the agricultural and pastoral value of woods was nil. In his county (Cheshire), where they had their woods and dingles, there was generally a deep ravine, good for nothing else; but the proprietors were obliged to plant it in order to prevent the cattle getting into danger. A man with whom he had shot in that county had suggested that pheasants ought to be specially bred for the place, with legs of different lengths, so as to enable them to run along the sides of the hills.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that, according to the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), the gross value of the land should be taken to be the rent at which such land might in its natural or unimproved state be reasonably expected to let one year with another for agricultural purposes. In the county of Kent, the land which was planted was not land in its natural or unimproved state, but was very valuable, and such land might be rated far below what was fair, if the Amendment were adopted.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he had known several instances in which in the case of a railway which had been found to be unproductive, the Court of Queen's Bench had decided that the land must not be withdrawn from rateability, but must be rated on the same principle as the adjacent land; but he had never known anyone to suggest a mode by which the land could be properly rated, and therefore it had been done by agreement. It would be better, therefore, to let the overseers be guided by their own light rather than attempt to guide them.

MR. MAGNIAC objected to the words "unimproved state." He remembered that in the county from which he came, the underwood was sold to manufacturers frequently for £20 an acre, and it would be very unfair that such land should be regarded as in an unimproved state.

MR. WHARTON observed that if the Amendment were adopted, some of the most valuable crops in England, the willow beds, would be exempted from rateability. It was not at all unusual for willow beds to realize £10 per acre per annum.

MR. CLARE READ quite admitted that willow beds were exceptional, and in his part of the country, they were never regarded as underwood, but were cut every year, just as a crop of hay was taken off the land, and assessed accordingly. He did not mean to say that his Amendment was not open to some objection. It should be remembered, however, that those who had made improvements in woodlands, had done so under the idea that they would not be rateable, and it was not right to take advantage of the improvements they had made to rate them in the manner proposed.

COLONEL BARTELOT wished to know from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, how he would deal with copyhold property, where the woods belonged not to the copyholder, but to the lord of the manor? To make the copyholder pay would be manifest injustice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was afraid he would appear rather as a discredited witness, having already made one mistake. Nevertheless he believed there were profitable modes of occupying woods. He would say, if they meant to make a man pay for the value of woods, they should say so and rate him accordingly. It was perfectly true there were copyholds where the trees belonged to the lord, and the copyholder had no right to cut them down. But whatever could be ascertained to be the value of woods in the hands of the occupier, which the overseer would have to ascertain as best he might, that a tenant would give for such an occupation, and the rate should be assessed accordingly.

MR. HUNT thought the principle proposed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) was distinct and intelligible—it would be easily understood by the assessment committee, whereas the principle of the hypothetical tenant would be a puzzle which they would be unable to solve, and must lead to the greatest difference of opinion. They could not do better than accept the proposal of the hon. Member for South Norfolk, with the exception of osier beds.

MR. HIBBERT said, the Government would accept the Amendment, if the words "in its natural and unimproved state" were left out, and the words "if it has not been used as a plantation or wood" added. The Amendment would then read—

"The gross value of such land shall be taken to be the rent at which such land might be reasonably expected to let one year with another for agricultural purposes, if it has not been used as a plantation or wood."

Mr. GOLDSMID said, that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) was accepted, he should move the addition of the words, "or for the sale of the crops growing thereon," after the words "for agricultural purposes," as otherwise fresh difficulties would be created in rating land on which timber and underwood grew. He agreed with the Government that the Committee must strike out the phrase "in its natural and unimproved state."

Mr. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT said, he could not help thinking if the Shah of Persia had been present to-night, witnessing the proceedings of that honourable House, His Majesty must certainly have come to the conclusion that they did not understand what they were discussing. Without going so far as that, he would say, looking to the hopeless complication of this measure, he did not think there was any prospect of such a Bill ever passing into a law.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, if the Committee could only know what the intentions of the Government really were, there would be no difficulty in framing words to guide the overseer.

Mr. PELL said, he thought the Government must now begin to see that the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee was not unreasonable. Nothing was open to them, as far as he could see, save to accept the very sensible Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read).

Mr. HERMON said, that, as a rule, it was the worst part of an estate which was planted with wood, and that the fact ought to be taken into consideration when the property came to be rated. Considering the expense of clearing land with the remains of old wood on it, he was of opinion that it ought not to be assessed at more than half the rate of the surrounding agricultural land.

Sir GEORGE JENKINSON thought it would be well, seeing the state of confusion in which the Committee now found itself, that the point should be left open for future consideration. Land ought to be assessed for what it would produce, and not on some fictitious value.

Mr. STANSFELD was of opinion that the words proposed by the hon.

Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) would, as they stood, operate unfairly. He could not assent to a proposition which would take the valuation out of the hand of the assessment committee by laying down an arbitrary rule. He should be glad if the Committee would accept the view taken by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and leave the matter to the assessment committees. That would be the easiest course.

Mr. HUNT said, he had no doubt it would be the easiest course; but if the Committee itself could not settle the difficulties, he despaired of assessment committees being able to do so. He understood an hour ago that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was prepared to accept the Amendment, and that it was because of an intimation to that effect that the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire (Lord George Cavendish) had been withdrawn.

Mr. STANSFELD said, he had not accepted the Amendment, but had stated that the question which it raised was one which in his opinion ought to be settled before that of the method of valuation was raised.

Mr. HUNT certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman to favour the Amendment; but, be that as it might, he thought the Government must now acknowledge the wisdom of the course which he (Mr. Hunt) had at the outset recommended—that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. It would be better the Committee should report Progress, as the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill was unable to say what he proposed to do.

Mr. STANSFELD could not agree that it would have been better to refer this Bill to a Select Committee. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) had not shown that if this Bill had passed through a Select Committee they would have avoided the present discussion. That was a question of considerable complication on which practical knowledge was very useful, and that practical knowledge existed in the minds of a great many hon. Members of that House. It was true that the question had taken some time to discuss, but he entirely denied that time had been wasted; and he trusted they might yet come to a clear decision upon it.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that if the Committee had arrived at any conclusion he should not grudge the time that had been spent upon the question. He was, however, still unable to see on what principles the Government desired to have the land rated in the case of growing timber and saleable underwood. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had unfortunately adopted the proposal of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) to include saleable underwood in the clause, and it was precisely to that decision that they owed the difficulty in which they now found themselves. Saleable underwood was sometimes an annual crop, and always a crop which might be safely computed upon an annual average, and therefore it had been rated on that average. The law in that respect required no alteration whatever. The question was how land should be rated upon which timber was grown, and no one on his side of the House wished to diminish the rateable value of the land on which saleable underwood was grown. He thought it would have been better to have had this discussion upstairs. At all events, if the Bill had gone before a Select Committee, it would have compelled the Government to make up their minds, and to offer some proposal on the subject. The fairest way out of the difficulty would be to report Progress. [Cries of "Move!"] He would accordingly move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. STANSFELD opposed the Motion. The hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was in error in throwing upon the Government the responsibility of a proposal which came from the Opposition side of the House. He could not accept the Amendment as it now stood, because the hon. Mover framed it when there was no reference to saleable underwoods at all. He believed it would be best to follow the advice of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and leave these matters for settlement by the assessment committee.

VISCOUNT GALWAY thought that woods and plantations were very distinct, and ought to be rated differently.

MR. DODSON said, that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), omitting the words "and unimproved," and maintaining the word "natural," would be very applicable to woods and plantations. The difficulty had arisen from dealing with saleable underwood. He would suggest to his hon. Friend to leave out the words "and unimproved," maintaining the word "natural," and then to add at the end of the Amendment, "or for the sale of the underwood growing thereon." The land would then either be rated at its natural value, or the assessment committee, if it found saleable underwood upon the land, might rate it "for the sale of the underwood growing thereon."

MR. HUNT said, the proposition just made might be a very valuable one, but it was entirely new, and he should like to see it on Paper, in order that they might have an opportunity of considering it. The Government had accepted an Amendment which came from his side of the House, and he wished to know what was now the proposal of the Government, if they had a distinct one. If the Government desired to mature their thoughts let them not continue that discussion.

MR. STANSFELD objected to the doctrine that they could never accept an Amendment without reporting Progress, in order to consider what consequential Amendments were necessary. The Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had to be considered under a new aspect, in consequence of their having withdrawn saleable underwood from the Bill; but if they were never to accept an Amendment which required discussion without immediately reporting Progress they would make no progress with the Bill. He thought the words proposed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) would precisely meet the case. If they were acceptable to the hon. Member for South Norfolk they would be acceptable to the Government.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he would withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. STANSFELD then proposed to omit the words "and unimproved" from the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read).

MR. HUNT rose to Order, and asked what the question strictly before the Committee really was? They were, he thought, discussing the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) on the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read).

THE CHAIRMAN explained the question to be that the words "for agricultural purposes," proposed to be left out of the hon. Member for South Norfolk's Amendment, in order to insert, "as pasture or grazing land," stand part of the Question.

MR. CLARE READ said, the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had gone away from the House and left his Amendment in his (Mr. Read's) hands. He preferred his own words to those of that hon. Member, and therefore he was prepared to withdraw them.

MR. HUNT said, he was of opinion that the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) could not be withdrawn, unless the hon. Member were there to ask leave for so doing.

COLONEL BARTTELOT suggested that the hon. Member for West Cumberland's Amendment should be put and negatived.

MR. GLADSTONE thought there was no real difficulty about the matter. The hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had empowered the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) to deal with his Amendment as he thought fit, and the latter might therefore withdraw it.

MR. DODSON said, it was an inflexible Rule of the House that an Amendment could not be withdrawn except by the Mover. The hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) having left the House, they were therefore in this unfortunate position—that his Amendment could not be withdrawn. They had no option but to negative it; and the effect would be that they could not amend the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) by omitting the words "and unimproved." They might, however, add at the end of the words "or for the sale of the underwood growing thereon."

MR. J. G. TALBOT thought, in the dilemma in which they were placed, they had no course open to them but to report Progress, and take the Committee again to-morrow at a morning sitting.

MR. STANSFELD accepted the interpretation of the Rule of the House given by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) as authoritative—subject of course to the decision of the Chairman; but they could easily get out of their difficulty without reporting Progress by adding the words "or for the sale of the underwood growing thereon"; and then the words "and an improved" might be struck out on the Report. Would the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) agree to that course being taken.

MR. CLARE READ said he did not think it was at all necessary to omit the words proposed.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that if any hon. Member dissented from the withdrawal on any ground of an Amendment, the Amendment could not be withdrawn. Therefore, even assuming that the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had the leave of the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) it was quite clear the Amendment could not be withdrawn without the unanimous consent of the Committee. Although the practice of the House appeared to give no precedent for such a case as this, he thought it would be clearly for the convenience of the Committee if, in the accidental or inevitable absence of an hon. Gentleman, another hon. Member were distinctly delegated to withdraw an Amendment, that that authority should be respected.

MR. GOLDNEY informed the House that the late Speaker distinctly ruled that a Member having once moved an Amendment, no other Member could withdraw it.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON thought it was evident the Government did not know its own mind; and they had better for the present withdraw the disputed question of rating woods until they had had time to consider it.

MR. BEACH said, the easiest course would be to negative the Amendment now, and bring up words afterwards to effect their object.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought, on the whole, it would be better not to allow the withdrawal of the Amendment.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the words

'Provided, That the gross value of such land shall be taken to be the rent at which such land might, in its natural and unimproved state, be reasonably expected to let one year with another for agricultural purposes,' be there inserted."

MR. STANSFELD then moved to add at the end of the Proviso of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), "or for the sale of the underwood growing thereon." He also gave Notice that on the Report, he should move to omit the words, "in its natural and unimproved state," and to substitute other words in their place.

Amendment proposed, to add, at the end thereof, the words "or for the sale of the underwood growing thereon."—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. CLARE READ hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would not omit the word "natural." He did not care so much about "unimproved."

MR. STANSFELD said, the words he proposed were taken almost verbatim from the Act passed for Scotland, where he believed there had been no difficulty in ascertaining the natural value of the land.

MR. MUNTZ said, that to assess the land at the value of the sale of the underwood was a thing far beyond his comprehension. The only solution of the difficulty was to assess the ground itself in all cases.

MR. STANSFELD remarked that the Amendment, as amended, would effect exactly what the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) desired.

MR. HUNT said, it was a common thing in his part of the country to have timber growing among underwood. If, therefore, the Amendment were agreed to, it would defeat one object of the Bill, which was to bring timber under assessment.

MR. DODSON said, that the Amendment he had suggested met the difficulty as to what was to be done with composite land, on which there grew both underwood and trees. He proposed that with regard to woods and plantations the assessment committee should assess them on the value of the land for agricultural purposes; but that if the land grew underwood wholly or in part, the committee should have the option of assessing it according to the value of the underwood.

MR. CAWLEY was opposed to leaving such a matter to the discretion of the assessment committee.

MR. HIBBERT pointed out that under the Bill as it stood, the assessment committee would have an option to rate either according to acreage, or on the growth of underwood.

MR. HENLEY said, the discussion showed how utterly complicated the matter was getting, and thought that it would be better to refer the whole Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. PEASE said, that if the Committee adopted the Amendment, they would be running back over half of the ground that they had already traversed. It appeared to him that the Committee ought to rate the land at its value, without reference to what might be growing on it—that was to say, at what it would let for. He would give no alternative to the assessment committee.

MR. RYLANDS said, that timber was an ornamental appendage to large estates; but what the country desired was that it should bear its fair share of rateable burdens, and be brought fairly and fully into assessment.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), that the Question was, that the words "or for the sale of the underwood growing thereon" should be added to the clause.

MR. LIDDELL said, that if the assessment committees were to create a tenth part of the quibbles raised in that House they would never get a rate at all. He was opposed to the principle of laying down rules to guide these bodies too strictly. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had not been fairly treated with regard to his Amendment, for he was the only man who had come forward with a really practical proposal—namely, to rate this land on its agricultural value. The best plan would be to adopt that broad principle, and to leave it to the assessment committees to carry it out.

MR. LOPES wished the Committee to understand how the question stood. They had taken "saleable underwood" out of the Act of Elizabeth, and it was now proposed in this Bill to rate it precisely as it was rated under the statute of Elizabeth. Nothing could be gained by this. Such a course would, if agreed to, result in a piece of legislation which would be a disgrace to the country.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that in the case of land covered with underwood, such land could not be rated at its "natural and unimproved" value, for the growth of underwood was an improvement in the value of the land, because underwood would not grow unless it was planted. He should propose to add the words "when used as a plantation or wood." That would fairly separate the two classes of cases.

MR. STANSFELD said, he should propose to substitute the word "growth" for the word "sale," in the proposed Amendment, leaving himself at liberty to propose the necessary consequential Amendments on the Report.

Amendment to the said proposed Amendment amended, by leaving out the word "sale," and inserting the word "growth," instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words 'or for the growth of the underwood growing thereon,' be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 74: Majority 14.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. CORRANCE, in rising to move an Amendment of the 3rd sub-section of the clause, which says that the poor rate assessment shall extend to rights of shooting and fishing, said, he thought it must now be apparent that the desire to refer the Bill to a Select Committee was not unreasonable, and that it was not a satisfactory course to throw these clauses together in the form of a mere outline for the House to fill up. He wanted the clause to be made more distinct, so that assessment committees should not have to hear over again questions which had long been decided in the Courts. It had not been usual in England to assess these rights; but it by no means followed that such rights did not exist. It had been laid down by the Law Courts that they did, when they were profitable; the Bill added little to these decisions, and it did not define the rights in any way. It therefore became necessary to inquire under what circumstances they could become profitable. It might be imagined from the clause that committees were to assess these rights in all cases; but it could only be intended that they should do so in special cases. His object was to make the clause a little more definite. He did not see why it should not be at once enacted that all shooting should be assessable at the sum at which it was let. That would include the cases of its being in the hands of the occupier of the lands, or the landlord reserving it at a certain value, and of the game being let. In Scotland they seemed to have a clear understanding on this subject, and he himself had been charged by a sharp parish officer 1s. 6d. poor's rate assessment upon a week's shooting. Nor did he complain of that, for he thought the officials there acted quite within their rights. As far as he had been able to trace, a case unprovided for here was that in which shooting gave an accessory value to a house, and he wished the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to confer on local assessment committees the right of assessing within the Union limits all the enhanced value which the possession of such shooting gave to the house. He therefore moved after the words "fowling, shooting, sporting, and fishing" in the clause to leave out "although," and insert the words "when let separately or as accessory to the annual value of any mansion or dwelling house."

MR. WEST did not think the Amendment necessary, and the effect of it might be disadvantageous, and lead to all manner of difficulties. He thought it better to pass the sub-section as it was.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he objected to rating moors for shooting where they were not let at a rental by the owners for that special purpose, and a profit made thereby. As the clause stood, it would in fact fine a landlord for the possession of such an estate, because the assessment committee might say—"If you do not let the shooting, you might have done so, and we therefore assess you on the rental you might have had."

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, in his county the owners of moors and shootings, as a rule, did not let them, but reserved them for their own use and that of their friends. He wished that were the universal practice. But he agreed that wherever shootings were let there was a reasonable ground for assessing them to the rates.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the true principle was to bring under assessment all uncultivated land, whether let or not. In Scotland the practice was only to assess game when it was let.

MR. LOPES asked for a definition of the word "severed?"

MR. STANHOPE said, that grouse-shooting in Yorkshire was often of considerably more value than the occupation of the land, and what he wished was that there should be some fair limitation in the mode of assessing the right to shoot, so that an exceptional rent which might be given by the hypothetical tenant should not be accepted as the fair value.

MR. LIDDELL said, that the loud complaints, especially in Scotland, did not arise from landlords exercising their right to preserve game, but from what had become a habit at the present day—namely, letting the right of shooting game. Great capitalists, wealthy manufacturers, took estates entirely for the purpose of preserving game. They paid enormous rents and raised an enormous head of game, and they sold such large quantities of game that they received back a considerable return in the shape of money. That was a system they were free to adopt, but if they adopted it they ought to pay their proper share to the rates. He, however, thought it was a detestable system of selling game at all.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL explained, in reply to the hon. Member for Launceston (Mr. Lopes), that "severed" meant separated. He supported the clause, for the reason that whether the shootings were let by the owner to a tenant or kept in his own hands, there was equally a profit derived from them, and they ought to be rated. As population and wealth had increased, the desire of sporting had also increased, while the quantity of land had not increased, and thus the right of shooting had become very valuable. In the old times referred to by the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire (Lord George Cavendish), it should be remembered that the sale of game was prohibited; but now game was sent wholesale to the poulterers by owners and tenants of shootings alike, for a profit. The assessment committee would find out what a shooting would let for, and rate it accordingly. The assessment committee would have much more difficult problems to solve than this. It was difficult to say on what principle a proprietor whose shooting brought him in £500 a-year and the land exactly the same sum should pay poor rates on the one £500, but not on the other.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS doubted not that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had a practical knowledge of the law, but did not think he had a practical knowledge of shooting. He (Mr. Cross) was in favour of rating the right to shoot, but care should be taken that great injustice was not done in attempting to rate it. In the cases of properties which were let, there was clearly a rent on which the man ought to pay, and he did not think the assessment committee would have any difficulty in finding out what a landlord could let his shooting for, and assessing him accordingly. But if the assessment committees were bound to rate all those persons also who had the right of shooting over their own land, they could not distinguish how far the owner chose to exercise that right, whether he shot one day in the year or 100.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL referred to the Parochial Assessment Act to show that where the hereditament was reserved the owner should be rated at the net annual value. If the shooting was let, it would be easy to find out the rent received and rate the owner accordingly.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if, as the Bill proposed, an addition should be made to the statute of Elizabeth, it should be made when there was a severed right of sporting, because under that statute the right of sporting was assessed in union with the occupation of the soil. That was in accordance with a recent decision. In the case of the Guardians of Battle, it was held where a landowner occupied his own land and let the shooting, he should be rated for the value of the land, and an addition be charged for the value of the shootings. He appealed, on the ground that having let the shootings they had passed out of his hands, and should not be charged in union with the land; but it was decided that where a profit was made by the game, it should be rated with the land. Therefore it was that the question of severance became very important, and the Courts had not yet decided what was a sufficient severance.

VISCOUNT GALWAY held that it was impossible to determine the value of game on any man's property in order to tax it, when everybody knew that game moved from one property to another, and was not confined to one alone. Game could be taxed only when it was let.

MR. STANSFELD quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy's) statement of the law. This was a question of severance from occupation. It was impossible to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance). Nothing could be more ill-advised or more opposed to the true interest of the owners of the soil than to make the right of sport liable to rating if let, but not liable if reserved to the owner's use. The exception was not worth proposing; and it would not be creditable, but disastrous if attempted to be carried into effect. He was prepared, however, to amend the Sub-section, by substituting for the word "although" the word "when." As to the method of ascertaining the value, that could be considered at a later period.

MR. HUNT agreed that there ought to be no distinction as to rateability, whether the right of sporting was in the hands of the owners of the soil, or was let to others. The principle advocated by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, that the right of shooting ought to be assessed at what it would reasonably let year by year would involve great difficulty, because it would depend upon the amount of game kept upon the land. He thought that the principle proposed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) to assess the land at the full rent which it might be expected to fetch, irrespective of any reservation of game and timber, was the right principle.

MR. CLARE READ said, that when game was let to the tenant, it paid both rates and taxes; when it was let to a third party it paid taxes, but no rates; but when it was left in the hands of the owner, it paid neither rates nor taxes. In a certain parish, the rental of which was under £1,000, two valuers had recently declared that the difference between the true agricultural value and the value as depreciated by the excessive quantity of game amounted to £340. Under the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance) that assessment could not be raised, and therefore he could not support it.

CAPTAIN GROVE held with the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Cavendish) that the whole system of rating game where the owner derived no benefit from letting it was wrong in principle.

MR. GREGORY thought that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was well advised in substituting the word "when" for "although." It would meet all the cases which the Committee contemplated. He should therefore support the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MUNTZ maintained that the Committee must assess in all cases or in none; and he pointed out that there would be no more practical difficulty in assessing the value of the game, than there would be in fixing the rent at which it would let.

MR. CORRANCE said, he would not press his Amendment if the Committee were adverse.

MR. SCOURFIELD complained that under the Bill, game was not treated on the same principle of rating as was applied to other descriptions of property.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 25, after the word "fishing," to insert the words "Provided, That such rights shall be let to or reserved to others than the occupiers of the soil, and provided that the land where such rights are reserved shall be assessed at a lower annual value for agricultural purposes than it would have been if such rights had not been reserved."—(Lord George Cavendish.)

MR. STANSFELD did not think that the Amendment of the noble Lord was necessary, its main object being already sufficiently met by the terms of the Bill.

MR. LOPES agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in thinking the Amendment quite unnecessary.

MR. SCLATER-BOTH, on the other hand, held that it provided for a case which was not met by the proposal of the Government—namely, the case where the game was of no value. The Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire would have the effect of requiring that there should be a bond fide head of game on the property that was to be rated.

MR. CLARE READ said, that he and the noble Lord meant the same thing. He reiterated that they must rate the land and not the produce of the land. In rating the right of sporting they were rating a special product of the land. There were hundreds and thousands of acres of land where the right of sporting was not worth 2*d.* an acre. The difference between the noble Lord and himself amounted to this—that whereas by the noble Lord's Amendment they would have two assessments and two persons assessed, by his Amendment there would be one rating and one person to pay. He thought that if they once departed from the principle of assessing the hereditament according to its value they would get into all sorts of difficulty. How would they know who rented the shooting? Whoever did so might live at a considerable distance from the place, and if they wanted to distrain how would they do so? They could not distrain on the hares and rabbits.

MR. CORRANCE thought the apprehension that had been expressed, that the land might be assessed to its full value, and that there might then be a rate for sporting, was groundless. Wherever sporting rights were reserved there was a corresponding reduction in the rent.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON observed that the hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance) spoke of arable land, but the case was very different in respect of the dairy lands of his county.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 123; Noes 250: Majority 127.

MR. STANSFELD moved, in line 26, to leave out the words "or ownership," the effect of the Amendment being to extend the Poor Rate Acts to rights of fowling, shooting, sporting and fishing, when severed from the occupation of the soil.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out the words "or ownership."—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

MR. W. EGERTON thought the Amendment, which had been suddenly proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, would not be received with great satisfaction by those who wished to have a fair settlement of this question.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. Egerton), in his opinion, had not quite caught the meaning of the Amendment. What the Government proposed was, that the right should be rated when the ownership of the soil was severed from the occupation thereof.

MR. LOPES put the case of a lord of the manor who let his right of shooting, so that it became severed from his ownership. Would it not be necessary to retain the words, "or owners thereof," to meet that case?

VISCOUNT GALWAY asked for a definition of the word "sporting" in the clause.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was much easier to ask questions of law in the House than to answer them. With regard to the meaning of the word "sporting" in the clause he did not know that it differed from shooting.

MR. HUNT asked, whether the lord of the manor could be said to occupy the commons with respect to which the question of letting arose?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL admitted that the question would require attention hereafter.

LORD JOHN MANNERS was almost afraid to ask whether the word "sporting" did not include fox hunting?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK complained that the very pertinent question of the noble Lord (Viscount Galway) had been treated with undue brevity by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General.

MR. DODSON rose to Order. The Committee had agreed to the section of the clause in which the word "sporting" occurred, and could not go back upon it.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK :
Why, then, was not the Solicitor General called to Order?

Question put, "That the words pro-
Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 88;
Noes 274: Majority 186.

MR. STANSFELD moved, at end of clause, to add—

"And the said hereditaments which are by this section made rateable to the relief of the poor shall be rateable to all county rate, borough rate, highway rate, and other local rates which are leviable upon property rateable to the relief of the poor."

MR. CLARE READ thought his proposed Amendment respecting game ought to be discussed before another subject was entered into. [Cries of "Progress."]

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Chairman report Progress."
—(Mr. James Lowther.)

MR. STANSFELD said, he would assent to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF POWIS desired to point out that an Amendment, introduced by Lord Cairns into the first clause, would have the effect of preventing anyone granting a site for a parsonage, unless as part of a grant for the site of a church. There might be a district furnished with a chapel-of-ease, which it would be desirable to erect into an independent parish, but no landowner could there make a grant for a parsonage, the grant of the church site having been already made.

LORD CAIRNS said, that the alteration would not have the effect the noble Earl supposed. At the same time he admitted the desirability of empowering gifts of sites for parsonages only, and would accept any Amendment which the noble Earl might propose at the next stage for that purpose.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK hoped the noble and learned Lord would himself frame the Amendment suggested.

Bill to be read 3^d on Monday next.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—PATRONAGE RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE rose to call the attention of their Lordships to the Law of Patronage in the Church of Scotland. He assured their Lordships that it was with some reluctance that he submitted to them the Resolution of which he had given Notice, but the post which he had had the honour of holding during the last two years of Her Majesty's High Commissioner presiding over the meetings of the General Assembly, had given him the opportunity of ascertaining the feelings and wishes, not only of the clergy, but also of the laity of the established Church of Scotland on the subject of patronage.
When he found that an hon. Member of the House of Commons (Sir Robert Anstruther) had given Notice of a Motion on the subject, he (the Earl of Airlie) thought it might be well if their Lordships, who were fully competent to discuss a question of that kind, should also have the opportunity of debating it. There was one convenience in eliciting an expression of opinion from their Lordships on the subject, because in this House the interests of patronage were largely represented. He supposed there was in that House scarcely a noble Lord connected with Scotland who had not the patronage of one or more livings, and some Members had in their gift a large number of benefices. The subject was so closely interwoven with the ecclesiastical history of Scotland that it would be necessary for him to trouble their Lordships at some length; but he would state his case as briefly as possible, and he would only touch upon what appeared to him to be the salient points. About 40 years ago this question of patronage, having lain dormant a considerable time, began to attract the attention of Parliament, and in 1834 a Committee was appointed by the other House to inquire into the subject. That Committee was composed of the unusually large number of 40 Members, amongst whom were such eminent men as Sir George Grey and the late Sir Robert Peel. In their Report, which they laid on the Table at the end of the Session, they did not make any specific recommendation—and he believed they did not ask to sit again—but they had taken a large and valuable body of evidence. The very first witness examined was Mr. Dunlop, a member of the Scotch Bar, who afterwards sat for many years in the other House of Parliament. He gave a very interesting and clear statement of the state of things as regarded patronage before the Reformation. He said:—

“The parochial churches of Scotland were prior to the Reformation, divided into two classes. The one class was of “patronate churches,” which were subject to the patronage either of the King or of private laymen, or of Bishops or ecclesiastical bodies, such as abbacies, priories, and chapters. The ministers of such patronate churches were presented by those patrons, and enjoyed the right to the tithes of the benefice as proper rectors or parsons. The rest of the parochial churches had, prior to the Reformation, been conveyed absolutely by the patrons to bishops, to abbacies, and to the different ecclesiastical communities, and annexed thereto, whereby they became what was termed patrimonial. The Bishop or ecclesiastical establishment to which they were thus conveyed drew the whole tithes of the benefice, and stood in the place of the parson or rector, while the cure was served by a substitute appointed by the Bishop or ecclesiastical community, or sometimes merely by a member of such community. The appointment of these stipendiary substitutes was not a civil right of patronage, but an ecclesiastical right of nominating a substitute to perform the duty of these charges whereof the Bishop or ecclesiastical community hold the proper title of parson. As to these patrimonial churches, consequently the patronage no longer existed, and there could be no room for its exercise, because the parochial benefice never became vacant, being always filled, either by the Bishop, as attached to his Bishopric, or by the ecclesiastical community—an undying corporation. The right of patronage therefore of all these annexed or patrimonial churches was in fact sunk, and the right of the original patron entirely relinquished.”

In support of this position Mr. Dunlop quoted Lord Stair, whom he termed the highest authority on the subject. The whole number of parochial benefices at the time of the Reformation was about 940, of which only 262, or between one-third and one-fourth of the whole number, were in the gift of patrons. This distinction was of some importance, because of the legislation which followed thereupon. An Act was passed in 1567, which provided “that the examination and admission of Ministers within this realm be only in the power of the Kirk now openly and publicly professed within the samin.” Subject to reservation, the presentation of the kirk patronage always reverted to the just and ancient patrons. But by the first Book of Discipline, which constituted the law of the Church (1560), each congregation was to elect its own minister, subject to examination by the Presbytery. In 1581 this mode of appointment appeared to have been reversed, and the presentation was made by the Presbytery, subject to the assent of the congregation. On the accession of James VI. to the Crown of Scotland, he began to erect those prelaties which were not bishoprics into temporal lordships, and he conferred on the “lords of erection” as they were called, the patronage of the livings which were annexed to those prelaties. In 1591, to put a stop to these proceedings an Act was passed which declared all such erections, with certain specified exceptions, to be null and void. Notwithstanding the Act, and in spite of the remonstrance of the kirk, the erection of those lordships went on. When he came to the throne of England under the title of James I., he took a further step, and in 1606, when he attempted and partially succeeded in forcing episcopacy on Scotland, and in restoring the prerogatives of the Bishops, he gave back to the Bishops the rights of presentation which had been taken from them. Charles I. endeavoured to continue the policy of his father, but he was not successful. He became involved in difficulties with both his English and Scotch subjects—their Lordships would remember the picturesque relation by Sir Walter Scott of the story of Jenny Geddes. He was sorry to say that the latest historians of Scotland threw much doubt on the story, and though not denying the old lady's existence, described her, not as a staunch Presbyterian, but as a red-hot Papist—but in 1638, when Presbyterianism was again established, the appointment of ministers to livings was placed on the same footing as it had been prior to 1606—that was to say, Presbyteries were substituted in the place of Bishops as to the appointment of ministers to bishopric churches on the suit and calling of the congregation. In 1642, when Charles I. found himself in great difficulties with his Parliament, and when he was ready to promise almost anything to the Presbyterians in order to conciliate the Scotch, he agreed that as to the churches under His Majesty, as patron, the Presbytery, with the consent of the congregation, should tender a list of three candidates, of whom His Majesty was to choose one; and he further agreed that as to the highland parishes of Scotland they should present only one person—that was, the Presbytery and the congregation should in fact appoint to the living. In 1649 an Act was passed which abolished the right of patrons to present, and vested the right of election in the people and the Presbytery. By these successive Acts, taken together, patronage might be said to have been entirely abolished. At the Restoration all the Acts from 1640 downwards were repealed, and the King's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters was declared; and in 1662 all the ministers who had been appointed since 1640 were ejected. He (the Earl of Airlie) had now traced the course of events with perhaps somewhat tedious minuteness, because he wished to show that this question of patronage was one which had long engaged the attention of the Scotch people, as well as of their clergy; that the controversy about it was not trifling or superficial, but one whose roots lay deep, and because he wished to show also that from a very early period the strength of patronage had varied with the strength of Presbyterianism; that when Presbyterian principles were triumphant, patronage was in abeyance; and that when, on the other hand, the power of the Crown in ecclesiastical matters prevailed, patronage revived. If they marked what followed, their Lordships would not fail to perceive the same close connection between patronage and the power of the law in ecclesiastical affairs. At the Revolution, William III. declared his intention of placing the affairs of the Kirk of Scotland on a footing which should be satisfactory to the people; and immediately on the Convention of 1689 being turned into a Parliament, Prelacy was abolished, the Acts declaratory of the King's supremacy in matters spiritual and ecclesiastical were repealed by an Act of 1690, and the provisions of the Act of 1592, whereby Presbyteries were bound to appoint any minister who might be presented by the King or by a lay patron, were repealed. Patronage was regulated by a subsequent Act of 1690, and the right of presenting was given to the elders along with the heritors of the parish, being Protestants. They were to present a person to the congregation, who were to approve or disapprove, and the whole matter was then to be referred to the Presbytery, who were to decide. The patron was to receive all teinds to which no one else could show an heritable title, and a payment of 600 merks in lieu of the right of presenting, and on obtaining this sum he was bound to execute a renunciation of his right in favour of the parish. Patronage was restored by the Act of Queen Anne. The Act of 1712 passed through the House of Commons almost before anything was known about it in Scotland, and before any effectual steps could be taken; but a strong remonstrance was sent up by certain ministers, and afterwards adopted by the General Assembly. In that remonstrance it was stated that the Act was in violation of the Treaty of Union, by which the constitution of the Kirk was secured. For many years—up to about 1780, he believed—the Assembly continued to protest and remonstrate. The Act was so unpopular that for many years it was hardly ever put in force.

When patrons began to avail themselves of their strict legal rights a very large secession took place, caused in a great measure, though not entirely, by the exercise of patronage. Among the many distinguished Scotchmen who considered that the Act of Queen Anne violated the Treaty of Union were Sir David Dalrymple, Solicitor General, and Lord President Dundas, both of them Commissioners for the Treaty of Union. That opinion had been held by many eminent Scotchmen, amongst whom he might mention Dr. Begg, one of the most distinguished leaders of the Free Church. He, in a pamphlet recently published, stated that—

“The Church of Scotland took instant alarm, being convinced that her worst fears were realized when she saw this Bill first introduced. At a meeting of the Commission of the Assembly, Carstairs, Blackwell, and Bailie were sent to London with a strong remonstrance, and instructions to offer the utmost opposition to the measure. But so rapid were the movements of the enemy that by the time they reached London in those days of slow travelling, the Bill had passed the Commons and been taken to the House of Lords. The Lords consented to hear them by counsel on the subject, and although their plea was as righteous as any ever submitted to a human tribunal, so determined were the enemies of the Church that they heard the counsel for these Commissioners, read the Bill a second time, committed it, reported it, and read it a third time, all in one day—namely, the 12th of April. On the 14th it was returned to the House of Commons with Amendments, which being agreed to without opposition, the Bill received the Royal Assent by Queen Anne on the throne on the 22nd of April, the whole transaction being completed in little more than a month.”

For many years the Assembly never ceased to protest against the restoration of patronage. Without pretending to decide whether the eminent men to whom he had referred were right in the construction they put on the Treaty, it was impossible for anyone who looked back on Scottish history from the Reformation down to the time of Queen Anne, not to see that patronage was most flourishing precisely during those periods which a zealous Presbyterian would regard with the greatest dislike and antipathy. It was abolished at the Reformation in respect of the great majority of livings; it was restored by James I. when he endeavoured to force Episcopacy on Scotland; it was abandoned by Charles I. when he was so hard pressed that he was ready to promise anything to the Presbyterians; it was renewed at the Restoration; it was suppressed by William III. more completely than at any previous or subsequent period; and it was re-instated by the Act of Queen Anne at a time when the doctrine of passive obedience and the highest of High Church dogmas were in full vigour. Looking at these circumstances, there need be no wonder that in the minds of zealous Presbyterians patronage was identified with those things most hateful to that which they designated Erastianism and Prelacy, nor that fervent Presbyterians of the present time should look back to those periods when patronage did not exist as to the palmy days of the Kirk. For about 50 years subsequent to 1780 the subject of patronage seemed to have dropped a good deal out of sight. It was very natural, calling to mind the great and exciting political events that were taking place towards the end of the last and the beginning of this century, that there should not have been much room in men's minds for controversies as to form of Church government. But about 40 years ago it became clear that in Scotland the attention of the people was again being turned to the question of patronage. Then followed in rapid succession the contest about the induction of a minister which was known as the Auchterarder Case, the case of the Strathbogie Minister, and the great Disruption of 1843, when many of the most zealous, ablest, and most learned and distinguished, both among the clergy and the laity, left the Church rather than acquiesce in a state of things which they looked upon as intolerable. Shortly after the mischief had been done Parliament endeavoured to apply a remedy by passing the Act commonly known as Lord Aberdeen's Act. Under that Act, which was now in force, the members of a congregation might object to a presentee, and might lay their objections before the Presbytery, from whom there was an appeal to the Synod, and in the last resort to the General Assembly. These Church Courts might reject or approve of the presentee. No doubt Lord Aberdeen's Act might have checked the abuse of patronage to a considerable extent, but he did not think it could be said that the state of things which it had brought about was altogether satisfactory. On the contrary, it appeared to him that the cases which arose from time to time under the operations of this Act went far to justify the misgivings which Lord Aberdeen's published correspondence with the late Dr. Chalmers showed that he entertained with respect to the probable working of such a law as that which was now in force. Every presentee was liable to have his settlement disputed in a long and costly litigation. He was liable, moreover, not only to have his abilities and opinions, but also his manner, his voice, his temperament, even his personal appearance, made the subject of most insidious and offensive popular attacks, and this publicly, formally, and in a legal Court, before which every dissatisfied parishioner had a statutory right to bring forward every conceivable objection which might reflect injuriously on the personal fitness of the candidate for his work. It was not too much to say that the working of this statute, so far as it came into actual operation, was most damaging to young ministers, most demoralizing to congregations, and most embarrassing to Church committees, who were invested with a very difficult discretion. Probably many of their Lordships recollected the very amusing speech which was made last year by the Earl of Rosebery on the subject of the Queensferry Case—but such a proceeding was a scandal to the Church. It was not too much to say that a state of law which encouraged proceedings of that kind was most discouraging to young men entering the ministry, was injurious to the Church, and extremely disagreeable to the patrons. The position of a patron was rendered the more unpleasant by the circumstance that in many, probably in most cases, his religious persuasion was not the same as that of the congregation. This state of things, together with some cases of especial scandal, resulted in repeated votes of the General Assembly, carried at first by large majorities, but of late years unanimously, praying that Parliament would relieve the Established Church from the evils of a system which kept up a merely nominal right of patronage at the sacrifice of the best interests of all concerned. There was a recent precedent on a small scale for dealing with patronage. When the Annuity Tax was abolished in Edinburgh a few years ago the town council was deprived of the patronage of certain city churches, which were then vested in the congregations. The compensation was fixed at first at one year's stipend, but he believed the right of presentation by the council had since been abolished, as nobody could be found who would give anything for the rights. But though he had referred to what was done in the case of the Edinburgh churches by way of illustration, he wished to guard himself against being supposed to indicate that or any other arrangement as the precise kind of arrangement that should be adopted. He had contented himself with pointing out the evils of the existing state of things, and urging the Government to take it into consideration. He did not think he was called upon to indicate the precise mode in which a remedy should be applied. It was clear that any measure dealing with patronage should be brought forward by the Government—for this reason, if for no other, that it was impossible to touch patronage without also touching in some degree the rights of the Crown. It was true that in the exercise of Crown patronage, great regard was always shown to the wishes of the congregation; but still, if they were to deal with patronage, they must to some extent interfere with the strict legal rights of the Crown, and therefore the preliminary assent of the Crown would be necessary. Therefore he said that it was no part of his business to elaborate a scheme for amending the law; it was enough for him to show that the law in its present state had led to serious evils and ought to be altered, and if he had succeeded in doing so, he contended that it was for Her Majesty's Government to take the matter up, and to bring forward definite proposals on the subject. He could not pass from this subject without referring to an interview which took place three or four years ago on the subject of patronage between the present Prime Minister and a deputation on the part of the Established Church. The right hon Gentleman was reported to have asked what would be the position of the Free Church if patronage were abolished? He regretted very much that he had no authentic report of the interview, for everything that fell from the right hon. Gentleman on a matter of this kind was of such importance that it was most desirable to have a distinct and clear exposition of his views. So far as the position of the bodies outside the Established Church—who differed from it only on the ground of patronage was concerned, he thought—and he wished to explain that he was only giving his own individual opinion, and had no right to commit or pledge any one else—that if the barrier of patronage were removed, the Free Church or any portion of that body would be justly entitled, if they saw fit, to urge the claims to be placed as nearly as possible in the same position as regarded their rights, their privileges, and their ecclesiastical status as the members of the Established Church. Whether any of them would desire to put forward such a claim, he was not in a position to say; nor did he desire to speculate as to the probable effects of the abolition of patronage on any ecclesiastical body outside the Established Church; but as regarded the Church of Scotland, he believed that her just and legitimate influence would be greatly strengthened if the powers of the congregations were not limited simply to the right of objecting to a presentee, but if they were invested also with the right of taking part in the appointment. He did not wish to indulge in anything like exaggeration, and he did not pretend that the existing law had been the occasion of any very strong excitement, or any violent manifestations of public feeling, but he had endeavoured to show that undoubtedly in very early times patronage was exercised in the case of a few churches both by the Crown and by lay patrons, yet that the tendency of Presbyterian opinion had always been adverse to it, and that the developments given to patronage in the reigns of James I., of Charles II., and of Queen Anne had been denounced almost with one consent by zealous Presbyterians as innovations at variance with the principles of religious liberty, and had been the cause from time to time of most deplorable secessions from the Church. He had endeavoured to show that the law of patronage in its present form was most injurious to the Church, and had given rise to great scandals. He thought it was a most worthy object for Parliament and Her Majesty's Government to propose to themselves that they should endeavour to put an end to those scandals, that they should seek to heal, if they could not repair, the breaches that had been made, and they should try to restore to the Church that mode of appointing her ministers which the history of Scotland proved to be most in accordance with the wishes of her people. He used the word "restore" advisedly. He sought no novelty; he desired no innovation. He stood upon the old ways of the constitution of the Church. He wished to see abolished that system of patronage, which he believed to be itself an innovation and an encroachment on the ancient rights of the people; and if they should succeed, after many wanderings, in finding their way back to the old path which their fathers trod before them, then perhaps they might hope to see realized in our own land that noble ideal of the great Italian statesman—"a free Church in a free State."

Moved to resolve, that whereas the presentation of ministers to churches in Scotland by patrons under the existing law and practice has been the cause of much division among the people and in the Church of Scotland, it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should take the whole subject into consideration with the view of legislating as to the appointment and settlement of ministers in the Church of Scotland.—(The Earl of Airlie.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY, after thanking his noble Friend the Lord High Commissioner for having officially raised the question, said, it might seem a trivial and uninteresting one to Englishmen, but in Scotland the temper and disposition of the people prevented any ecclesiastical matter from being trivial. He lived in what two years ago was the focus of a disturbed ecclesiastical district, and if he went out at one door met with the Queensferry settlement, while at the other he encountered the Cramo d'harmonium case. In Scotland there was no compromise in religious matters, a thing being either true and right or false and wrong. On a former occasion the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) gave an eminently discreet answer, avowing sympathy for the subject, but pleading want of time for its consideration. His own short Parliamentary experience, however, had satisfied him that where there was a will there was a way. That measure had been waiting 160 years. Its history was a crying grievance, and it seemed to him that the Government never had a more gratifying opportunity of dealing with a great question and conciliating a great nation than they had at this moment. They would be backed up, he believed, blished Church. But if this question was to be raised in Parliament—and he trusted the Government would not pledge itself on the subject without due consideration—then a very different state of things would inevitably arise. The cry for disestablishment would be immensely strengthened, and they would not only have the Free Church and the other Presbyterian dissenting bodies joining together in that cry, but they would have it raised to such an extent throughout Scotland that it would become a question which no Government legislating for that country could shut its eyes to. He was no enemy to the Established Church, and did not wish to see it abolished—he would much rather let things rest as they were; but this he would say, that the question as to patronage was now almost dormant. Let them look at the presentations of the Crown under whatever Government—the present or that which preceded it—there was scarcely such a thing as a disputed settlement now under any Government; and why? Because the Crown and the Ministers of the Crown had wisely consulted the feelings of the people, and virtually did for them what, had they the power, they would have done for themselves. It was the same with respect to private patronage. With the exception of the Queensferry Case, to which reference had been made, no case had been, or, he believed, could be, cited of a disputed settlement in Scotland for several years past—certainly his noble Friend (the Earl of Airliie) had relied on no other case. It was the opinion of a great many people that if patronage were abolished the two Churches, the Established and the Free, would come together again. But the resolutions passed by the Free Church in its General Assembly last year showed how little hope there was of such being the case. In one they said that the proposal on the part of the Established Church, with a view to an alteration of the law of patronage, did not affect the grounds of separation which had rendered the disruption necessary; and again, that they had theretofore refrained from promoting any public agitation against the Established Church, but that the question as to the future relations between the Church and State, if once raised, must be determined in accordance with the wishes of the people and in a manner conducive to the religious well-being and the peace and harmony of the Evangelical Churches. Such being the opinion of the Free Church, it was vain to think that legislation on the subject of patronage in the Church of the minority could do otherwise than raise upon the opposite side a cry for disestablishment which it would be extremely difficult to resist. But if patronage were to be abolished, what system would be set up in its stead? His noble Friends had abstained from giving any opinion upon that point. Were private patrons to be compensated? In whose hands were the elections to rest? These were extremely difficult questions to settle, and he cautioned noble Lords that the answer they might receive would very likely be cited in other cases which might arise hereafter. Upon the whole, therefore, he advised them not to stir the question at that moment when there was no popular feeling in respect of it. He did not say that the majority of the members of the Established Church were not in favour of the abolition of patronage, but they were by no means in harmony, and there was an influential minority in the Church who were decidedly opposed to it. He trusted the Government would give no pledge upon the subject, but that during the Recess they would consider whether legislation was required; and, if they came to the conclusion that it was, then that they would be prepared next Session to make a definite proposal to their Lordships' House.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY disclaimed all enmity to the Free Church of Scotland, as the noble Earl (the Earl of Dalhousie) had to the Established Church: he could not, however, let the statement go forth unchallenged that the Established Church was the Church of the minority. Statistics showed that at this moment the Established Presbyterian Church contained 44·59 per cent of the people of Scotland, while the Free Church contained but 24·45 per cent, and the United Presbyterian 13·08. The average attendance at worship showed a like proportion as between the Churches. He believed the majority of the people of Scotland desired the abolition of patronage, and that the enmity of the Free Church to the question was founded on the conviction that if patronage were abolished many would be drawn to the Established Church who would other-principle. When patronage was again abolished and the rights of the people re-established in 1690, there was nothing in the change of a revolutionary character. The Revolution of 1688 was in Scotland as in England a transfer of the Crown from a Popish to a Protestant Sovereign, or, in other words, a transfer of the principle and of the feeling of loyalty from one Sovereign who did not deserve it to two other Sovereigns who did. Thus there was no revolutionary association whatever in the abolition of patronage in the year 1690. On the contrary, they who were the strongest upholders of the rights of the congregations were at the same time the strongest supporters of what might be called the Protestant dynasty of the House of Stuart and of the first two Sovereigns of the Hanoverian dynasty. Regarded then in an historical point of view, there was nothing whatever of a revolutionary character in the abolition of civil patronage in Scotland. It was, however, capable of demonstration that the assertion of the rights of civil patronage had been productive of the greatest disorder in the State. It was responsible for the whole of the Presbyterian dissent existing in Scotland at the present moment. That was to say, if there were at this day 1,200,000 Presbyterians separated from the Established Church of Scotland, that deplorable fact was almost entirely due to the restoration of civil patronage. There was, indeed, a small sect of Presbyterians in Scotland, who were properly called Cameronians, who left the Church because they could not recognize the authority of an uncovenanted Government. The secessions of 1753 and 1843 were owing to the assertion of the principle of lay patronage in the Church, and there was no chance of any union which would conciliate the Presbyterian Dissenters in Scotland and the Established Church except its abolition. He was unable to accept the statement of the noble Earl (the Earl of Dalhousie) that the Established Church in Scotland had only a minority of the people of Scotland. In one sense, perhaps, it might be true that she was in a slight minority, if the Episcopalians and the Roman Catholics were taken into account; but the Roman Catholics in Scotland could hardly be said to be Scotch, inasmuch as they were mostly Irish immigrants. Certain it was that the Established Church was at the present day not only more numerous than any one sect of Presbyterians, but considerably more numerous than all the Presbyterian Dissenters put together. The Established Church was in a very prosperous a very expansive, and a very useful condition: it was doing a great deal of good, and was much more active than any other religious community in Scotland. Still, unless he were greatly mistaken, the Presbyterian Church still contained in its bosom those seeds of distrust which had lurked in it ever since the establishment of civil patronage. His belief was that if the present system were continued, another party would be developed in the Church of Scotland, and another crop of dissent would be produced. There was already in Scotland a powerful movement towards uniting all the sects of Presbyterian Dissenters. The present was a good opportunity, he contended, for the Government to step in and strengthen the principle of Established Churches, and that what the Government should have done in the case of the Irish Church was to adopt the principle of concurrent endowment. He considered that the Government lost a grand opportunity at the time, of placing upon a broader and more durable basis the connection between the Church and the State, and that the country had reason to regret that they did not take advantage of it. He ventured to hope that Her Majesty's Government would take care and not run the risk of making a similar mistake with regard to England and Scotland. It was of the greatest importance, he might add, that the intention of the Government should be made known to the people of Scotland before the meeting of the General Assemblies. For his own part he was convinced that the principle of patronage could never be maintained.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND was not desirous, after what had been said already on the subject, to prolong the debate, but this was a question of so much importance to the people of Scotland, and one in which he had for several years taken a very great interest, and with regard to which he felt very great anxiety, that he could not refrain from offering a few observations upon it. If he were to look at this question merely from an English point of view, he quite agreed with much that had been said.

He was quite prepared to admit that here the abolition of patronage would be entirely unsuited to the wishes and feelings of the country. But the case of England and the case of Scotland with regard to Church patronage were so entirely different that they could not be considered on the same grounds. He was of opinion therefore that the question of the maintenance or abolition of patronage in Scotland must depend on the merits of the case, and the manner in which the existing system had worked. As a general rule he thought that the principle of appointment to Church livings by individuals on whom rested the responsibility of such appointments—an individual who was responsible not to others alone, but to his own conscience for appointing the best man he could find, and who took a personal interest in the parish to which he appointed a clergyman—such a system of appointment was to his mind about the best that could be adopted. He did not as a general rule believe that patronage which was made the subject of popular elections was satisfactory, and on the whole he preferred that it should be left in the hands of individual patrons. In saying so, however, he was speaking in the abstract; because when he came to look at the question from a practical point of view as connected with Scotland, he was afraid he should have to arrive at a conclusion different from that which he had held for many years, and he must declare his conviction that no matter what good opinion he had of the system of patronage as a system, he thought the time had come when it was not desirable to longer continue that system in that country. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that the General Assemblies of the Church of Scotland had, on several occasions of late years, in an unmistakable and a marked manner given it as their decided opinion that the time had arrived when patronage should be abolished. In a statement drawn up by a committee of the General Assembly—mainly, he believed, at the suggestion of the present Prime Minister—that body asked for the abolition of the existing patronage system as a matter of justice, pointing out that the Church of Scotland had ever maintained the right of the people of Scotland to appoint their own ministers, and hoping that they would ever continue to do so. Parliament need not go beyond such a positive statement as this. The grievance complained of was not one of yesterday, but had existed for many generations, and he, therefore, was not unwilling to give up patronage in the Church of Scotland. He took that view chiefly on the ground that in many cases—in all cases he was told, in which the Crown was interested—it had virtually ceased to exist. In the more northern parts of the country patronage was, it was true, from time to time exercised. He had himself, on three or four occasions when churches had become vacant, exercised his right of patron, contrary to the wishes of those who desired a different state of things. The ministers he had appointed, however, were men in whom he had the greatest confidence, and he had the satisfaction since of finding that the appointments were in every way suitable, and that the parishioners were happy under them. But when he found that in the bulk of cases the exercise of patronage had become a dead letter, it was, he thought, doubtful whether it ought not to be done away with. Whenever this question was settled, it must be dealt with without reference to either side of politics, but solely with reference to what was best for the spiritual welfare of the people of Scotland. He gathered from the noble Lord who spoke last (Lord Napier) that there was no such thing as a Scotch Roman Catholic.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, he had not intended to say that all the Roman Catholics of Scotland were of Irish extraction, but that the bulk of them were. He was quite aware that there was an ancient Roman Catholic population in the Highlands.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND was proud to say that some of his best friends in the Highlands were Roman Catholics, and they would be astonished if they heard themselves described as Irish immigrants. He protested against their being so described. He regretted to find any of their Lordships entertain the notion that the abolition of patronage would be a step in the direction of a severance of Church and State either in England or in Scotland. He did not believe that any such result would follow the abolition of patronage. He was also sorry to hear the noble Earl

(the Earl of Dalhousie) go so far as to state that the abolition of patronage would not remove the objections which the Free Church held at the time of the disruption.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: Certainly not. The abolition of patronage was not the reason why the Free Church separated from the Establishment.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he had always understood that, if not the sole reason, it was one of the main causes of the disruption.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: It took its rise from the presentation to Auchterarder.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he could only repeat that he was sorry to find that the abolition of patronage would not be satisfactory to the great body of the Free Church. He had been mainly induced to give his adhesion to the proposal of the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie) from supposing that a satisfactory mode of effecting the abolition of patronage could be brought about. He agreed that it was the duty of the Government to take this subject in hand, if there was a fair prospect of dealing with it in a satisfactory manner, and in that case no one was more capable of dealing with the question than the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll). He thought it might be said of him, as of his noble ancestor, the Marquess of Argyll, that—"He made the General Assembly a fair offer, hoping to persuade all good noblemen and gentlemen to do the like." He trusted that the noble Duke might be able to devise some means that might be acceptable to all parties alike. For himself, he gave his adhesion to the proposition because he believed it would have the salutary effect of effecting a union between all Churches which did not differ in doctrine or in Church discipline, and which were now to a great extent opposed to each other.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that although he was unable to vote for the Motion of the noble Earl, and hoped to convince the House that such an abstract Resolution ought not to be adopted, still he was glad that the noble Earl had raised this discussion, and he was sincerely grateful to their Lordships who had added their opinions to the general information which it was desirable should be made known respecting the subject. It was unnecessary for him to give a historical narrative of the law of patronage of Scotland; but he wished emphatically to point out to their Lordships that the question of Church patronage in Scotland was wholly and absolutely different from that of Church patronage in England. It was separate and distinct, historically, legally, and morally. Historically, it was the fact that lay patronage had not only been the principal cause, but literally the only cause, of all the dissents and schisms that had occurred in the Church of Scotland for a very long period. He denied that even under the present law, the people had no right to a voice in the selection of the clergyman who was to see after their spiritual welfare—he considered that the Act was clear enough on this point; and whenever the popular party had got the upper hand, they always pressed for a settlement giving them a voice in the selection of the minister and their claim had always been recognized. This happened in 1649 and again at the Revolutionary settlement in 1690. What was called the mixed system thereupon grew up, giving the right of presentation to the kirk session and the heritors, with the right of approval or disapproval on the part of the people. Under the Act of 1712 lay patronage was gradually restored, and became exercised almost as absolutely as at any previous time; and it was owing to disputes arising out of the exercise of lay patronage that the great disruption of 1843 occurred. Technically his noble Friend (the Earl of Dalhousie) was no doubt right, but practically the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) was also correct in saying that the question of patronage caused the great disruption. The cause of spiritual independence arose out of that question, and the right of patronage was the only point on which the Church courts were likely to come into collision with the civil courts. The only case of appeal he had ever heard of was upon the civil rights of patronage. The questions of patronage and spiritual independence were inseparably united, and one had grown out of the other. His noble Friend (the Earl of Dalhousie) shook his head, but that was a proposition he would maintain in the Free Church Assembly itself. He thought it a most unfortunate circumstance that the Governments of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Melbourne determined not to entertain the disputes that had arisen between the Church courts and the civil courts of Scotland and the great secession was the consequence. Then, on the principle he supposed of shutting the stable door when the steed was stolen, the Government of the day introduced what had since become known as the Lord Aberdeen Act. It was obvious that this Act gave three modes whereby substantial power could be exercised by the people; one was by simple process of veto upon any appointment; another was an appeal to the Church courts, where the people could state their objections; a third course was to place the matter in the hands of the Church courts, who had power to investigate and adjudicate upon disputed cases. The question now was, had Lord Aberdeen's Act worked satisfactorily? During the thirty years since the Act was passed this point had never been subject to a judicial solution; he believed, however, that it was the intention of Parliament to give to the Church courts full power in such matters, and to give to the people any facility for stating their objections to any appointment that he considered was not suitable to them. His own impression was that had the question been brought before the civil courts, it would have been decided in favour of the power which he considered the Act vested in the Church courts. Until that question was disposed of it could not be positively said that the Act of Lord Aberdeen fell short of the liberal character it was supposed to possess. But although the Act had been passed 30 years, the Church courts had not carried a single appeal to the civil courts. Although the Act was capable of being construed so as to give the Church courts all the power Dr. Chalmers required, that did not remove the main objections to the Act. The exhibitions which were made in the Church courts when the parishioners were cross-questioned as to the nature of their objections were exhibitions of the most obnoxious and degrading kind. They were damaging to young ministers, demoralizing to congregations, embarrassing to Church courts, and very offensive to all parties, and they amounted to a total prohibition of the right of patronage. Out of 52 cases of disputed settlement which had arisen some were of a trifling nature, but others had led to deplorable consequences and secessions; and that the civil courts had not been appealed to was the fault of the Church courts, and not of the patrons. As one of the three Members of that House who held the largest number of patronages in Scotland—he believed he had the patronage of 30 or 32 parishes—he had already published a letter in which he had offered to place his patronage absolutely at the disposal of the General Assembly so soon as a mode of satisfactory settlement was arrived at. Patronage in Scotland differed from what it was in England historically and legally, and also morally. He felt strongly the impossibility of considering there was any right of property in it, because patronage was an absolute violation of the Treaty of Union which the Church protested against at the time. He did not say there were no objections to the elections of ministers; but there was an important difference between Scotland and England in regard to the force of such objections. In the Church of England a great part of the service was wholly independent of the character and qualifications of the clergyman; the sermon was a small part of the service, and not always the most satisfactory. In Scotland, prayers and everything except the psalmody depended upon the qualifications of the minister; and on this ground it was the more reasonable that the people should have a voice in the selection of their ministers. He remembered an anecdote of three men, all of whom were ultimately Members of that House, and of whom two went to hear the third preach. Towards the end of his discourse this ultimately distinguished person said, "Now, my brethren, I hope you won't go and say 'We have heard an excellent sermon to-day,' and immediately forget all I have said." Upon which one of the two friends exclaimed, "God forbid!" Could that noble Lord have repeated in a Court of Law that short and pithy comment on that sermon? It might be apparent to any man who heard a minister, from the moment he opened his mouth, that he was a mere "stick," and would be of no use in the parish, and yet it would be most difficult to maintain that in a Court of Law. Therefore there was no escape from those difficulties except by giving a substantive voice or veto in some form to the parishioners. He was not prepared to say that such a veto was not practically allowed under the sanction of Lord Aberdeen's Act; but there were certain strong objections to that Act, and that some change in the present state of things was desirable could not be denied. He was glad to learn from the five speakers on that side of the House—all of them, he believed, having patronage—that they were perfectly willing to agree to any settlement which might meet with the general approbation of Scotland. It might be asked why should the Government not bring in a measure? Well, he did not think there had been hitherto—and he was not sure there was even now—evidence of any such general consent on the subject as would induce the Government to undertake to legislate upon it, and until the General Assembly and people of Scotland were agreed upon some settled plan—some definite mode of dealing with the question—the Government could not be expected to take the matter in hand with a view to legislation. Such an attempt would be no light matter. His noble Friend (Lord Napier) had alluded incidentally to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and expressed an opinion from which he (the Duke of Argyll) totally dissented—that it would be desirable to confirm the principle of the connection between Church and State by concurrent endowment. He would not now enter into that question, further than to say that although the disestablishment of the Irish Church was proposed by the Government upon grounds purely local and special connected with Ireland, and it was asserted over and over again in every variety of form that they did not admit that any inference was fairly to be drawn from that proposal against the Established Churches in the rest of the United Kingdom, yet, as a matter of fact, the disestablishment of the Irish Church had given an impulse to the action of those bodies which were adverse to all Established Churches. Since that event Motions for disestablishing the English Church had been brought forward in the other House in a spirit and with a support which did not exist before. The Government were not responsible for that, and they had no sympathy with the attacks made upon the Church of England. The difficulties of legislation in regard to ecclesiastical questions had also increased. Even such a comparatively trivial matter as a Lctionary Bill had encountered a considerable degree of friction in passing through Parliament owing to an exacerbation of feeling. He thought, however, that was but a temporary state of sentiment, and that a re-action in favour of Established Churches had already arisen. People were beginning to see that those Churches were in many respects more liberal and freer than the non-Established Churches. Still, his noble Friend said that no Church dispute was in Scotland deemed small; and he had no doubt that when any ecclesiastical matter was stirred large and serious questions would be raised, and could not be evaded whenever they entered the High Court of Parliament in these times and under present circumstances on any subject apparently trivial affecting the Established Church. On those grounds he did not think it was the duty of the Government to undertake any measure of that kind without grave thought. The Presbytery of Edinburgh, feeling the force of those considerations, had come by a majority of 9 to 7 to a prudent Resolution, declaring that while they admitted the evils of patronage, they were satisfied that other evils of considerable magnitude had arisen from the appointment of ministers to churches where no patronage existed; and that although the existing law of patronage might be worthy of serious consideration, they deprecated any rash or hasty appeal to Parliament in favour of its repeal or modification, more especially as there prevailed so much diversity of opinion as to what substitute for that law would best conduce to the interests of religion. Since that time there had been large divisions in the General Assembly, proving that a strong feeling existed in favour of the modification of the law of patronage; but he was bound to add that when he came to the precise substitute which they would recommend for patronage as regulated under Lord Aberdeen's Act, he did not find the same amount of agreement. He was certain it was not the duty and would not be the wisdom of any Government to undertake to bring in any measure on that subject until they saw their way pretty clearly to its solution, and found that there was some general agreement as to the nature of the substitute to be provided; because the introduction of any measure which failed would leave the Church of Scotland in a worse position than it now occupied. He could not help hoping that the fair influence of public opinion would do a great deal to remedy the evils which had arisen, and he was sanguine that the present discussion, and also the discussion which might be raised in the other House of Parliament, might induce those who held patronage to exercise it in a wise and discreet manner, and in accordance with the conscientious feelings of the congregations. If that course were invariably pursued he believed that, while avoiding all the difficulties involved in any appeal to Parliament on the subject at that moment, they would hear very little more about that question. He would, therefore, earnestly entreat his noble Friend not to take the sense of the House on an abstract Resolution, which was always inconvenient. The Government would watch the progress of events and the state of opinion in Scotland in regard to that subject, and if it should appear that a solution favourable to the Church, and not otherwise objectionable was open to them, they would, no doubt, take it into their earnest consideration. Since he entered the House that night he had received a communication emanating from the Free Church of Scotland, which he could not help reading. It said that the Free Church Committee on Patronage had unanimously expressed their strong opposition to any Parliamentary action affecting the Established Church of Scotland, which was not adapted to meet the entire ecclesiastical conditions of Scotland. He was bound to say he could not recognize the legitimacy of the representations of the Free Church. Many of his best friends, some of his relations, were members of the Free Church—personally, he had the greatest sympathy with them, and nothing would rejoice him more than to see a scheme which would amalgamate the two bodies; but he did not see that Government should be called upon to do anything simply to induce the re-union of the two Churches. Although the disruption of 1843 might have originated in the dispute about patronage, it did not follow that the repeal of the Act of 1712 would bring back the Free Church to the Established Church; but if they had been driven out by that system and complained that it was injurious to their spiritual influence, he did not see how it lay in their mouths to object to any modification of it. Of course all religious bodies were jealous of each other, and disliked anything which was for the good of each other. A much more important objection was the opposition of the United Presbyterians, who had drawn up a much more consistent document, for they held absolutely to the voluntary principle, and objected not only to patronage but to Established Churches. But as the Free Church held to the principle of establishment, and had narrowly escaped from the dangers of a secession from within their own body through attempting to enter into a compromise with the Established Church, he did not see that they had a fair locus standi for objecting to anything which might bring the Establishment more nearly to the position which they themselves occupied. Having now addressed to the House all the observations he wished to make he would ask his noble Friend to withdraw the Resolution he had brought forward. The noble Earl had attained the object he had in view—and a very important object it had been;—to a certain extent he had obtained a general expression of opinion so far as regarded the matter with which he was concerned, and had accomplished as much as he could hope to effect either by legislation or otherwise. He trusted the noble Earl would withdraw the Resolution.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that after the expression of opinion which had been given by his noble Friend he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

CHILDREN'S EMPLOYMENT IN DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BILL. [H.L.]

A Bill to prevent the employment of children in exercises or performances dangerous to life or health in certain cases.—Was presented by The Lord BUCKHURST; read 1st. (No. 162.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 17th June, 1873.

MINUTES.—NEW MEMBER SWORN—John Carpenter Garnier, esquire, for Devon County (Southern Division).

SELECT COMMITTEE—Civil Service Writers, appointed.

Report—Endowed Schools Act (1869) [No. 254].

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Game Birds (Ireland) * [196].

Second Reading—Public Meetings (Ireland) * [167], debate adjourned; Habitual Drunkards [11], [House counted out].

Committee—Rating (Liability and Value) [146]—R.P.

Considered as amended—Indian Railways Registration * [168].

Third Reading—Law Agents (Scotland) * [184], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1871—DRAUGHT OF SEA-GOING VESSELS.

QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Why the draught of water of sea-going vessels at Bristol, Liverpool, London, and some other ports, is not obtained by the Board of Trade as at Shields, Sunderland, Cardiff, Swansea, seeing that shipowners at the latter places complained of partial reports; and, if he will cause reports to be obtained from all alike?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that under the Act of 1871, which gave authority to the Board of Trade to act in these matters a discretionary power had been clearly and expressly given to the Board as to the extent to which the system should be carried. The Customs had been unable to assist in carrying out the surveys, and therefore the Board of Trade were obliged to rely upon their own officers. If the Board were to undertake to survey every ship in every port in Great Britain a very much larger and more costly staff of officers would be required. The present system was experimental, and its results, as he had reason to believe, were useful. He would remind the hon. Member that in order to influence and check the action of shipowners in the matter, it was not necessary that every individual ship should be surveyed, because the knowledge that a ship might be surveyed at any time was sufficient to produce a very considerable effect; and even under the system of occasional survey a very gross case of overloading was not likely to be passed over by the surveyors. The system had not yet been applied to the port of London; but surveys were made at Liverpool and Bristol, and the Board was increasing its staff of officers at those ports.

CIVIL SERVICE—WRITERS.

QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will be good enough to state whether holidays will be granted to all Writers; whether sick leave under special circumstances and medical certificate will be granted to all Writers; whether special rates of pay will be paid to Writers for special work; and whether, when Writers are ordered away on duties, a suitable allowance will be made to them for their travelling expenses?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was happy to be able to answer all the hon. Member's Questions in the affirmative. Several of these things had been done already, and the others they were willing to concede. He would add, however, that these matters were not strictly in the hands of the Treasury, but of the different Departments. If in any case the writers felt they did not get that to which they were fairly entitled and applied to the Treasury, he would endeavour to set matters right.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA—NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BOWRING asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Tickets proposed to be issued to Members on the occasion of the Naval Inspection at Spithead in honour of the Shah of Persia, on the 23rd instant, will be transferable, as in the case of the Tickets for the Military Review at Windsor; and, whether, even if the Tickets will not be generally transferable, he will allow such Members as may be willing to surrender their own claims to transfer their Tickets to other hon. Members, to be used exclusively by the latter for their wives or daughters?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that there was this great distinction between the naval review and the military review at Windsor—that in the latter there would be a general distribution of tickets to others besides Members of both Houses of Parliament, which was not the case with regard to the naval inspection. If Members of Parliament were to be allowed to transfer their tickets, the practical effect would be to hand over to them the power of distributing tickets—a privilege which no other persons were to have. That was not what the House itself understood yesterday, neither would it be desirable that such should be the case. With regard to the other point, while facilities would be given to hon. Members to embark on board vessels at Portsmouth, they would have to reach that town by train as they best could.

Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that on former occasions special trains had been provided for the accommodation of Members of Parliament.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, that there had been a very general expression of feeling on the part of hon. Members that, while they were most anxious to be present on the occasion of the naval inspection, they should defray their own expenses.

In answer to Mr. BOWRING,

Mr. GOSCHEN said, it was very probable that on the closing of the list on Wednesday it would be found that the vessel appropriated to the Members of the House of Commons could accommodate some of the Members' wives and daughters, and he therefore proposed that in that case tickets for Members' wives and daughters should be ballotted for by those Members who had put their names down on the list.

VACCINATION ACT (1871).

QUESTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked the Secretary of the Local Government Board, Whether the Local Government Board addressed in April last a Letter to the Bridgwater Board of Guardians to the effect that "the Board are not prepared to say that it is open to the Guardians to act upon their own judgment" with respect to successive prosecutions of persons who persist in refusing to have their children vaccinated; whether the Law does not leave it open to the Guardians to act upon their own judgment in this matter; and, on what grounds the Letter of the Local Government Board suggested to the Guardians that, instead of acting on their own judgment, they should be guided by a recommendation of a Select Committee of this House, which was struck out of the Vaccination Act of 1871, and failed to receive the sanction of this House when proposed in the form of a Bill in 1872?

Mr. HIBBERT, in reply, said, that the extract from the letter from the Local Government Board to the Bridgwater Board of Guardians was not accurate, it having omitted the important word "not." The extract should run, "the Board are not prepared to say that it is not open to the Guardians to act upon their own judgment."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he hoped the Local Government Board would in future use one affirmative instead of two negatives to express their meaning.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—PROSECUTION FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT.

QUESTION.

Mr. WHALLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is with the sanction of the Government that the Attorney General prosecutes Members of this House and others at the instance of the Lord Chief Justice, for expressing their views on the proceedings in the Tichborne case; whether they so act by the advice of the Attorney General, or by what other legal advice they are guided in respect of these prosecutions; and, if he would state to the House the grounds on which the Government proceeded in this case?

Mr. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he thought the Question of his hon. Friend, as it had been printed, had been put under a misapprehension. The Government had nothing whatever to do with the matters to which the Question referred, and this applied to the whole of the three branches of the Question. With respect to the action of the Attorney General, as he (Mr. Gladstone) understood the office of the Attorney General, it was entirely distinct from the action of the Government, and was by no means confined to his intercourse with the Executive Government. There were many duties which the Attorney General had to perform on his own motion, and there were likewise other duties which he had to undertake in a case like this on the motion of the presiding Judge. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had been kind enough to inform him that the course he had taken in this case was entirely owing to communications from the Judge who had presided at the trial of the suit; and therefore that was a matter of a judicial character appertaining to the conduct of a trial which was now going on. But he likewise learned from the Attorney General that it was quite a mistake to suppose that he had prosecuted or was proceeding against any Member of that House. As to anything said in the House which the presiding Judge might think improper, that was entirely outside the cognizance of the Attorney General. With regard to the more general Question—namely, whether it was desirable or not that public discussions should be held on this matter—he must say that was a matter entirely beyond his (Mr. Gladstone's) cognizance. It must depend entirely upon the rules of procedure in the Court of Justice and the rules of procedure of that House.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE) BILL.—[BILL 146.]

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen,
Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 16th June.]

Bill considered in Committee,

(In the Committee.)

Abolition of Exemptions.

Clause 3 (Extension of Poor Rate Acts to other property).

SIR JOHN ST. AUBYN moved, at end of clause, to add—

"Provided, That where a tin or copper mine is occupied under a lease granted on a reservation wholly or partly of money dues without fine, the gross annual value of the mine shall be taken to be the annual amount of the dues payable in respect thereof; and in the following cases:—1. Where any such mine is occupied under a lease granted wholly or partly on a fine; and 2. Where any such mine is occupied without any reservation of dues, the gross annual value of the mine shall be taken to be such as the assessment committee, overseers of the poor, or other rating authority (acting subject and according to the provisions of the Acts relating to union and parochial and other local assessments,) determine to be the annual amount of the dues in money at which the mine might be reasonably expected to be let without fine on a lease of the ordinary duration, according to the usage of the country."

The hon. Baronet referred to the attempts which had been made by the First Lord of the Admiralty and the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) to pass a measure with regard to the rating of mines. He also mentioned that he himself was the author of a Bill on that subject. The reason why a measure on that subject had not been carried was its inherent difficulty. Some persons would, no doubt, be content to allow their mines to be rated under the provisions of the Bill. But the plan he proposed was that tin and copper mines should be assessed on the royalty, by which he meant the value of a certain fixed proportion of the produce of the mine. This was the only fair mode of assessment. The plan of rating on the principle of the rent which a hypothetical tenant would probably give, could not be adopted, except with a large amount of injustice and inequality. Tin and copper mining presented the greatest contrast with other mining industries. In West Cumberland, for instance, the ore was not found in narrow and uncertain lodes, but in beds or layers, generally speaking of considerable thickness, and the produce of which might be estimated and assessed pretty accurately. But tin and copper were invariably found in lodes which were simply fissures in the earth, extending sometimes for a considerable distance, at varying inclinations, and extending to uncertain depths. These lodes varied in width from half an inch to 20 feet. The metal sometimes became poor and sometimes rich; sometimes the lode would be barren, and sometimes productive throughout its entire course. As an instance of the fluctuating produce of such mines, he might mention that in 1868 a copper mine yielded ore to the value of £3,590; in 1869, only £580. Another copper mine produced in 1868 £12,270; in 1869, £6,700; in 1870, £840. A mine on his own estate produced in 1859, £13,550; in 1866, £337; and seven years afterwards—namely, in 1873, nothing at all. A tin mine which in 1864 yielded ore to the value of £3,300, produced £650 in 1865, and in 1866, £2,473. Another tin mine yielded £10,000 in 1854, £6,500 in 1855, and in the following year £21,500. Another set of statistics, with which he would not trouble the House at any length, showed that 130 tin mines had been worked during the 10 years from 1861 to 1870; but out of these 51 sold no ore in one year, 59 sold none in another, and other years showed a similar result. The state of copper mines was still worse. Out of 160 worked in a particular district between 1861 and 1870, an average of one-half of them were unproductive; in the year 1870, however, the number unworked was 110. What course would be adopted by the assessment committees having to deal with such a state of things as this? Instances had recently occurred of two mines rated at £2,500 and £2,000 respectively, and on appeal the assessments were reduced to £550 and £260. These were instances of the impossibility of rating mines fairly; if the Bill were passed without his Amendment being adopted, the assessment committees would be driven to assess them at the royalty. Why, then, should not the inevitable be made legal? The royalty was the true rent, and the proposal to assess at the royalty was approved by the agriculturists in the districts, the only persons really concerned. Within the last week he had presented Petitions from every single union in the district which he represented (West Cornwall), and those Petitions were universally in favour of rating mines on the royalty. It was not fair to look at this question with regard to one particular mine or union. It ought to be looked at with reference to the largest possible area. Taking the whole of the tin and copper mines in the West of England counties, in Devon, and in Cornwall, he found that in the eight years from 1862 to 1869 inclusive—years of comparative prosperity and adversity—the total value of ores raised amounted to £13,994,000 odd, or, in round numbers, about £14,000,000. The annual value during these years was about £1,743,004. In many cases the money obtained by the sale of the ore was not sufficient to pay the expense of getting it. It had been found necessary to make calls to the amount of £2,502,000. Taking the whole of the tin and copper mines in the counties of Devon and Cornwall as one concern, he found that the loss to the adventurers during those eight years amounted to about £1,334,000—an average annual loss of about £166,000. After that they could not talk of beneficial occupation. The royalty during those years was £702,348. It had been laid down by the House of Lords that an unprofitable concern was that which neither yielded nor was capable of yielding a profit. Assuming the annual loss on these mines to be less than £166,000—say £125,000—still, how would it be possible to apply the principle proposed by the Government in this Bill to a losing concern like that? He had shown that tin and copper mines could not be rated fairly according to that plan; that the royalty did furnish an adequate standard by which to estimate the value of the mine to the owner; and that in the districts to which his Amendment referred it would give a very much larger sum for rateable purposes than any other. He did not put the matter before the Committee on the ground of the depression of the tin and copper trade at this moment, though it was well known that in the face of an arbitrary system of assessment there were many mines trembling in the balance, which would at once be closed if additional burdens were thrown upon them. His object was to put such rating upon mines as would be fair between class and class, and which would be easily understood and capable of equal application in times of prosperity and times of adversity. He begged respectfully to commend his proposal to the sense of justice of the Government and the Committee. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. LOPES, in seconding the Amendment, said, he wished to make a few remarks on the legal points involved in the case. Under the statute of Elizabeth metalliferous mines were not rateable, but dues were rateable provided those dues were reserved in kind, and not paid in money. In the year 1872 a decision was given in the Courts, and it was laid down that surplus land and plant were rateable in certain cases. That was the present state of the law. And what did the Bill propose to do? It proposed that in future a mine should be rateable in the same way as any other hereditament; or, in other words, that the adventurers of a mine were to be regarded in the light of a hypothetical tenant from year to year, and were to pay in the same way. But the calculation involved in such a system was one which it was impossible any assessment committee could make. It might be said that rating took place in respect of coal mines. But the case of coal mines was essentially different from that of metalliferous mines. One day there might be every reason to believe a metalliferous mine highly prosperous, and in a short time circumstances might have so changed that the adventurers would be in despair. How, then, were these mines to be rated? The proper way to rate them was to have regard to the dues paid to the lord. The dues were the basis on which the assessment ought to proceed. He brought in a Bill himself last Session, the object of which was to do away with the existing anomaly with regard to rating mines. The Bill was allowed to proceed to a second reading, and both the President of the Local Government Board and the Home Secretary expressed their approval of its principle. He hoped, then, the Government would accept the Amendment now proposed. He had not the slightest hesitation in saying, from his own knowledge of the county of Cornwall and a large portion of Devon, that if the principle laid down in the Bill of the Government was applied to the mines worked there, it would lead, not only to the hindrance, but to the total destruction of a large portion of the mining industries of those counties.

Mr. A. W. YOUNG supported the Amendment. The farmers of Cornwall without exception were in favour of it, so were the towns—at any rate, he could speak for his own. He hoped the Committee would give effect to the unanimous wishes of the people interested in the matter.

Mr. BRISTOWE opposed the Amendment. He did not see why tin and copper mines should be subjected to one method of rating and other mines to another. He could not understand why the parishes were to have the benefit of the capital invested by the landlord or the tenant in the improvement of the land, as by buildings, drainage, and similar permanent improvements, and yet were to have no benefit from the capital invested in plant and machinery for winning ore from the mines. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not accept the Amendment; for if he did, there would be very great difficulty in carrying out the principles of the Parochial Assessment Act.

Mr. A. P. VIVIAN, in rising to support the Amendment of his hon. Colleague (Sir John St. Aubyn), said, he did so mainly on the ground of the necessity that existed for uniformity of assessment. The plan proposed by the Government of leaving it to the assessment committees to find the rateable value was nothing new; it had had plenty of trial with coal mines, and the result had been anything but satisfactory; some assessment committees proceeded on one system of rating, and some on another. For instance, in the county of Glamorgan there were no less than six different modes of arriving at rateable value in the seven unions. If it was difficult for assessment committees to arrive at rateable value of coal mines it would be much more so in the case of copper or tin mines, and that for several reasons. No one could even approximately form an opinion when such a mine was opened how it would turn out; the value of the minerals themselves was subject to larger and more sudden variations than even coal, which no one could foresee. Then, again, that class of mines in which the mineral was found in lodes were more uncertain in their productive power than other descriptions of mineral property where the mineral was found in beds or known veins or seams as with coal, and the number of abandoned workings in Cornwall and Devonshire showed the very precarious nature of these undertakings. One great cause of the fluctuation in the value of their produce was the quantity of tin and copper imported; the arrival of a large quantity of copper or tin in our ports from Chili or Banca, sometimes lowered the price of the metal so much as to make what were previously flourishing mines in Cornwall, losing concerns. Then, again, strikes in the copper smelting works in Wales had lately seriously affected the welfare of copper mines. The fairest basis on which to rate these mines had for a very long time occupied the attention of those best able to form an opinion, and the unanimous decision arrived at had been to revert to the old basis of dues payable to the lord, which all parties interested agreed in wishing for. The lord's dues, being a proportion of the actual produce of a mine either in kind or money value, rose or fell in value with the prosperity of the mine itself as far as was practically possible, and in this respect they differed materially from the ordinary royalty of a coal mine which was a fixed sum per ton, whatever the value of the coal itself might be. The lords' dues represented the rent of the lords' underground property as much as the tenant farmer's rent did on the surface. The dues were, moreover, a very full rent in consequence of the power of abandonment which was allowed to the tenant, and, further, the power which the tenant had of disposing to his own advantage of any of the plant which he had erected. He strongly objected to the surface works and buildings being compared to farm buildings; they were the tenants' outlay without which rent could not be paid, and were far more analogous to the farm implements such as steam ploughs, thrashing machines, &c. The surface buildings were not permanent, but very temporary improvements of the property, seeing that a large proportion of the mines were abandoned under five years' working. They further contributed to the sale of the lord's underground freehold from time to time. The best proof of the very temporary value of the most prosperous description of mining property was that it would not fetch in the open market more than 10 or 12 years' purchase, whilst land often fetched over 30 years' purchase. In conclusion, he would impress upon the Committee the fact that mining enterprise in Cornwall and Devon had very much suffered of late years. The Census of 1871 showed a decrease in the population of Cornwall of over 7,000; this arose from emigration, and consisted chiefly of hardworking experienced and practical men who had left the Duchy and the county of Devon, between 1861 and 1871, to find work abroad, very often leaving their wives and children behind to be supported by the rates. He feared that if any ill-considered basis of assessment were adopted than the lords' dues, the effect would be that they would see a still further emigration of the Cornwall and Devonshire miners, and that the effect of this legislation would be to increase rather than to alleviate the local burdens as was intended. For those reasons he strongly supported the Amendment.

Mr. STANSFELD said, he had stated that if from the local and technical knowledge of Members any particular case could be shown to justify in the mind of the House some special method of dealing with it, he did not think it would be for him or the Committee to refuse to listen to and exercise its judgment upon it. He was prepared to admit that the hon. Baronet (Sir John St. Aubyn) had made out a special case. His hon. Friend had shown the extreme fluctuations in the products of mines of this description, and the exceptional difficulty of any fair, practical, and reasonable method of assessment of them under the ordinary law of the land. Having accepted the Amendment generally, he was not, of course, as yet prepared to state the best form of words in which it should be put; but he would consider the method of phrasing it with his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. Whatever the landlord received, whether money dues or dues in kind, or dead rent, whatever was reserved or paid to the landlord should be the test of the rateable value of the mine. To effect that object some additional words were required to be added to the Amendment. It would also be necessary to state that the value of the mine in one year should depend on the receipts of the year preceding. The main alteration which he would propose was this. The measure of the gross annual value should be the measure of rateable value also, because the difference between the gross and annual value was the cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses necessary to maintain the premises in a state to command rent.

COLONEL HOGG said, that the agricultural portion of the community were entirely united in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Baronet (Sir John St. Aubyn). He (Colonel Hogg) was glad the spirit of it had been accepted by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld).

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH, as one of the few Members representing a district where dues were taken in kind, suggested that the Amendment should be extended so as to include lead mines also, seeing that out of many hundreds of such mines in Cornwall only two or three were paying.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought there was no provision for the case of an owner working his own mine.

Mr. STANSFELD replied that that was provided for by sub-section 2.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, he did not think that that sub-section met such a case.

Mr. PAGET said, he saw no reason why certain mines should be singled out and exempted from rating on plant and machinery while other mines were still liable to be rated.

MR. PEASE said, he was not prepared to assent to lead mines being added to the category of mines until those who were interested in lead mines asked that that should be done. In South Durham none of the mines were rated on the shafts and machinery, but on the principle of the rent paid to the landlord, with considerable deductions made. If the principle proposed was carried out, one set of mines would be assessed on the gross rental, and another set would receive the benefit of considerable deductions.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he thought the proposition to set a valuation on stone in quarries an unprecedented one, and he could not understand why it should be included with mines of any description.

MR. W. B. BEAUMONT said, he thought they might repeal the Act of Elizabeth, and leave all these matters to be settled by the local authorities. It would be presumptuous in him to offer an opposition to the very strong case which the hon. Baronet the Member for West Cornwall had made out, and the more so as the hon. Baronet's proposition had been accepted by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board. But he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to have an opportunity of considering the representations made to him by gentlemen connected with lead and other mines to see whether or not they should be introduced into the clause proposed by the hon. Baronet.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was heartily glad that the Government had accepted in spirit the Amendment of the hon. Baronet. There was no reason why the provisions as to tin and copper mines should not be applied to lead and other metalliferous mines. If they were not so applied, inextricable confusion would be the result. He utterly dissented from the view that the principle on which this rating was to be carried out should be laid down by the various assessment committees throughout the country, and that on an appeal against them the Court of Queen's Bench should decide what was the law on the subject. That course would lead to another 35 years' litigation. The principle of rating should be determined by the House.

SIR JOHN ST. AUBYN, in reply, said, he thought all questions as to machinery would come to be determined at a more fitting time. He would probably have little difficulty in agreeing to the alterations proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld); but before he expressed an opinion on them he should like to see them on Paper.

MR. J. LOWTHER contended that whatever exemption was made in favour of copper and tin mines ought to be extended to jet mines. The difficulty was that no one knew what was the Government plan of rating mines; and, before the Committee proceeded further, he thought they ought to know what the Government plan was. There were many sources of mineral wealth—such as jet mines, stone mines, and gypsum mines—to which it was evident that the attention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) had not been directed.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, it was for Gentlemen interested in other mines to bring their case forward, and make the same convincing case which had been made out by his hon. Friend (Sir John St. Aubyn) in favour of tin and copper mines.

MR. MAGNIAC maintained that the whole case of Cornwall was an exceptional one, standing on its own merits. He trusted that the Committee would refuse to take other mines with the case of tin and copper, and that the Government would adhere to the proposition that mines in which these two metals were found should be treated as separate from others.

MR. J. LOWTHER contended that he was perfectly justified in saying that other classes of minerals which stood upon all-fours with tin and copper should be entitled to the exemption.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that all metallic ores which occurred in lodes were wrought under precisely the same conditions. It would, therefore, be absurd to legislate for the case of tin and copper only. The principle adopted by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) was a just one, and should be made generally applicable to ores which occurred, not in beds, but in lodes.

MR. MUNTZ agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken that tin and copper mines ought not to be made exceptional.

Mr. LIDDELL pointed out that there was much greater risk and uncertainty in working minerals which ran in veins than those which lay in beds, and therefore he thought it essential that the Committee should not attempt to lay down hard-and-fast principles, but should leave it, as far as possible, to the assessment committees, who knew the local circumstances of each case, and who were perfectly competent to deal with the question, as was shown by the fact that in the county with which he was connected (Northumberland) the assessment of mines had been raised during the last few years by £1,000,000 without any appeal having been made.

Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he thought the principle embodied in the Amendment of the hon. Member (Sir John St. Aubyn) would be entirely satisfactory, both to owners of tin and copper mines and other residents in those districts. There need, however, be no interference with the rating of mines the working of which did not partake of the same hazardous character. The royalty paid on a coal mine could only to a limited extent be compared with the rent paid for a farm. In the case of such a mine, the tenant did many things which in a farm would be done by the landlord. A mine might be compared to a tract of moorland which a tenant would take on a long lease at 10s. an acre. The tenant would in that case trench the ground and by outlay would improve it fourfold. The assessment committee would very properly assess him on the improved value. If the occupier of a coal or iron mine had his engines and the cost of sinking the shaft provided by his landlord, he would have to pay a very much higher rent for the mine than he would under ordinary circumstances. He quoted instances to show that the royalty paid for coal mines was in some cases far less than the sum at which the mine was actually assessed at the present time. In one case the royalty was £5,000 and the rated value £5,838; in another case the rateable value would be reduced by one-sixth of the present assessment if the royalty were taken as a basis. It was plain from this that, although the royalty might be a fair basis for Cornwall and copper mines, it would be most unfair for other parts of the country and other mines.

Mr. PAGET failed to see why a special principle should be laid down for these cases, and he hoped the President of the Local Government Board would state whether it was intended to lay down the principle proposed only with regard to these particular mines.

Mr. STANSFELD declined to discuss the new clause before it was drawn; but he would say that he was unable to commit himself any further than he had gone. He had undertaken to accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Sir John St. Aubyn), subject to certain modifications but beyond this he could not go.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked whether the new clause would be brought up upon Report or in Committee?

Mr. STANSFELD said, that he saw no objection to introducing it in Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. PEASE moved, at end of clause, to add—

"The gross annual value of a mine rated under this Act shall be ascertained in manner following:—In the case of a mine occupied upon a rent reserved contingent on the annual produce thereof, whether ascertained by weight or measure (any reservation of a minimum certain or fixed rent notwithstanding); the rent payable by the tenant to the landlord annually shall be deemed the gross annual value, until the contrary be proved. In the case of a mine occupied as aforesaid, and of which the rent payable annually to the landlord shall have been proved to be a rent below the reasonable gross annual value of the said mine; or in the case of a mine occupied on a reservation of fine, or partly on fine and partly on the weight or measure produced; or in the case of a mine occupied by the owner thereof; or in the case of a mine occupied by any other mode of reservation; the gross annual value of such mine shall be estimated on the ascertained produce thereof, and upon a computed rent for such produce as if it had been a mine occupied upon a rent reserved contingent upon the annual produce thereof, whether ascertained by weight or measure."

The hon. Member expressed his opinion that it would be far better to lay down some principle than to leave the matter wholly in the hands of the local assessment committees, a course which would be sure to produce discrepancies in rating. He wanted to have it laid down that those who worked their own minerals should be rated on the same scale as those who merely rented them, with the view to one general standard of rating being established in respect to those mines.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he thought the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham altogether unnecessary. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in the Great Eastern Railway case had laid it down that the rent of a mine was only to be taken as presumptive evidence of value liable to be rebutted. That was what the Amendment of the hon. Member amounted to, and the terms used were no improvement on the well-known words of the Parochial Assessment Act.

MR. HILBERT said, the Amendment would lead to a great reduction in the valuation of many collieries. The mode of assessment proposed was one which would not be in the interest of the ratepayer, and would leave a large amount of property, such as buildings and mining plant belonging to the lessor, unrated. He did not think there was any more difficulty in rating iron mines than there was in rating coal mines; the assessment committees were daily adopting an improved mode of doing so, and a great many gentlemen who were interested in the subject, to whom he had spoken, were in favour of leaving the matter to the assessment committees. This Amendment would be introducing into assessment committees a new bone of contention. The Government could not assent to it.

MR. MUNTZ said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) would consider the question of metalliferous mines generally, and would not make exceptions in the case only of tin and copper.

MR. LIDDELL said, there was great uncertainty in working all minerals; but the uncertainty was greatest in working those which ran in veins. It was essential, therefore, that the Committee should lay down no hard-and-fast line, but should leave the assessment, as far as possible, to be dealt with by local committees acquainted with the local circumstances. In Durham, owing to the recent opening out of mines, the assessment had been raised one million, and there had not been a single case of appeal. This fact showed that no difficulty arose where the assessment was made by local committees.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, if the present Amendment were carried a reduced rating would be brought about on coal and iron mines, and that was an alteration to which he hoped the Government would not give their sanction.

MR. BROGDEN said, he saw no difficulty in applying the principle adopted in respect to the rating of coal mines to all other descriptions of mineral.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he thought it would be most undesirable that any new definitions should be introduced with reference to the rating of mines, as he believed that the principle hitherto applied to coal mines had always worked well.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) was amply justified in bringing this matter under the consideration of the Committee. He would venture to say there was hardly anything in the law of rating so entirely undefined and variable as the mode of rating coal mines. It would be impossible to make the law entirely uniform; but he was confident something might be done in that direction if the President of the Local Government Board would devote the same attention to this matter as he had done to the rating of woods. At the same time, he could not support the precise Amendment proposed by the hon. Member opposite, because its effect would be to rate coal mines on a lower basis than they were at present.

MR. PEASE said, that in placing the Amendment on the Paper, he was actuated only by the desire to secure some uniform system of rating for all mines. Having drawn the attention of the Government to the point, and brought about the brief discussion which had taken place, he should not press the Amendment to a division.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN called attention to the fact that, according to a Parliamentary Return, as many as 13 different modes of assessing coal mines were in force. In more than one-third the royalty was taken as the basis; in others the plant was added; in three the letting value was taken. Surely some definite principle should be fixed on?

MR. LIDDELL stated that the Return from which the hon. Member (Mr. Hussey Vivian) quoted was dated 1867, and great improvements had been made during the past six years in some districts. In the North very great progress allowed to run in the fields on Sunday than be mewed up in Sunday schools. He did not see why special exemptions should be extended to Sunday schools and not to other institutions. They should legislate in this matter so as to bring about a just equality.

Mr. PEASE perfectly agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. In 1869, the House, by a large majority, was of opinion that these schools ought to be exempted from rating; and he thought it was hardly worth while to disturb the compromise then entered into.

Mr. LIDDELL said, he could not, in the name of consistency, see upon what ground the Government could exempt ragged schools and not exempt other institutions from rating. He understood they were disposed to exempt ragged schools because the exemption would save the ratepayers. ["No, no!"] Then why exempt them?

Mr. COLLINS suggested that the clause should be struck out, and that on a future occasion another clause should be brought up, treating the whole subject of exemptions. Supposing the Committee passed the clause as it stood, would that prevent them in the future from dealing with it? Would it prevent them from considering hereafter the whole question of exemption?

Mr. STAVELEY-HILL, while he did not agree with his hon. Friend who had just spoken, did not think his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. C. Reed) had made out a case for exempting ragged schools.

Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH said, it was perfectly true that in 1869 ragged schools were exempted from rating; but since then the Elementary Education Act had been passed which required that children should be sent, not to a ragged school, but to a regular elementary school. Therefore, there was no reason whatever for continuing the exemption of ragged schools.

Mr. HIBBERT said, the clause dealt merely with what were exemptions at the present moment. The question as to other exemptions was to be dealt with hereafter.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH said, it might be taken that ragged schools, under the Elementary Schools Act, would very soon cease to exist, so that the matter in dispute was really only the exemption of Sunday schools. Such an exemption as the law now stood, was equivalent to a grant from the rates in aid of Nonconformist schools alone; for the Sunday schools of the Church of England were generally held in buildings in which, on week-days, education was given which was not gratuitous, and for this reason Church Sunday schools could rarely be exempted under the provisions of the Act. This was so clearly unfair, that he should vote for the repeal of the exemption altogether.

Mr. T. HUGHES said, he did not agree with the hon. Baronet who had just addressed the House, and he hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment.

Mr. CANDLISH said, he thought there were few cases in which the exemption had not been conceded. The country had not rated the schools which they had power to rate; the opinion of the House had been most emphatic in favour of the exemption; and in spite of the opposition of the two front benches, the second reading was carried by a majority of 157.

Mr. MUNTZ said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) had stated that the principle of the Bill was the abolition of exemptions, but he was now giving up the principle, surrendering, as the Solicitor General said, to force. Upon what principle, then, were literary and scientific institutions to be rated? If the principle were abandoned in the case of Sunday and ragged schools, it ought to be abandoned in the case of institutions which had hitherto been exempt, and many of which would be closed if they were subjected to rating.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 239; Majority 212.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

And it being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACTS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GOLDNEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the provisions of the Weights and Measures Acts and to the inexpediency of Superintendents of Police and Police Constables being employed as Inspectors of Weights and Measures under such Acts; and to move a Resolution, said, the subject was one of considerable importance to the commercial and trading community of the country. The great desirability of having a uniform system of weights and measures was admitted; and it had been attempted by successive Governments and Parliaments to secure such a system. In 1760, a standard measure of length was provided, and placed in the custody of the Clerk of the House. No action was, however, taken in reference to it until 1793, when Inspectors of weights and measures were appointed. In 1824, after an inquiry by a Committee of the House, a general Act was passed on the subject, which, however, practically became a dead letter in consequence of no provision being made for the verification and inspection of weights and measures. In 1835, another measure was passed—that which was now in force—under which the weights and measures of the kingdom were regulated. It was a comprehensive measure, and directed that a standard should be provided; that copies should be supplied to the different localities throughout the kingdom; and that certain measures should be adopted for testing and adjusting them, and the different Quarter Sessions throughout the country very freely adopted and very fairly applied it. So matters remained until 1839, in which year the General Police Act was passed, which caused much discussion and gave rise to the apprehension that under it local burdens would be largely increased.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted; and 40 Members being found present—

MR. GOLDNEY resumed: The Act of 1839, instead of being directory, was permissive, and gave power to the Court of Quarter Sessions to put the Act into operation if they thought necessary. The Act had been in operation for years throughout all the counties of England, and was working satisfactorily as a Police Act; but the magistrates, in order to make it more palatable, proposed some changes. The provisions of the Act of 1835 were that in every county the magistrates should divide the whole area into districts; that over such districts there should be an Inspector, and a complete set of standard weights and measures; and that it should be the duty of the Inspector to attend market towns on certain specified days. He (Mr. Goldney) contended that the effect of having put the execution of the law with respect to this subject into the hands of the police had been in a great many cases to deter fair dealers from bringing their weights and measures to be adjusted owing to their apprehension that they might be summoned for having them incorrect. It appeared, too, that the police fancied it was their duty not to afford any assistance to the trader in adjusting his weights and measures, but rather to detect wherever they could anything like irregularity. The operation of the law under these became so burdensome that a great many Petitions were presented to the House praying for relief. In 1867, a Royal Commission was appointed to consider the subject of weights and measures. That Commission sat five years and published five separate Reports at different intervals. They reported that the whole system was bad, if not vicious; that there was no central authority at all to control the Inspectors; that the weights and measures required skilled persons to deal with them; that it was inexpedient that police duties should be imported into matters which were connected with the commercial system; and that steps should be taken to give facilities to traders to have their weights and measures rectified. The misfortune was that there was no discretion vested in the magistrates in this matter, and a party having in his possession any weights and measures which differed from the proper standard was liable to be punished equally with the man who committed a fraud. The evidence taken by the Commission showed that at one time the convictions in Manchester were so large and vexatious that the tradesmen petitioned the town council to change the system, which was done. At Bath, where the convictions had been intolerable, the new Inspector invited all the traders to come to his office and have their weights and measures adjusted. They did this willingly, and the Inspector gave it as his opinion that when weights and measures were deficient it arose not from fraud, but in almost every case from accident or negligence. There should be some central control for testifying the qualifications of the testers, and that the duties should be performed with regularity and fairness. The object should be to prevent fraud, and not to encourage its detection, and precautions should be established that persons should not be punished for deficiencies of a venial character. There should be a distinction between those who verified the weights and measures and those who had to inspect them. The scale makers refused, before the Committee, to guarantee the correctness of their weights and measures for six months on the ground that use, and even contact with the atmosphere, would soon place them out of order. One of the recommendations of the Commission was that the Board of Trade should have the appointment of these Inspectors, and it would be desirable that at all events they should pass the Civil Service examination. Some of these police Inspectors had thought it right to enter into the Government Departments. One had entered a post-office and examined the balances used in weighing letters, while another had gone into the Custom House and tested the measures of capacity employed in spirits and wines. In another case one Inspector went into a country banker's in order to examine the weights used for gold. If their powers were really so large there ought to be some security that they were competent to undertake their duties. If the Government thought it desirable to employ these policemen as stampers and examiners it was desirable on every ground to relieve them from their duties as policemen. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is inexpedient to continue the employment of Superintendents of Police and Police Constables as Inspectors of Weights and Measures."—(Mr. Goldney.)

Mr. PEEL said, that in the absence of the President of the Board of Trade, the duty devolved upon him of replying to the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Chippenham. He admitted that the subject was one of immense importance, and one which, if placed upon a sound and satisfactory basis, would give an amount of satisfaction throughout the country which more apparently important measures had failed to inspire. It was in 1835 that the Act was passed by which the whole inspection of weights and measures was put in the hands of the local authorities, who appointed their local Inspectors; and since that time there had been no material change in the law, although various Committees and Commissions of Inquiry had been appointed and had reported upon the subject. He agreed with the hon. Member that the great object which they should keep in view in regard to this matter was unity, and to a certain extent centralization of authority. If they could have a central authority possessing practical and experimental scientific knowledge, and which could impart such knowledge to and control the local officers, great advantage would be gained; but, considering the number of officers appointed throughout the country, it would be difficult to aim at that unity of system which was so desirable. Among the bodies empowered to appoint Inspectors were the Justices of Quarter Sessions, the Vice Chancellors of the Universities, and the town councils in England; the magistrates, the grand juries, and, in default of them, the Judges of Assize in Ireland, and the justices convened by the Sheriff in Scotland. The remarks of his hon. Friend were chiefly intended to show that under the Act of 1835, officers of comparatively rude character were appointed who were unfitted to perform the delicate duties intrusted to them, and that if it was desired to have an efficient system there must be a control over the officers, who must themselves be of sufficient intelligence to receive impressions from head-quarters. He thought that was a most excellent scheme, and it was the endeavour of the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, who, it should be noticed, drew a distinction between the offices which the police were fit to hold, and those for which they were not properly qualified. The Commissioners entertained no objection to the employment of the police in the inspection as far as fraud or accidental injury of weights and measures was concerned, though they were unanimously of opinion that the duty of verification should be performed by a much higher class of men. He hoped that time might be found, though not this Session, to embody in a Bill the recommendations of the Commissioners, which were of the highest importance to the country at large, and that in the Bill would be clauses containing the spirit and the practical suggestions which the hon. Gentleman had made to the House. In his opinion, they would most successfully meet the wishes of his hon. Friend if they could infuse a portion of the great skill and practical experience of the Warden of the Standards into the officers who might be appointed throughout the country. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would rest satisfied with this explanation, and not press his Motion to a division.

MR. MUNTZ said, he had not found in town or country any complaint with reference to the inspection of weights and measures. In the larger towns they were attended to in the most admirable manner. They wanted no central authority in this matter. If anything they had too much of it, and they saw its evil effects elsewhere. There was not only the seller but the buyer to be considered, and he wished to know who was to appoint these talented Inspectors proposed by the hon. Gentleman, and who was to pay for them. Weights and measures, taken as a whole, were fairly attended to; and if such was not the case in the county in which the hon. Gentleman resided why did he not, in quarter sessions, move for a committee to inquire into the matter. A very much better case must be made out before the House of Commons would consent to have a central authority dealing with their weights and measures. If they were to go on in that way, in a short time they would have nothing but central authorities. In the counties with which he was acquainted no difficulty whatever was experienced in the matter. Even if they were to appoint a man in London at a salary of £10,000 a-year to superintend the weights and measures of the kingdom mistakes would be made. If hon. Members in their own localities would endeavour to insure accuracy, it would have much more effect than the appointment of a highly paid central authority.

MR. HAMBRO said, that in his county (Dorsetshire) there were very few complaints, and the duties were efficiently performed at a very small expense. He agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down that if hon. Gentlemen in their own localities were to attend to the matter they would do much more good than a central official who would cost the country a great deal.

MR. SCOURFIELD observed that in his county (Pembrokeshire) he had heard no complaints on this subject. This, however, was an age of grievances of every possible kind; but there was no such practical grievance in this matter that the Board of Trade should appoint a highly-paid official to look after it.

MR. A. JOHNSTON felt bound to say that within his knowledge there were great complaints of the working of the Act; but, perhaps, the complaints came from tradesmen not as honest as they should be. There might be something in the matter brought forward by his hon. Friend. As payment was exacted from the tradesman, the Inspector was apt to be hard on those who did not come often to have their weights and measures verified.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that after the assurance which had been given by the Government he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND (PATRONAGE).

RESOLUTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, in rising to call the attention of the House to the present system of patronage in the Church of Scotland; and, to move—

“That, whereas the presentation of ministers to Churches in Scotland by patrons under the existing law and practice has been the cause of much division among the people and in the Church of Scotland, it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should take the whole subject into consideration, with a view of legislating as to the appointment and settlement of Ministers in the Church of Scotland,”

said, there was hardly one passage of Scottish history which was as interesting as that which he had the honour of introducing. He thought he could show that it was according to the genius of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland that the election of ministers should be in the hands of the people. He should be obliged to take the House a long way back to show this. The principle was laid down in the First Book of Discipline. It was also found in the Second Book of Discipline of 1578. It was recognized in the various Acts passed in 1592, under which the Presbyterian form of government had been sanctioned by the civil power, in 1638, 1649, 1660, and in 1690, when patronage was abolished as having been greatly abused. This was the Act—that of 1690—on which he mainly relied. The Act of 1690, besides giving the right of tithes to the patrons, gave a payment of 600 merks when the patronage was removed. The Act, as far as he had been able to ascertain, had been made with the desire of giving full compensation to the patrons, and the same wish existed at the present day. They rested a great deal on the settlements of 1690, and he thought he should be able to show to the House that they only desired to return to the settlement then made. The Union of Scotland and England took place in 1707, and he desired to show that when that Union took effect the Act of 1690, chap. 23, on which he relied, was incorporated in the Act of Union, and they were entitled to demand that every subsequent Act which interfered with it should be repealed if it could be shown that it had worked ill. He thought they might reasonably have supposed that the Act under which the Union was passed in the year 1707 might have remained undisturbed. Such, however, was the troublesome state of affairs at that time, that it was only five years after the passing of that Act when the whole of this solemn compact was thrown to the winds. In 1712 an Act was passed which revived patronage, which undid all the good which had been secured to the Church and people of Scotland by the Act of 1690, and by the previous Act of 1649. He did not wish to characterize that Act by any stronger terms than by stating that it was a violation of the Act of Union. Lord Macaulay had said that the British Legislature violated this Act, and from that change had flowed all that Dissent which now existed in Scotland. The Church had petitioned against its violation almost continuously from that time to the present. He thought he did not say too much when he said that every secession which had taken place from the Church of Scotland had been more or less due to the Act of Anne. He would not assert that was the only cause of secession; but he would say that at its root lay the objections to the unfortunate Act passed in what was known as the Black Parliament of Anne, in 1712. He might come at once to the unfortunate disruption of the Church in 1843. He would say that, in point of fact, that disruption was due to patronage. In 1842 the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland passed a resolution as to patronage, to the effect that patronage was a grievance, attended with much injury to the cause of true religion, and ought to be abolished. He knew that the question of spiritual independence was very much involved in the disruption of 1843; but he believed that the root of the evil in 1843 and subsequent periods was patronage. He was extremely unwilling to say too much as to the result of the passing of the Act or its repeal. He would like to say a few words as to the motives which actuated him in bringing the matter forward. He heard from all sides that it was a narrow-minded movement; that the Church cared for no one except herself; and that the movement did not deserve the confidence and support of the House. If that was a true description of the movement, he should not have had a hand in it at all. He trusted that he had more liberality. He had sat in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland for seven years, and he undertook to say that that Church had invariably exhibited a spirit of liberality in this matter, and that their desire was not to benefit themselves, but to find a basis of union with Presbyterian bodies. No such basis of union could be conceived or formed until the Act of Anne was abolished. He did not say what was to replace that Act. It was not for him to enter upon so large a question; but the earnest desire of the Church of Scotland, the only desire by which he was actuated, was to find a basis upon which they could re-construct the Established Presbyterian Church of Scotland. As the Prime Minister would ask him for a proposal, he would say his proposal was to repeal the Act of Anne and to fall back on the settlement of 1690, which was thoroughly well known and approved in Scotland, leaving to the Church the responsibility for making regulations for the election of ministers. This step would remove the great obstacle to the union of the Established with the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church, which were separated by differences that were microscopic; it would enable any former minister of the Established Church to accept office in it; and, as regarded others, a simple resolution of the General Assembly would enable them to do so. That morning he should have made a different statement; for he should not have supposed it possible that those who had attained freedom by extraordinary sacrifices could wish to prevent others doing so by constitutional means. In the course of the day, however, he had received a resolution of the Free Church Committee, who, far too wise to object to the dealing with the Act of Anne, or to the abolition of patronage, deprecated any Parliamentary action "not adapted to meet the entire ecclesiastical condition of Scotland"—a very vague and ambiguous phrase. What action would be adapted to meet that condition if the repeal of the Act of Anne would not? for it was the one thing to which every section of the Presbyterian Church was opposed. If any member of that Committee sat in this House he would be bound to support this Resolution. The Committee of the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church had drawn up a document of a far more consistent character. It referred to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Established Churches of England and Scotland. The views of United Presbyterians, as consistent volunteers, were entitled to the highest respect; but he wanted to know whether the Government or the House desired the disestablishment of the Established Churches of England and Scotland. Why, the House, only a very few weeks ago, had decided by an overwhelming majority against any such proposal. The Committee of the Synod of the United Presbyterians went on, however, to say that "The Established Church of Scotland has done nothing to warrant its being aided by the general citizenship and the members of other Churches to an enlargement of the statutory powers."

He knew well the loss which the Established Church of Scotland sustained through the disruption of 1843; but if she had not been rooted deeply in the affections of the people, if she had not been doing a good, a great, and a glorious work, the throes of that great disruption would have destroyed her. In 1843 that Established Church had 924 original parishes, 42 Parliamentary chapels, and other chapels and preaching places, to the number of 233, making a total of 1,189; and since 1843 she had erected 37 of those chapels into parishes, and endowed new parishes to the number of 182, at a total cost of £673,000. The same Church had built upwards of 200 new chapels, at a cost of from £1,500 to £2,000 apiece. Yet they were told that she was not entitled to be aided, and was not doing her duty in the country. That statement was, he thought, unfounded, and one which it was unworthy of the United Presbyterian Body to make. It was urged that there was no feeling among the people of Scotland against lay patronage; that there had been no public meetings about it; and that all that movement was within the Church herself. He would admit that there had not been a great outside agitation on the question; but it was not the habit of the Church to get up great agitations. Moreover, the system of patronage was practically abolished now. Appointments to all the Crown livings were made at the instance of the Home Secretary. When a Crown living fell vacant the Home Secretary sent down to ask what the people wished, and to say that if they would name an acceptable and proper candidate, he would appoint him. Practically, therefore, the Crown patronage was in the hands of the people, and in a large majority of instances the same was the case with the private patronage. But if the existing system had been found to be so bad and unworkable that it had been already virtually abandoned, why should the rights of the people rest upon the caprice of the Crown or of any individual patron? The principle for which he contended was recognized by Sir James Graham's Act, which was passed in 1843. With these facts before them, he wondered that anybody should suppose that the system would not work well. It would be objected to his Motion that there was nothing in it referring to the Act of Anne; but, on the other hand, if he had proposed any specific action, it would have been said that some other course would be a great deal better. He had, however, indicated the way in which he wished to proceed, and for his proposal he hoped to have independent support from both sides of the House. If no Liberal Motion could be made by a Churchman, and no Liberal Motion could be supported by anybody who sat opposite, he was sorry for it. They had not, he supposed, a monopoly of wisdom on his side of the House. When he found a Motion which he believed to be essentially good, and which ought to be passed in the interest of the Church of Scotland and of Liberal principles within and without that Church, he was not ashamed of receiving support from Gentlemen opposite. His great desire was that the Government should undertake to deal with this subject. He knew his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government would say he was so burdened with work that it was impossible for him to undertake to do so; but he (Sir Robert Anstruther) did not expect the Motion to be accepted in its entirety upon the first occasion of its being presented to Parliament. This was a matter worthy of the consideration of the Government. It was a matter which interested the great mass of the Scotch people. The measure he recommended was a liberal measure, notwithstanding it was supported by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. He believed it to be a measure which would heal ecclesiastical differences in Scotland to a large extent, and the Government which carried such a measure—whether the present or a succeeding Government—would earn the gratitude and esteem of the people of that country. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. GORDON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, whereas the presentation of Ministers to Churches in Scotland by patrons under the existing Law and practice has been the cause of much division among the people and in the Church of Scotland, it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should take the whole subject into consideration, with a view of legislating as to the appointment and settlement of Ministers in the Church of Scotland."—(Sir Robert Anstruther.)

Mr. M'LAREN objected to the Resolution on account of its extreme vagueness. It only said that the Government should be requested to take the matter into consideration with a view to legislation. It said nothing as to the direction which that legislation should take. It was a mere abstract, unmeaning Resolution. Instead of a Resolution for a plan it was a Resolution fishing for a plan—suggesting that the Government should find what his hon. Friend was unable to find himself. His hon. Friend had said that all would be right if the Act of Anne were abolished; but why did he not ask the House to say so in his Resolution? Again, his hon. Friend quoted the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland as being favourable to his Motion; but their resolutions from year to year showed that they regarded the movement in which he was engaged with horror. In 1869 they resolved that the election of ministers should be by a committee of heritors, elders, and male communicants, giving at the same time some effect to the opinions of the permanent community. It would be observed that the female communicants were excluded from a share in the nomination, whilst in the United Presbyterian Church and in the Free Church female communicants took part in the election of ministers. That resolution was affirmed in the two following years, and last year they resolved that the election of ministers should be held "according to the views of the Church," that was to say, not by popular vote, but by the election of heritors, elders, and male communicants. His hon. Friend had read and communicated a resolution which he said had been that day passed by the Free Church. He would remind his hon. Friend that resolutions communicated by telegraph were not always correct. He (Mr. M'Laren) had received a letter from a leading member of the Free Church written yesterday, telling him what was to be done next day, and the course which would be adopted, and which threw more light on the matter than the telegram did. The correspondent said they would object to this movement as essentially an attempt to alter the existing state of things in the direction of a rehabilitation of the Established Church. They objected to the rehabilitation as a delusive one, and they objected to the authority of Parliament being applied to for any Church purpose, and in particular they would regret it as a serious mistake on the part of the Government if they lent any countenance to the movement. The correspondent said the effect of the movement, if taken up by Parliament, would be to leave the greater part of the Church to expand, and would expand it in the sense of disestablishment. [Cries of "Name!"] He should be happy to give the name to any hon. Member if he wished it. At the last Assembly there was a great discussion on the subject, and three forms of resolution were submitted, all strongly condemning the Established Church as an establishment. The strongest of the three resolutions was adopted by a large majority. His hon. Friend seemed to represent the United Presbyterian Body as having observed a discourteous attitude towards the Established Church, and he also dilated on the progress achieved by the Church itself. Now, on the last occasion when this subject was discussed, he stated that the Church had advanced greatly, as seen by the fact that in the previous year it had collected £250,000. But in the comparison of the United Presbyterian Body and the Church of Scotland, it was right to remember that the Church of Scotland had 1,200 ministers, while the United Presbyterians had but 500; and that while the Church collected £250,000, the Presbyterian Body collected £100,000 more. The Established Church was not justified, therefore, he thought, in coming to Parliament as par excellence the Church of the people, and as entitled to be put on a more advantageous footing than all the other religious bodies in Scotland. He hoped, therefore, the Resolution would be negatived.

Mr. O. DALRYMPLE was anxious at the outset to say that those who were favourable to the Motion were under obligations to his hon. Friend the Member for Fifehire (Sir Robert Anstruther) for bringing it forward, and expressed his satisfaction that a subject which was associated in Scotland with so much controversy, and which required a delicate and tender handling had been introduced in a speech which left nothing to be desired. The hon. Member for Edinburgh had charged the Motion with vagueness; but his hon. Friend had, he thought, exercised a wise discretion in not widening too much the field of discussion, and he must on his part complain of the vagueness of the speech of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) inasmuch as he devoted his time not to answering the speech of his hon. Friend, but details of a scheme which was not before the House, and that he quoted the letter of some distinguished correspondent, a member of the Free Church, a communication which he expected would have great weight with the House, and then declined to give the name of the writer. He (Mr. Dalrymple) recognized in the tone of the letter, the tone of the printed communication from the Free Church, which had already been quoted. He was not sorry that some delay had occurred in bringing forward the question, because it was well that public opinion with respect to it should have time to ripen in Scotland. It was well that the general assembly of the Church of Scotland should have the opportunity in five successive years of declaring by decisive and deliberate majorities in favour of the change; it was well that the subject should have received something of a rebuff and check. Some years ago on the occasion of a memorable deputation to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, if it had the effect, as he believed it had, of sending back the Committee upon Patronage to Scotland, to reconsider the whole matter to look again into the history of the question, to summarize and condense it for their use in Parliament, and to make quite sure of the state of feeling throughout the country upon the subject. Now, however, the right time had arrived, because public opinion had become matured, and because the Church of Scotland was engaged in busy and successful work. Those who now advocated change were not doing so on behalf of a decrepit institution, but of one which was at once venerable and full of life, and which merely asked for that restoration of her liberty which she deemed to be necessary for the exercise of her natural powers. But there was another reason which at first seemed to tell against their case. Why the time was well selected for his hon. Friend's Motion. There never was, perhaps, a time when patronage was better administered in Scotland than at present, not only by private individuals, but by the Crown; but he did not mention that fact as an argument for retaining patronage, because he held that a score of what were called harmonious settlements did not outweigh the evils of one disputed settlement, and a disputed settlement was always possible under the present system. What he wished to urge was that if the change were made, while patronage was being well administered, they might hope that the change would be effected without heart-burnings, that they might pass as by an easy transition from the old system to the new, without that sort of wrench which follows upon exasperation of feeling, and upon a sense of disappointment and injury. After all the demand was natural, for obviously no persons could be so interested in the appointment of a minister as those who were to profit by his ministrations. What he looked for was a popular system, such, for example, as the nomination of a committee in every parish, elected by as wide a body of electors as the people pleased, a committee who, in the event of a vacancy, should have the choice of the minister. By this system the evils of canvassing, cajolery, and the abuses of a popular election would be avoided. With regard to "females," as the hon. Member had called them, he must be a bold man who proposed to exclude them from having a "say" in the election of a minister. Some people thought it a matter for humiliation to have to come to Parliament in matters of this kind. It was alleged that the members of the Established Church liked to hug their fetters. For his part, he denied there were any fetters. He had always been of opinion that the State benefited more by its alliance with the Church than the Church did by its alliance with the State; but for the present it might suffice to say that the question which was raised to-night was one of such delicacy and difficulty that he would not like to trust its settlement to any body less important than the Imperial Parliament. There might be difficulties in the way of the settlement of the question; but at least it was important now to ask for the opinion of Her Majesty's Government upon it. For his part, he did not know where the opposition to the movement was to come from. It was not likely to come to any great extent from the patrons; already a conspicuous example had been set by a distinguished proprietor and patron, a noble Duke, who was a Member of the present Government—an example of liberality in connection with this question which he trusted would be widely imitated. Nor would opposition come from many who were outside the Established Church. On many occasions had ministers of the Free Church with whom he was acquainted, urged that they should endeavour to advance the object which they had in view in the Motion of that night. They owed it to themselves to endeavour to advance the question; They owed it also to the memories of those who in past times had worked in the cause, but who were no longer among them. He never could dissociate the subject from the recollection of one who was a prominent member of the deputation which had been referred to—a man who was as superior to all narrow and sectarian views, as he was conspicuous for his stature among men, and possessed of a gifted eloquence to which few could aspire. He referred of course to the late Dr. Norman Macleod. For the sake of the memory of men such as he, as well as in respect of their own principles, they were bound to promote the objects of the Motion. He should give the Motion his cordial support, and he trusted that it would at no distant period form the basis of legislation.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Anstruther), but he felt entirely at a loss to make out in what capacity he had appeared. He looked to the Motion, and he had to confess that he could not find anything in it. In his speech the hon. Baronet certainly gave them some idea of his opinion; but he carefully guarded himself against being supposed to represent anyone but himself. The hon. Member had also been careful not to commit himself to any plan. He had referred to a great member of the Established Church—Dr. Norman Macleod—but he forgot the questions put by the Prime Minister to the rev. Doctor in the memorable deputation as to what the Church proposed. That question put the Church hors de combat, and so far as he was aware it had never been answered—and what were they asked to do now? Not to condemn patronage. They were asked simply to declare that the presentation of ministers had led to great divisions. This was pretty much a truism. The history of the Church was well known, and the disruption of 1843 was sufficient to show the divisions that were caused by patronage; but the hon. Baronet had not the courage of his opinions. He did not ask them to condemn patronage, and the Resolution as it stood would not make them one whit better than they were now. It did not even ask the House to say that the Government should take it up; but merely that it was expedient it should be dealt with. In all the circumstances, he thought that the question was not ripe for discussion, and that it could not be till some practical scheme were brought forward. He therefore declined to discuss the question at present; and, as he was neither inclined to support the Motion nor to vote for patronage, he thought the best thing for him to do was to move the Previous Question.

MR. GRAHAM seconded the Amendment.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Craufurd.)

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR gave his cordial support to that part of the Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for Fifeshire (Sir Robert Anstruther), which declared the—"Presentation of Ministers to Churches in Scotland by patrons under the existing Law and practice has been the cause of much division among the people and in the Church of Scotland."

He supported it the more readily because his own people had gone out of the Church of Scotland at the time of the first disruption, in consequence of the exercise of private patronage. The hon. Baronet now came to the House of Commons, and claimed for that Church the right to be freed from a law which oppressed the consciences of the Christian people who adhered to the Established Church of Scotland. This was a right which he showed had existed in former years, and had been guaranteed to the people of Scotland by the Settlement at the time of the Union. It was withdrawn by an unjust law passed in 1712 by an English Parliament against the feelings and wishes of the Scotch people; and the abolition of this patronage would restore the right to choose the ministers of the Church to the people to whom it belonged. There could be no doubt on this head, seeing that the Petition to Parliament prepared in 1869 under the resolution of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland set forth that—

"Your Petitioners are further of opinion that the nomination of ministers should be vested in Heritors, Elders, and Communicants."

This right to decide on the selection of their ministers by the people belonging to the free Churches of Scotland, had been resolutely contended for and successfully secured by these Churches, and in a way which would ever reflect honour on the spirit and resolution of a Christian people. No doubt other reforms in the Established Church of Scotland must follow on this righteous claim being conceded, and seeing that he (Sir George Balfour) had voted in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) for entire disestablishment of all churches, no doubt could exist as to what his vote ought to be on this Motion. It would be time to express an opinion as to disestablishment of the Church of Scotland when that question was brought directly before the House, but in the meantime the Church of Scotland ought to be relieved of the oppression of which she complained.

MR. ORR EWING said, that the objections of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) seemed to be not so much to the principle of the Resolution as to the fact that the hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Anstruther) did not propose any scheme in place of the one which he wished to do away with. The question, however, was a very difficult one to deal with, and it was almost impossible for a private Member to take it in hand, because at least one-third of the patronage of the Church of Scotland belonged to the Crown. The Resolution was, however, brought forward by the hon. Baronet in the belief that it was the almost unanimous opinion of the laity both of the Established and the Free Churches that the system of patronage ought to be abolished. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had endeavoured to show that the Church of Scotland gave very little in the way of subscriptions in comparison with the other Churches; but it should be recollected that the clergymen of that Church were paid by the heritors and in other ways, and were not dependent on the money given by persons who held seats, as in the case of the Dissenting Churches, and as these amounts all figured as subscriptions in the case of the latter they certainly made a larger show in that respect. They did not, however, wish for a moment to injure any of the other Churches; all they wanted was to benefit their own. He regretted that a question of such importance to Scotland should be discussed in such a thin House. The Scotch were a loyal people, and transacted their business quietly, and therefore few Members took any interest in subjects affecting them; but when any matter was brought forward with reference to the Irish, who were more aliens and enemies than friends, there were generally a large number of Members present. It appeared to him extraordinary that the Free Church of Scotland should appear before that House in opposition to the abolition of patronage, when the people of that country generally were in its favour. The sole motive which he could assign for that opposition was that they feared the Established Church would be strengthened by the change, while she might lose some of her followers; but there was plenty of room for all the religious bodies in Scotland, and there was no good reason why patronage should be maintained contrary to the general wish.

MR. MACFIE said, that the abolition of patronage was one of the traditional cries of the old Whigs of Scotland, and he did not believe that their descendants had changed their opinion on the subject. Nothing would please the Scottish people so much as to know that the House had agreed to the Motion of his hon. Friend (Sir Robert Anstruther). That Motion was a request to the Government to take up this ecclesiastical subject, and to do for Scotland what they had already done for Ireland. They had been told that the Free Church would not come back; but he did not care whether they did or not; the House ought to do justice to the Established Church of Scotland, and if they did that there would be nothing to prevent the whole of the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland from working together, and dividing the endowments between them.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr Ewing) had referred in the course of his speech—he was sure unintentionally—to the people of Ireland in terms which he must regret, when he stated that they were to be viewed rather in the character of aliens and enemies than of loyal and faithful subjects. He would not, however, dwell on the matter any further, for the hon. Member was too benevolent calmly to adopt any such sentiment. The hon. Member had also called attention to the thin attendance of hon. Members during this important discussion; but he (Mr. Gladstone) thought he could make a good apology for the House in respect to that matter. He agreed that the convictions of the people of Scotland ought to govern the action of the House in reference to it; but it was not easy to ascertain what those convictions were, and he was quite sure there would have been a much larger attendance of Members if the House felt that the time had arrived when they could discuss this question to a practical issue. He regarded this as a preliminary discussion. He did not complain of the Motion having been brought forward. After this discussion there would be greater maturity of opinion in Scotland than could be said to prevail at present. His hon. Friend (Sir Robert Anstruther) was able to show that for a long series of years back there had been discussions in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and declarations in favour of a great change in the system of presentation to livings, involving the abolition of patronage; and he had also been able to show that a large portion of the patrons themselves were disposed to concur in the change. Those were important facts, and they seemed to warrant his hon. Friend in asking Parliament to adopt some measure to that end; but his hon. Friend had in his candour stated other facts, and they were to the effect that important bodies like the Free Church and the United Presbyterians had expressed their sentiments upon the subject in a way which showed that they were entitled to have their opinions upon it, and that they must be considered in any legislation which might be adopted by Parliament. That was a position which would prevent the House from giving a definitive opinion at present upon the question. This discussion had been an interesting one; but his hon. Friend, in his eloquent speech, had in reality only touched the question—he had passed over the surface of it. His hon. Friend commenced his Motion with a vague declaration, and concluded by saying that the system of appointment of ministers ought to be greatly altered. That proposition was a very important one, but was a very small portion of the whole subject. It was true there had been in Scotland, from the time of the Reformation onwards, a strong re-action against the system of patronage. He (Mr. Gladstone) remembered the controversy on the veto law. At that time and from that time he had always felt that those who passed that law contended for what was called spiritual independence, and they finally passed a resolution against patronage. But there had been a remarkable diversity of proceeding in Scotland, and there was at this moment the widest difference of opinion as to what ought to be done with regard to a change in the present law. There were several different epochs of Scottish history from 1560 downwards, when the law relating to ministers had been altered, and for scarcely any two of them had the same method been adopted. In 1834 the question was handled by elders of the Scotch Church, who were men of eminence, and who would be an ornament to any communion in Christendom, and a completely new method was adopted. None of the old plans were revived. It was proposed that there should be a right of veto only in the male heads of families, being communicants; but that night there had been quoted the declaration of the General Assembly of the present year, which proposed not to establish popular election in the wide sense, but to give the power of veto to the heritors, elders, and male communicants. [Mr. ORR EWING: Committees to be formed of each of these elements.] That only showed how far it would be from popular election. If they were to take their stand on the ancient system of popular representation, that would not be election by committees, but a right of election claimed by Christian people generally. The General Assembly did not go that length. As to the Motion, while he thought the time had come when it was reasonable that some steps should be taken in this matter, he did not think that the time had come when it would be wise or safe for the Government or the House to bind themselves by a general Resolution which gave no indication of the nature of the measure to be adopted. In repealing the Act of 1690 they would give the nomination to the heritors and elders, by whom the presentation would be made to the congregation for their assent; but such a proceeding would be a perfect mockery in such counties as Ross and Sutherland; and when they regarded the condition of ecclesiastical matters in portions of Scotland which were not inconsiderable, the question of patronage raised a very large question indeed. How far they were to extend the right of election, and how far it was to be limited to the choice of ministers conforming to the rules of the Established Church, were very great and serious questions, and well deserving of examination. Now, he would state a circumstance that came within his own personal knowledge. Being in Scotland last year he went to church on Sunday. There was the Established Church and the Free Church, and what was the state of things? In the Established Church the minister preached to a mass of empty benches. A few members connected with English families visiting the neighbourhood, the members of the minister's own family, and a few others, numbering about 10 or 12 persons altogether, composed the congregation, hardly entitled to be called one, but the minister was paid by the State. Well, a little down the valley was the Free Church, crammed to excess, while those who attended had not means enough to pay a clergyman for their spiritual wants. This was an extraordinary state of things, and one which gave rise to serious questions. The hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs (Mr. Craufurd) had moved the Previous Question. On questions which were premature he (Mr. Gladstone) thought it was a most fair course to take. What he proposed was this, that Parliament should pursue—he could not say during the present Session, because the latter part of the month of June was not a time when practical progress could be made with reference to a subject of this sort—the course which was pursued by Parliament at the time of the last great crisis of the Church of Scotland. At that time a Committee was appointed by the House to make an investigation into the history of the Church of Scotland in relation to the law of patronage, which investigation, although it did not terminate in any legislative action, was, he believed, of great value. Since 1834, Parliament had no examination of the matter and yet very important changes had been made in the interim. That most remarkable disruption which occurred in 1843, recorded, he was afraid, an instance in which the rulers of this country did not really know the course they ought to have pursued. In conclusion, he would say that viewing the inherent difficulties of this case, and the importance that, before taking definite steps, they should well understand what they were going to do, he proposed that Parliament should be invited at the earliest fitting opportunity to resume these investigations of 1844, so as they might have the opportunity of gathering material and satisfying the House as to the real convictions and wishes of the people of Scotland in regard to the law of patronage. He was persuaded that in pursuing that course his hon. Friend (Sir Robert Anstruther) would be using the greatest diligence and the greatest despatch towards the practical settlement of the question; and if he agreed to such a proposal he would have every assistance on the part of the Government that he could reasonably desire, although undoubtedly it would not be consonant to their duty or their interest, in the face of defective information upon such an important matter, and so vital, to pledge themselves to the course contained in the Motion before the House.

MR. GORDON said, that in the first place, for the sake of the Church of Scotland, they should endeavour to place the matter upon a footing which would be consistent with the feelings of the people of Scotland; and they should also endeavour to do so because they were hopeful that the result of a change in the matter of patronage would bring about a reunion of the Presbyterian Churches which concurred in faith and the rules of Church government, and which would never have been separated had it not been for the unfortunate disputes with reference to the exercise of Church patronage. He trusted that some arrangement would be made by which the matter would be settled in a satisfactory manner.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER replied, in answer to the question which had been asked, as to what was his reason for introducing the Motion, he had only to say that he had introduced it as an independent Member of the House, and had consulted with no one except his hon. Friend who had seconded the Motion. He agreed that this was the first time the subject had been introduced into the House for many years, and that this Motion could only have the effect of ventilating it. He had been met in the most handsome and conciliatory manner by the Government, and if the Amendment were withdrawn he should be most willing to withdraw the original Motion.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE urged the hon. Member for Ayr not to divide the House by pressing his Amendment.

MR. MILLER expressed his belief that the latter part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech would create great dissatisfaction in Scotland, as it simply meant the prolongation of the discussion from year to year until something was done in the matter.

Previous Question and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. OTWAY said, it would be unnecessary for him to go at length into the subject upon which he had given Notice of a Motion, as he was glad to say the Government had intimated to him that they would not oppose the inquiry for which he asked. There was a class of gentlemen to whom the Motion referred who had suffered great wrong and considerable pecuniary loss by certain Orders in Council which had affected their position, and there was another class of persons interested in this Motion with regard to whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer had acted with that consideration and fairness with which he (Mr. Otway) felt sure he would act when their case was fully brought to his notice. The right hon. Gentleman had that day announced certain concessions, which if carried into effect in the spirit to which he (Mr. Otway) had alluded, would give satisfaction to that class also. The State had been employing for many years a class of persons called writers, as was supposed, for merely mechanical work; but, in point of fact, they had been doing clerical work of a high order, and sometimes even had been engaged in instructing the clerks of the Government. They had expected that they would receive, according to the regulation of the Civil Service Commissioners, special pay for this special work, but had not received such pay. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met him in a fair and liberal spirit, and had promised that effect should be given to the regulation referred to, he would simply move his Motion.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire whether Writers appointed before August 1871 have suffered any wrong or injustice by the cessation of the system of a progressive rate of payment."
—(Mr. Otway.)

And, on July 2, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. STANSFELD, Sir PERCY HERRBERT, Sir HENRY HOARE, Mr. PLUNKET, Mr. KIRKMAN HODGSON, Mr. BATES, Mr. DILLWYN, Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Mr. BACKHOUSE, Mr. PERCY WYNHAM, and Mr. OTWAY:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (EXPENSES) BILL.—[BILL 26.]

(Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Baines, Mr. M^r Laren.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FAWCETT, in moving "That the Bill be now read a second time," said, he thought he should be able to show in a few sentences that, while it involved a principle of the greatest importance, its provisions were extremely simple. The Bill proposed, in the first place, to make candidates at elections no longer liable for the necessary election expenses, but to transfer that liability to the locality, and it in the next place provided security against vexatious canvassing. As to the latter point, he had, after considerable reflection, arrived at the conclusion that, instead of imposing a pecuniary fine, which in certain cases might operate with great hardship, the candidate who did not poll a certain number of votes should be regarded as having presented himself to the constituency without a reasonable chance of success, and that he should, under those circumstances, be rendered liable to his share of the expenses exactly in the same way as under the existing law. What the proportion of votes should be was a matter of detail. He had fixed it at one-fifth of the whole number of electors polled, but if the House thought that proportion too large, he should have no objection to make it one-sixth or one-seventh in Committee. He should next address himself to the arguments which would probably be urged against the Bill. It would, perhaps, be contended that it would be unfair and impolitic to throw any new charge on the rates until the whole question of local taxation had been settled. The same argument had been urged that day week in opposition to a measure for the abolition of tolls on bridges in Scotland; but the House had arrived at the conclusion that the imposition of a new charge on the rates ought not to stand in the way of a necessary reform. If it were to be allowed to do so, the Amendment of which his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) had given Notice would be fatal to the Elementary Education Act Amendment Bill which had been introduced by the Government. But the argument drawn from the inexpe-diency of imposing new burdens on the rates until the question of local taxation had been settled was, in his opinion, strongly in favour of the measure now before the House. Was it not of the utmost importance that before the bargain as between Imperial and local taxation was finally struck, it should be determined what charges were and were not to be considered fair burdens on local taxation? Let him suppose, too, that next Session the House should decide that a certain amount of assistance was to be given from the Imperial Exchequer to relieve local taxation, would not a proposal such as that he was now making be met at once by the argument that it was unfair to re-open a question which had only just been determined? That being so, he thought the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) and those who supported him, ought to be glad to take into account, not only the existing charges on local taxation, but those charges which were likely to be imposed on it in the future, before the whole question was settled. It was, he might add, constantly said that the throwing of a new burden on the rates would be unpopular, and he, for one, was extremely jealous of any such imposition, and would not wantonly be a party to it. But the charge which the Bill would impose was insignificant in the extreme. It had been computed that it would not be on the average more than 1½d. in every three years on an elector occupying a £10 house; and when that small amount was compared with the great principle involved in the Bill, he thought it could hardly be held to afford a valid argument against its passing. As to the Bill being unpopular, he should like to know what evidence there was in support of the assertion. Few measures had been more discussed during the last six or seven years, yet, so far as he knew, not a single Petition had been presented against it, while scarcely a large meeting of workmen demanding reforms in our representative system had been held at which resolutions in its favour had not been passed. It had also received the unanimous support of all sections of the Press. The third argument against the Bill was that it would increase the number of vexatious candidatures, and that many constituencies which would not now be contested would be exposed to a contest under the new system. He believed the directly opposite. In his opinion the Bill would operate by giving the constituencies an interest adverse to that of the printers, bill-posters, advertisers, solicitors, and others of the electioneering crew, who get up election contests under the present system, even when they knew it to be hopeless, and who benefited by the costly paraphernalia of an election, which they regarded as being "good for trade." Under the present system there was no check upon the machinations of these persons; but if this Bill were passed, the whole body of the ratepayers would be opposed to the schemes of people of this kind, and would be interested in keeping down election expenses. He asked the House whether any candid man could view without alarm the increasing tendency to make elections more and more expensive? Unless some change were made it would soon come to pass that no man who had not thousands to squander in election expenses would be able to aspire to a seat in Parliament, consequently that House would cease to be a Representative Assembly, and a severe blow would be struck not only at the efficiency, but at the permanence of representative government in this country. At no time in our political history had it been so important that persons who were not rich should be able to obtain seats in that House, and in view of the social questions likely to be discussed during the next few years, it was necessary that labour as well as capital should be represented in Parliament. It had been urged that it was the object of this measure to facilitate the entrance of working men into that House; but although he was anxious that labour should be fairly represented in the Legislature, he thought that the probable effect of the Bill in that direction had been greatly exaggerated; and however desirous he might be to see some working men in that House, he did not believe there would ever be many. Were the Bill to be rejected, and were no working man to be returned at the next General Election, very bitter feelings would be engendered, and the decisions of that House would be regarded as expressing the views of capitalists alone, and not of the nation at large; were, however, the Bill to become law, if no working man were returned, the fault would lie with the working men themselves, and not with that House. It was of great importance at the present time that election expenses should be diminished as much as possible, because there was a powerful combination of circumstances acting in an opposite direction, which rendered it year by year more difficult to those who had not enormous wealth to enter Parliament. In the first place, the small boroughs had been abolished; secondly, the suffrage had been extended; and thirdly, there was a tendency to concentrate political power more and more upon large constituencies. He did not wish to be misunderstood on this point. He by no means objected to these changes, which he believed were inevitable, but it was for the House and the Government to consider whether steps should not be taken to guard against the evils that might indirectly result from them. Another powerful influence, which also tended to increase the cost of elections, but which the House was powerless to deal with, was the growing prosperity of the country, which enabled men to make enormous fortunes in a short time. Owing to the increase in the number of our moneyed men, the competition for seats in Parliament had become keener of late years, for one of the first things that a man thought of when he became rich, was to enter that House, and he was willing to pay an extravagant price for the honour. If only rich men were to enter that House, our statesmen would not receive a political training in their youth; and we should be governed by men who had first turned their attention to politics when they had realized fortunes and had arrived at 45 or 50 years of age. He had been told that he was ill advised to bring forward this measure in the face of certain defeat; but had he been deterred by a fear of defeat he should never have introduced any measure at all into that House. The chief use of an independent Member was not to register the decrees of the majority but to bring into notice the views of the minority and to mould questions into such a form that the Government were obliged at length to take them up. The history of this measure was somewhat peculiar. He had endeavoured six years ago to introduce a clause to effect the object of this Bill into the Corrupt Practices Bill of the then Conservative

Government, and his proposal had been carried by a majority of 8 on one occasion, and of 9 on another. On the Report of the Bill, the Leader of the Conservative party, taking the House by surprise, had succeeded in throwing out the clause by a majority of 12, and on the third reading of the Bill, when the question was again raised, the clause was rejected by a majority of 3 only. Then commenced a new state of things. In a confiding moment he had placed this Bill in the hands of the Government. Whether the atmosphere which surrounded the Treasury-bench was too enervating for the constitution of the measure he could not say, but the result had been that since the Bill had been in the hands of the Government it had been defeated by majorities of 90 and 92. He was aware, that when a question was entrusted to the Government it had no chance, unless certain Members of the Government were zealous in its favour; and he was afraid that the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn), upon whom had devolved the duty of acting as the foster-parent to the measure, instead of doing his best to carry it, had imitated the example of the wicked uncle in the Children of the Wood, and the Bill had consequently been thrown out. Under those circumstances, he trusted that the House would not think him rash in having taken back his Bill, in the hope that it would revive and regain health and strength in the more bracing atmosphere of independence. If the majority against it should be as large as it had been under the care of the Government, he should think that its constitution was still weak; but if it were reduced to 50, 40, or 30, he should feel that it was regaining strength, and should continue to bring it under the notice of the House from time to time until it was passed. It had been said the Ballot Act had rendered this Bill unnecessary; but in his opinion that Act had increased the necessity for it. He trusted that the fond hopes of those who believed that the Ballot Act would prove the death-blow to political corruption would be fulfilled; but in his view, nothing but such a change of opinion in the constituencies with regard to political responsibilities as that measure would effect would ever put an end to electoral corruption. It would not be until men were brought to believe that seats in Parliament involved important political duties, and were not mere privileges to be purchased by the highest bidder, that we should be able to attain electoral purity. Holding those opinions, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. W. N. HODGSON, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he could not congratulate the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) upon the perseverance he had shown in bringing forward the Bill after the House had so decisively rejected it. No large constituency had expressed itself in favour of the measure, while the great body of the ratepayers were strongly opposed to it. Looking at the vast increase that had been made in late years in the local burdens, the House should be very careful not to add to the local rates. The hon. Member had said that the addition that would be made to the local rates by this measure would be very trifling; but he found from a Return that the expenses at the last election at Liverpool, which would be thrown upon the local rates by this Bill, amounted to £900 for each candidate. It might also be said that the borough rates and the county rates were only trifling in amount when compared with the taxation of the country. That might be the case, but it should not be forgotten that these rates had been increased by degrees. First, bridges were added to the county rates; next, gaols; then lunatic asylums; and, lastly, the police. These expenses, added together, had increased the local charges from £1,720,000 in 1796, to £15,000,000, the present amount, and it would be most unwise to add to the burden at a time when the question what relief should be afforded to the ratepayer out of the Imperial Revenue was about to be brought forward. There was no wish on the part of that House to exclude working men from seats in it; indeed, he should be very glad to see them there, but the Bill would rather hinder than facilitate their being returned as Members of Parliament. He did not think that Her Majesty's Government, in the face of the declaration made by the Prime Minister the other night, that he would not consent that any addition should be made to the local burdens, would give their support to this Bill. The provisions of the measure, too, were most defective; for instance, no provision had been made for taxing the statement of the expenses to be made by the Returning Officer, and it was very imperfect in its details. Believing that even if the Bill were to be read a second time, there would be no chance of its receiving the sanction of Parliament during the present Session, he begged to move that it be read a second time that day six months.

MR. FLOYER, in seconding the Amendment, said, his great objection to the Bill was, that it would add considerably to the burdens of the ratepayers. The addition to the rates would be immediate, but the relief that the country was now expecting to the rates from the Government measures might be a long way off. The present local burdens were quite heavy enough, and there ought to be no addition to them. That was a Bill to relieve rich men from their necessary election expenses and to throw them upon the local rates, and that he altogether objected to. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) deplored the circumstances that recent legislation had thrown obstacles in the way of men of moderate means finding seats in that House; but if that was a fact, what a commentary it was upon the proceedings of the great Liberal party, for all the measures now complained of had been passed during the period in which that party had been in office. After having had the control of political affairs with few intervals for nearly the last 30 years, one of their most prominent Members was obliged to confess that the result of their reforms had been to throw the whole of the seats in that House into the hands of the rich. With regard to the hon. Member's wish to see members of the working classes sitting in that House, if they remembered what large sums had been raised during the last few years by working men to carry out objects which they thought promoted their interests, he (Mr. Floyer) thought they would be of opinion that, if working men thought it worth their while, they could also collect sufficient subscriptions to enable some of their own class to obtain seats in that House. It was, however, a mere delusion to suppose that this Bill would have any effect, except in respect of a very small portion of the expenses in the case of a contested election. The speech of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) indicated that he was the advocate of a failing cause. The Bill was very superficially and carelessly drawn. One of its clauses threw upon counties the expenses of a county election. The Bill did not show whether or not those expenses were to be defrayed out of what was called County Stock, to which a large number of boroughs contributed, or by a special county rate. If those expenses were to be defrayed out of County Stock, then the boroughs which contributed to the county rate in addition to paying the expenses of their respective elections of Members of Parliament, would have to contribute to the payment of the expenses of the county election. He quite agreed with the observation of his hon. Friend the Member for East Cumberland (Mr. W. N. Hodgson) that the Bill did not provide any check with reference to the payment by the county treasurer of bills presented to him. They might be by carpenters and masons, and any persons for materials supplied and work done in connection with a Parliamentary election. The Bill did not appoint any person to examine these accounts, and if he sanctioned them, to give a certificate in favour of their payment. At present the treasurer paid only such bills as were certified by the Justices of the Quarter or Petty Sessions. In these days there was too much legislation of the careless character that belonged to this Bill. The hon. Member for Brighton talked about the excellence of large principles; but when he proposed that other people's money should be spent, he ought, at any rate, to have laid down clearly in his Bill a plan on which that money should be spent. The local burdens throughout the country had been recently increased very much, and he (Mr. Floyer) had no desire to add to those burdens—to put on the last feather that would break the horse's back. No case had been made out for the Bill; the country at large had not demanded that it should be passed, and, under existing circumstances, he held that it was the duty of hon. Members of that House to their constituents to oppose it.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." — (Mr. Nicholson Hodgson.)

Mr. MELLY said, he was glad to see that important question once more in the hands of his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett). In the bracing atmosphere of what his hon. Friend so very complacently called "below the gangway," it would no doubt, if not in this or the next Session, then in a new Parliament, be carried to a successful solution. His hon. Friend had bantered the Government with much good humour on their failure to carry his measure; but they must not forget that, though at the close of a wearied Parliament in 1867 a majority of 8 or 9 declared for the Bill in a House of 150, yet that in very full Houses during the Ballot discussions last year, the same clauses were rejected by enormous majorities. They had therefore their work before them in persuading the House to adopt that just measure. He would first observe that with reference to the payment of election expenses, the present state of affairs was most anomalous. If an election of members of the municipal council or of the local board was held in a borough, the expenses of the election had to be defrayed by the ratepayers, whereas in the case of an election of Members of Parliament, the expenses of the election had to be defrayed by the candidates. Thus, in so far as legislative sanction could be given to so dangerous an impression, a line was to be drawn between those who served their country in its local government and those who took part in national affairs. The ratepayers invited and elected whom they would to their town council, but the Parliamentary candidate paid for himself, and they could only invite or elect a man willing and rich enough to pay his own expenses. From that anomalous legislation sprang in too many cases a most erroneous doctrine—that the representative and not the electors had the greatest interest in the election. It was of the first importance that such a delusion should be dispelled, and if the payment of that charge made the electors more careful whom they dismissed or whom they selected, it would have a most beneficial effect. But there was another great anomaly. The Parliamentary candidates, with reference to expenses, were subject entirely to the control of the Returning Officer, and in that respect their position had no parallel. A perfectly irresponsible person employed whom he would, spent what he liked, and the candidate was compelled to pay a heavy bill over the details of which he had no supervision, but the total of which, however much he might dispute it, he was bound to pay. It had been shown how lightly the charge would fall on the great mass of the ratepayers, though in many places the weight when falling upon the candidate acted as a bar to the candidature of all but very rich men. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hodgson) quoted the case of the late Liverpool election, where each candidate had been charged £900 or £1,000, a monstrous sum; but there were 53,000 electors, so the cost would be only 9d. per head every five years if it fell upon them; but as it would really fall upon the 80,000 householders, it would not exceed a rate of 1½d. per household per annum. They were told that the total expenses of Returning Officers were £90,000, which sum amounted to about 1½d. in the pound every five years over the rateable value of the three Kingdoms; he (Mr. Melly) wondered it had not been twice as much, considering that there was no check whatever upon any charge those officers might make. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) said that there was no guarantee in the Bill that the expenses would be reduced, but there was the same guarantee and check there always was in all other matters where those who paid the bill appointed the officers who spent the money. The ratepayers would see that no undue expenditure took place, and, as the machinery would be used for all local elections, the cost would be very greatly reduced. The position of the Returning Officer was felt by him under the present system to be most unsatisfactory. One of those gentlemen wrote to him to ask how he was to get the money he had spent if one of the candidates were unable to pay it. The law in that respect wanted revision, and when the Bill got into Committee, the responsibility of the Returning Officer could be more fairly defined. It had been suggested that the way to pay these charges was by combination among the working men. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Floyer) had, he thought, spoken very unadvisedly with reference to trades unions. He said working men had collected large subscriptions for their own objects, let them subscribe and elect Members. The hon. Gentleman had thus suggested that those unions should mix themselves up in politics. He (Mr. Melly) fervently deprecated the transfer of the conduct of Parliamentary elections for counties or boroughs from the ratepayers to outside organizations. A suggestion more unconstitutional and dangerous he had not often heard. Those who sat on that side of the House greatly approved of trades unions—combinations of men of all shades of politics for the discussion and arrangement of all questions between labour and capital, the employer and the employed; their position and their own common sense equally precluded them from taking part as trade organizations in local contests, but they were now advised to collect large sums of money, and pay the legal and necessary expenses of Parliamentary contests. A perilous suggestion, coming from the quarter whence it came. But why should a poor man be compelled to solicit assistance from his friends or fellow-workmen to pay the legal costs incurred by the electors in the discharge of a solemn constitutional privilege and duty? How many men in that House had been returned at the cost of their friends? He thought that every candidate should stand in the same position as far as the mechanical portion of the election was concerned. Legislation had much altered the position of the question. The Ballot would put an end to much unnecessary and voluntary expense, but would largely increase, in many ways, the legal and compulsory charges. The ballot-boxes, polling-booths, and all the Returning Officers' expenses, would be, in many places, doubled. A man determined to leave the election to the electors would have little but the cost of public meetings to pay, if, by passing this Bill, they threw the compulsory costs upon the rates. It was equally unjust to the electors to limit their choice, and to the candidate to exclude him from nomination, unless he were able or willing to pay. As to working-men candidates, he had shown that the Bill would put an end to special injustice. He himself was, he understood, to be opposed by a working man's candidate, who held pretty much the same opinions as he did. Lawyer. Hon. Members might laugh; it was by such divisions among the Liberal party that the Conservatives won seats. He hoped to beat his opponents on the merits, but he was most anxious that he should not be handicapped by a forced payment of £300 or £500 to the Returning Officer. Hon. Members opposite well knew that whether it were the true reason or not, if the advocates of the direct representation of labour in Parliament were disappointed by the result of the next election, they would attribute their want of success to the power of wealth, and complain bitterly of the forced contribution to the uncontrolled expenditure of the Returning Officer. He would remove that just cause of complaint, and place the expenses of Parliamentary contests on the same footing as those of municipal and local board elections, with the fair guarantees offered by the Bill against spurious candidates. Lastly, the hon. Member for Dorsetshire found fault with his hon. Friend for pointing out that year by year, by the natural law of supply and demand, richer men were prepared to pay more and more for seats in that House, and poorer men had less and less chance of being returned, and he attributed that to "the policy of the Liberal party which had been in power," he said, "for 30 years." He (Mr. Melly) would reply that perhaps it was owing to the policy of the Liberal party that there was such universal prosperity, so many rich men who, in becoming rich, had added to the comfort and wealth of hundreds of thousands of others; that perhaps it was owing to the policy of the Liberal party, pursued for more than 40 years, that that House had at last become a really Representative Assembly, to which honest men might laudably desire to be returned by free and unbought electors. This, at least, was certain, that for 30 years it had been the policy of the Liberal party to exclude no man from that Assembly by reason of his creed, or his social position, or his purse. For many Sessions he (Mr. Melly), his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, and almost every hon. Member upon that side of the House, had laboured to abolish paid canvassers, salaried agents, the conveyance of voters to the poll, employment of public-houses at elections, and every description of bribery and corruption. Every impediment, however, had been thrown in their way by hon. Members opposite, who did not seem to believe that while the constituents should be free to choose any man or men should, by any compulsory expenditure, be excluded from the honour of a seat in that House.

Mr. YORKE opposed the Bill. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), that the prospects of his measure, however good they might have been in the good old times when he first had charge of it, were not very favourable at the present moment, and certainly some of the arguments used by the hon. Gentleman did not appear to him to be at all calculated to forward its prospects. In the first place, it was a very remarkable way of recommending a measure to the favourable consideration of local taxpayers to say that if we added another burden to the already intolerable charges which rested upon them their case for relief would next Session be rendered additionally strong. He believed the case of the local taxpayers for relief was sufficiently strong, without being added to by a measure of this kind. The hon. Gentleman had also said that the cost which would be thrown upon the ratepayers would be insignificant; that it would be 1d. or 1½d. per head, and therefore was a very small matter. If the charge were so insignificant he could not think the hon. Gentleman was just in imagining that it would have an important effect in preventing contests. There was no doubt that printers, solicitors, and publicans contributed considerably by their charges to increase the expenses of elections at the present time. He (Mr. Yorke) contended that those charges would not be touched at all by the provisions of the Bill, and therefore he thought it was evident that this was only a step to further measures in the same direction. The hon. Member had further said that the exclusion of the working men was owing to the expense of a contest; but he believed that that had nothing to do with the question. He understood that the trades unions had funds at their command amply sufficient to meet the expenses of elections in many places, if the working men were really popular with the constituencies and commanded the same numerical support which was now enjoyed by others. But he believed the real obstacle to the admission of the working man arose from the good sense of the electors. The constituents were of opinion that a candidate required early study and education, and that a man without those advantages would not be able to take the same intelligent care of their interests which men highly educated would be prepared to take. The constituents believed that the British Constitution was a vast and complicated machine which ought not to be handed over to incompetent hands to deal with. He could not, moreover, agree to the infliction of any additional burden upon the ratepayers while the question of local taxation was under the consideration of the Government, and he believed the effect of the two measures on that subject brought before the House by the Government would be to leave them in a much worse position than they were in before. They had been recently engaged in rating woods, mines, fishing, and shooting, and when they came to the Valuation Bill they would find that its machinery would raise assessments all over the country. It was plain to everyone that it was the object of the Government to get the greatest amount out of the existing area, and then to come down to the House and say there was a little more required; and then, perhaps, they would throw in a dog tax or something of that kind. Therefore, independently of the merits of the question, he held it to be the duty of all those who had the future of local taxation at heart to refuse their assent to such a Bill as that. At the same time he was ready to make the hon. Member for Brighton an offer. If the hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Bill and reconsider it, and place the expenses of elections on personal property, he (Mr. Yorke) should be ready to support that proposal. If his hon. Friend could devise a method by which to charge these expenses on personal property he would do something towards placing his name on honourable record in connection with the subject of local taxation.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the principal argument used against the Bill seemed to be, that if it were carried it would increase the county rates; and the last Speaker had concluded his observations by an appeal to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) to undertake to withdraw the Bill and to shift a portion of the county rates upon personal property. He (Mr. Trevelyan) was entirely opposed to the proposition of charging personal property with the expense of elections, but the Bill did not provide for any such thing. It proposed that the expenses of hustings, and the charges made by and paid to the Sheriffs or Returning Officers, should be charged on the borough or county rates, as the case might be. He also denied that the Bill was calculated to promote bribery, or that it was bound to charge ratepayers with the expenses incurred by those who wished to go into Parliament. Anyone who had listened to the previous debate on the subject would be inclined to augur success to the Bill, from the extreme venality of the arguments against it, because it appeared to him that those who opposed it, simply rang the changes to the tune that it proposed to transfer a tax from the shoulders of the wealthy classes to those of the community generally. But the Rating Bill of the Government, by its removal of existing exemptions upon mansions and sporting, certainly took from the pockets of the wealthy classes more than that Bill would put into them. The speech of the hon. Gentleman the Seconder of the Amendment was more fit for a Committee of the House; but the whole of their arguments dwindled down to nothing, when they were told that the increased expenditure caused by the Bill would not amount to half-a-farthing in the pound on the rates once in three years, and the rate was so small that no other machinery than that of the county rate would be available for levying it. He would point out, as a justification for the mode of rating, the inequality of the expenses incurred in various localities for Parliamentary election expenses. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had to pay £900 for his expenses, while the hon. Member opposite paid only £45 4s.; in other words, one hon. Member paid £20 for every pound another paid. At present the expenses of elections were paid by Gentlemen who were afraid to question their accuracy, but that would not be the case after the passing of the Bill. Moreover, such an argument came with very ill grace from hon. Gentlemen who held that the magistrates of England and the Commissioners of Supply in Scotland were as careful of the ratepayers' money as the ratepayers were themselves; and he had that confidence in the magistrates of the country, that he believed they would carefully scrutinize all the items of the bills of the Returning Officer. And the House must not think that there was no margin for economy in these bills. He could not at present see why it was that the election expenses at Dover, with a population of 3,000 electors, should be £160, and at Derby, where there were 9,000 electors, the expenses of the hustings and booths should be only £70. In the Ayr and Dumfries Burghs the cost of the hustings, &c., were respectively £34 and £42, while in other towns of the same size they came to £116, and there was a similar difference between the other election expenses. It was monstrous that where one Member of Parliament did not have to pay £50 for the expenses of his seat another should have to pay £150. Then it was said the Bill would encourage the nomination of men of straw, who wanted to purchase a cheap notoriety at the expense of the ratepayers. That theory, however, was not borne out by facts. In Scotch burghs in particular, party feeling on social questions ran very high, and of all places there were none where Members were elected to represent what might be called a special idea, yet in the burgh he represented (Hawick district) the election expenses known under that legal name only amounted £3 5s. 3d., and taking every conceivable charge into the account, when he had taken his seat and paid all the expenses, he had change out of a £20 note. He believed if he or his hon. Friends the Members for Elgin and St. Andrews were unseated at the next General Election, it would be entirely from their demerits, and in no respect from any reckless expenditure on the part of their opponents. He entirely denied that to pass the Bill would be to multiply candidates on the ground of their being relieved from contributing to the expenses, and considered that the restrictive provision on that point would be quite sufficient. Even, however, if the cost were great, hon. Gentlemen should not seek to shelter themselves behind a big Bill, instead of relying on their own merits. It was a monstrous thing, in his opinion, that a gentleman could not present himself to a constituency for the purpose of serving his country without being called upon to pay enormous sums in the shape of fees. He thought the arguments against the measure were all very far fetched, whilst those in favour of it were quite simple, and at the same time quite unanswerable. The object of its supporters was to sanction the principle, that the choice of a Representative was a most responsible and important matter, and that the duties of a Representative were those of an honoured minister, who gave instead of receiving service. It had been said that a candidate who had gone round cap in hand to the voters, and asked them to do him the favour of supporting him, could not consistently afterwards ask the ratepayers to pay for his election. Now, the supporters of the Bill repudiated the notion that a vote was a favour. Surely, it was not to be supposed that an elector cared so little about his privileges that he would not pay the value of a pinch of snuff for the opportunity of exercising them. Such a measure as that would do something to prevent political apathy and to show the country that this House wished to place no obstacle in the way of working men who sought to be returned to Parliament. To refuse to pass the Bill, indeed, was to maintain to that extent a money qualification. If it were desirable that labour should be represented in Parliament in 1867, it was doubly desirable in 1873, when so many new labour questions had arisen. For example, it was not only discreditable but positively dangerous that the recent agitation in the rural districts should be ignored and unknown in this House, so far as resolutions on the subject were concerned. Sometimes, we heard the argument that the working classes were represented in Parliament by men who had risen from that class; but had a single Member in this House ever dug drains or trimmed hedges? He hoped the House would deny a statement that had been recently made at a meeting in Hyde Park—that there was not a single hon. Member of that House who sympathized with the working classes, and justify the confidence of the general body of those classes, by passing an enactment which would show their willingness to welcome Representatives of the working classes in Parliament.

Mr. CORRANCE opposed the Bill. He thought the reason in favour of the measure did not rest upon popular, but upon philosophical considerations. At the same time he regretted the disappearance from that House of the philosophers who formerly sat there. In the last Parliament there were several philosophers, including Mr. John Stuart Mill, but circumstances had made nearly a clean sweep of them. ["No, no!" and laughter.] From various causes, the supporters of the hon. Gentleman had dwindled away. The constituencies had considered the question, and had arrived at the conclusion that it would not be for their interest that the Bill should pass. However small the amount, they saw that they would have to pay something, and they had not been accustomed to do so—quite the reverse. They could not be convinced that it was necessary or that it would be beneficial for them to pay a tax for the privilege of recording their votes at elections. That Parliament had been elected by the ratepayers, but nothing had yet been done for the relief of the rates, though an abstract Resolution had been passed in favour of doing so.

Mr. MORRISON considered that the Bill involved a great many important questions besides the expenditure of money. He thought the passing of the Ballot had materially strengthened the argument for the Bill, as the legal expenses of candidates must be greater now than they used to be; and though they generally amounted to a very small proportion of the expenses of a contested election, still experience showed that it was possible for a Member, whose presence in the House was thought of importance to the public interest, to be returned at a moderate outlay upon other heads of expenditure. He regretted to say that there had been no proportionate reduction in the cost of elections, and that the old estimate of a pound for every voter polled in a county election still held pretty nearly true. At present there was a direct incentive towards wasteful expenditure by local authorities, and no candidate could dispute the account presented to him any more than a man could dispute the Bill of an undertaker. He could point to boroughs in which it was the custom of Returning Officers to put up polling-booths instead of availing themselves of such public buildings as were available for the purpose. The theory of the Constitution was that the electors selected the candidates, but the practice was rather the reverse. There was frequently a great difficulty in obtaining candidates, and some constituencies were willing to accept anybody who would consent to pay the costs connected with an election. It was clear, however, that few but the wealthy could entertain a nomination; and although that was an advantage to the extent that it produced a House of Commons superior to pecuniary bribes, it was unwise to keep up an artificial barrier to prevent poorer men from coming in. The presence of representative workmen in the House of Commons would be desirable; they would then be required to reduce their theories to Bills, and perhaps they would discover that their political regeneration was not to be worked out by Acts of Parliament so much as by self-control and industry. He regretted, in conclusion, that the Opposition had not met the Bill by the Previous Question rather than by a Motion to read it six months hence; for if the Bill were to be rejected because of the action of the House on the subject of rates generally, the Previous Question was the true issue raised.

Mr. NEVILLE - GRENVILLE thought the House had heard as much stilted talk on this question as on many great subjects. Now, he considered the question a very small one indeed. Whether the expenses of the Returning Officer were to be paid by the candidate or the ratepayers did not matter a straw, as far as money was concerned. If the object of the Bill had been to introduce into the House young men, well educated, industrious, and talented, instead of well-to-do old gentlemen, of whom it was said the present House of Commons consisted, he should have been able to support it. On principle he objected to any unnecessary addition being made to the local rates. He did not believe the Bill would have the effect of introducing working men into the House, but if it did, the moment a working man was elected he would cease to be a working man. He wished to remind those who talked of the exorbitant charges of some of the Returning Officers that they could be cut down without saddling the counties with the expense, whether this measure was carried or not.

Mr. JAMES said, he should not have taken any part in the discussion but for the recurrence to the old arguments which had been formerly used on the subject. One of these was an argument respecting local taxation, and he was sure that every hon. Member would be glad if there was no such thing. The question now before the House, however, was a much broader one than a question of local taxation. With every respect for the argument of his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), he must say that it was entirely fallacious from the want of connection between his premises and his deductions. His hon. Friend had said it was very desirable the expenses of elections should be reduced, and, without showing that his Bill would reduce them, he had said, therefore, the Bill was a good one. He had next urged that it was desirable working men should be in the House, and, without showing this Bill would introduce them, had said, therefore, the Bill should become law. The expenses of the last General Election had been returned at £1,500,000, but only £90,000, or less than one-fifteenth of that total would be thrown upon the rates to the relief of the candidate by this Bill. His hon. Friend had put the matter as if the expenses of the election meant the official expenses alone; but on looking at the question practically, it would be found that the cost to each Member was some £2,000. The official expenses were a very small proportion of that sum, and if the carrying of the Bill should have the effect of increasing the number of contests and greater excitement, the expenses which his hon. Friend was desirous of diminishing would be considerably increased. He declined to discuss the measure on mere theoretical grounds. Accepting all that his hon. Friend had said about the desirability of securing the admission of working men to the House of Commons, he denied it was desirable the House should be changed entirely. The experience of hon. Members who had sat in many Parliaments was very valuable. Was it right they should be punished by a contest? They might think their position secure, and under the present system it was; but with that Bill in force, they would not be safe against the ambitious, uneasy, or intemperate opponent. Such a contest might exceed in cost the whole of the Member's previous expenditure, and similar influences would tend to increase the expenses of all other candidates. Would that be compensated by the benefits of the measure? It was also questionable whether working men themselves desired this change. Only two or three working men made an attempt to get elected at the last General Election, of whom the personal expenses of the workman who contested Aylesbury were £354, and the official £62. Which item was of most importance, and what would be the effect, if the Bill were passed, upon the conduct of working men in respect of the nomination of one of their own class? Instead of subscribing to pay the expenses for some representative man, every workman would be coming forward who held the opinion that he was as fit as his neighbour for the position. At present there was a barrier to the gratification of vanity in this respect, and it should be maintained. He admitted he was speaking in behalf of men of moderate means. He declined to imperil his estate by engaging in ruinous election contests, and some consideration should be had for others besides working men. The measure was also inconsistent in itself. It would be unfair to throw these expenses on the ratepayers generally, many of whom were not electors, but women and minors; they should be borne by the electors only, and if the precedent of the Revising Barristers were followed they should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, it would be very curious if the House of Commons, after resolving to relieve local taxpayers of some of their burdens, were to commence the operation by saddling them with a charge hitherto borne by hon. Members themselves. Ratepayers would not be all agreed upon the justice of the charge. Some might like the candidate elected, others might prefer someone else, and a third class would perhaps think it preferable if there were no Parliament at all for some three years, that the Government might be left to the permanent officials while Ministers were allowed to travel on the Continent for the benefit of their health and the improvement of their understandings. Certainly two sections of the ratepayers would in that case be paying for what they did not want. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that at least the working men were all united, and loved one another as brothers. Hazlitt, however, once said that all country gentlemen hated one another, and it was fair to presume that jealousies existed among members of all classes. John might think himself as good as Tom at election time, and the result would be a host of candidates and contests. To be consistent, hon. Members should be paid for their services, and perhaps local subscriptions should be added to make the candidates acceptable to the constituency. It had often been said unpaid services were bad, but it did not follow from this that paid services were good; so he trusted the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) would not be consistent and propose payment of Members as well as payment of expenses.

MR. M'LAREN said, the expense of the election for the school board of Edinburgh was £2,200. There were 15 candidates, and he would like to ask why, considering the arrangement that existed in regard to Parliamentary elections, these 15 candidates should not have to pay £150 each, which was their share of the expenses. Parliament said it would be unjust that they should pay the expenses, because the members of school boards were elected for the benefit of the whole community, and it was therefore held to be right that the community should bear the expense. There were necessarily some preliminary expenses which required to be paid by candidates, but why should they be called on to pay for the election itself—more especially if the constituency were willing to pay a small rate? It was the same in regard to Parliamentary, as to school board elections. Hon. Members had referred to the rates that would be required in their particular districts. He might mention that in Edinburgh, the rate which would be required to raise £1,500 would be a third of a penny, so that a man rated at £12 would have to contribute 4d. Large constituencies in Scotland, he believed, would be delighted to pay the expense. There was one other fallacy he wished to point out. It had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James), that the expenses of the Returning Officer were a mere trifle compared to the great expenses of election. There was the difference, however, that those expenses were fixed, and could not be altered. The general expenses might be much or little as candidates chose, and as showing the difference that sometimes existed, he might mention that in a northern borough at the last Election, the expenses of one candidate were £410, while those of the other were £4,600—both, it was to be observed, being candidates in the same borough and under the same circumstances, and both being returned. He thought there was no good reason why the expenses of Returning Officers should not be paid by the communities, leaving the candidates to bear the extras.

MR. BRUCE said, that the Government having stated that it was not their intention as long as the question of local taxation was in its present unsettled condition, except in cases of necessity, to bring forward any measure which would tend to increase local burdens, it was impossible for them as a Government to give the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) that support which they gave him on former occasions. His hon. Friend had said that as long as the question remained in his own hands, he had a majority, and that it was only when the Government took it up, that there was a majority against it. But his hon. Friend forgot to state that when he had a majority, it was only in a House of 147 Members, the numbers being 78 to 69; whereas, in the two divisions on the subject which occurred when the Government brought the question forward, there was on one occasion a House of 416, and on another a House of 430 Members. His hon. Friend seemed also to have forgotten the words of one of our poets—"The best is but in season best," and that there was at present the deepest disinclination on the part of the House to assent to any measure which had a tendency to add to local burdens. In spite, however, of the able speech of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James), he still adhered to the opinion that the measure of the hon. Member for Brighton was founded in justice and expediency. He agreed with his hon. Friend, that the effect of the Bill would not be to introduce many working-men into Parliament, and he held that the great object of lowering the expenses should be to bring into the House young men of education who might be able to devote their talents to the service of the public. He had a general objection to ignorance whether in working-men, in capitalists, or in country squires, and the great aim which they ought to have in view was to get young men into the House, who might be made capable of dealing with the great subjects which were constantly coming before them. He also admitted that it would be a great advantage to discuss in the presence of working-men all those theories which were now so widely, and, as many thought, so dangerously propagated throughout the country. For these reasons he should be glad to give his assent to any measure for the reduction of expenses which would throw open the doors of Parliament to working-men and young men of promise and ability. They had already representatives of the tenant-farmers, and the manner in which they deputed themselves was a great encouragement to working-men being introduced into that House. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) was understood to say that as trades unions had shown their power in many other ways, they might also show their power in returning working-men to Parliament. [Mr. FLOYER: I did not say so.] If the hon. Member did not say so, the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. Yorke) said so very explicitly. He had no reason to think that working-men were exclusively on one side of politics. He knew that the votes of working-men in many constituencies had turned the scale in favour of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But that being so, why should they urge trades unions to combine to return working-men to that House? The doctrine was a dangerous one. It was because he wanted to smooth the way as much as possible to working-men and others of small means that he should have given his vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton, if the occasion when the Bill was brought forward was a proper one. But the hon. Gentleman, acting on his own responsibility, and in opposition to the judgment of his friends, had by his obstinacy placed the measure in a wrong position. It was not true that Government had allowed itself to be defeated by a small majority on the question; they were defeated by a majority of nearly 100, which showed decisively the opinion of the House. But after the Government had made the declaration on the subject of local taxation to which he had referred, it was not fair to bring forward this measure, and then to make a charge against the Government for not supporting it. Under the circumstances, he hoped the second reading would not be pressed to a division, for if it were he felt convinced that it would be defeated by an overwhelming majority.

MR. FLOYER said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had attributed to him a meaning which the words he used did not bear. What he said was, that the working-men had combined to raise large sums for certain purposes, and he did not see why they should not combine to raise money to return some of their number to the House. That was a simple statement, and had nothing to do with trades unions.

MR. BRUCE: I entirely accept the explanation of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, observed that a greater compliment could not be paid to an independent Member by the Treasury bench than to have it said of him, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that he was "obstinate." He was much mistaken if the speech of the right hon. Gentleman would not before the Session was over get the Government into trouble. The right hon. Gentleman had laid down the doctrine, that he could not vote for a Bill the principle of which he endorsed, because it was brought forward at an inopportune time, and he could not vote for this Bill because the question of local taxation was not settled. Well, in three weeks' time the House would be discussing the Elementary Education Amendment Bill, and would it then be said that they must vote against the Bill because it would impose an additional charge upon local taxation? He did not advocate the measure now before the House mainly because it would reduce election expenses, but because it was founded on a right principle—namely, that a man in becoming the representative of a constituency was discharging an important duty, for which he should not be called upon to pay. We were now the only English-speaking people on the earth who made their Representatives pay the necessary expenses. His great argument in favour of the Bill as a practical measure was, that under the present system, constituencies were interested in extravagance at elections, whereas if they passed this Bill they would do all in their power to interest the great mass of the constituencies in economy.

The House divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 205; Majority 114.

Words added.

* Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

ARRIVAL OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

MR. COLLINS said, that as an important event was about to occur, it would be for the convenience of hon. Members that the House should adjourn. He therefore begged to move the Adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Collins.)

MR. BRUCE opposed the Motion, on the ground that it would be unfair to hon. Gentlemen who had Business on the Paper, to deprive them of the opportunity of having it discussed.

Question put, and negatived.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES (SCOTLAND)

BILL. [Bill 83.]

(Mr. Fordyce, Mr. McCombie, Mr. Barclay, Sir George Balfour, Mr. Parker.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FORDYCE in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he would endeavour as briefly as possible to explain its chief provisions, and to state some facts which proved beyond doubt that the whole subject to which it referred was not unworthy the attention of the Legislature. This Bill was a humble attempt to remedy one of the chief blots in the Scotch social system, to provide adequate house accommodation for the agricultural labourers of Scotland, and to remedy the disgusting and almost incredible system of overcrowding which now prevailed in many parts of that country. It was also intended by the Bill, in a subsidiary degree, to encourage occupiers of land to invest money in the improvement of the soil, by giving them certain rights of property in respect to the buildings which they constructed. At present, by the law of Scotland, all buildings erected by a tenant, in the absence of any specific agreement to the contrary—whatever might be the length of the lease and the value of the buildings—belonged to the landlord, and the fundamental proposition of the Bill consisted in an alteration of that presumption of the law. The Bill provided that all buildings erected by agricultural tenants should belong to them in the absence of any specific agreement to the contrary in the lease or otherwise. The buildings referred to in the Bill were of two classes, the provisions in regard to each class were slightly different. In regard to all buildings other than labourers' cottages erected by the tenant, it was provided that where, by the lease the incoming tenant or the landlord refused to take them over, the tenant should be entitled to remove the materials of which they were composed, a right of pre-emption being also given to the landlord. With regard to labourers' cottages, the promoters thought that the evidence on that subject warranted them in going a step further, and the proposition contained in the Bill was, that where such cottages did not exist to the extent of at least one for every 100 arable acres of land, and where the tenant supplied the deficiency, he should be entitled at the end of his lease to compensation from the landlord to the extent of £100 for every such cottage, provided, in the first place, that arbiters appointed by the Sheriff found that the cottage was worth that amount; and provided also that it consisted of three apartments, and contained 3,000 cubic feet of measurement. These provisions had been introduced in order to provide against the possibility of the landlords being called upon to take over rickety and worthless buildings at the termination of leases. It was now generally admitted that no family could be comfortably or decently housed in a building consisting of less than three apartments, and the limitation he had stated as to the cubic contents was the same as was adopted by the Inclosure Commissioners. A suggestion had been made by one of the Agricultural Societies of Scotland which had petitioned in favour of the Bill, to the effect that power should be given to the Sheriff to settle the sites of the cottages if the site selected by the tenant was objected to by the landlord, and he had only to say that there was no objection on his part to such a provision. Such were the few and simple provisions of the Bill. They did not interfere with contract in any way, nor did they enter into the large field taken up by the Bill of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read). They did not propose to compensate the tenant for expenditure on anything except buildings. They proposed no compensation for expenditure on drainage, or on the reclamation of land or unexhausted manures. The Bill simply took up the simplest and most urgent case, where the hardship was greatest to the tenant, the labourer, and the community at large. Those were the provisions of the Bill. He would at once be asked were they equitable, and if equitable, did the circumstances of the case warrant their adoption? With regard to their equity, he submitted that it was equitable that the lawful possessor of land, when he added to the permanent value of the property, was entitled to compensation to the extent of the value added. That was a proposition which held good in many other cases. Pupils and minors, though incapable of contract, yet where lucrated by the deeds of others, were borne in recompense; life renters of properties under wills could obtain compensation for permanent improvements executed by them; persons found subsequently not to have good titles as purchasers to subjects on which they made improvements were by the law of Scotland re-imbursed for those improvements; but it was now settled law that buildings erected by agricultural tenants, independent of specific agreement with the landlord, belonged to the landlord, and not to the tenant. He asked why should that be so? The tenant was a lawful possessor, and why should the buildings erected by him at his own expense go to the person who benefited by their erection? Did any good reason exist why the buildings erected by the tenant, and which he was not bound to erect, should not belong to him in the same manner as the stock he brought on the land?

He did not intend to enter into the history of the law of fixtures as connected with agriculture, but he might say that anyone looking into this matter would find it very peculiar. The original principle that whatever was planted on or in the soil belonged to the soil or to the landlord, was very soon found inapplicable to the conditions of modern civilization, policy, and progress. The old legal fiction, Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, was now entirely superseded as regarded Ireland by the recent statute, and as regarded England and Scotland, this was so also as to trade fixtures, which had been held now to belong, not to the landlord, but to the tenant, when erected by him under no obligation to do so. The law of Scotland not only recognized that trade fixtures erected by an agricultural tenant belonged to him, but it had gone a great deal further in recognizing the principle of the Bill, for it was now settled law, that if an outgoing tenant left the land fallow or in grass-seed, he was entitled to claim from the incoming tenant, or from the landlord, the value of the land which he left fallow, and also of the grass seeds sown down in the year preceding his outgoing. Professor Bell, in laying that down as the law, expressly stated as a reason for giving compensation, that the outgoing tenant was in equity entitled to the value of the outlay of which the incoming tenant reaped the benefit. He (Mr. Fordyce) would humbly submit that if it were an equitable arrangement that the tenant should receive the value of his grass seeds, or the land he left fallow, it was equally equitable that he should receive the value of the buildings he erected, being under no obligation to erect any such building. Passing from that part of the subject, he wished to refer to two considerations which he thought strongly proved the expediency of encouraging by every means in their power, the occupiers of land to invest capital in buildings, and particularly in labourers' cottages, on their farms. In the first place, as they were all aware, the agricultural interests of Scotland had been subject to a very heavy strain during the past year. It had been calculated that the loss to the tenant-farmers during the year, from a deficiency of crops, had amounted to upwards of £8,000,000, and in the county he had the honour to represent (Aberdeenshire) the loss had been calculated at £900,000. The labour market had been agitated in an extraordinary degree, and wages had gone up 10 or 20 per cent, and although those things ultimately affected the price of land, they fell on the occupier in the meantime most heavily. Then, again, it could not be denied that the efforts which had been made by the landlords of Scotland to provide adequate house accommodation for the labourers had lamentably failed, and at this moment a frightful deficiency existed in regard to the accommodation of the labourers. The Statistical Account of Scotland, issued at the commencement of this century, first drew public attention to this point, and the revelations then made on the subject were confirmed by the Statistical Account of 1845. It was also made abundantly clear by the evidence taken before the Poor Law Commission in 1843, that this was the case, and it was proved by the testimony of Dr. Guthrie and others, that the reason why the old cottages were not rebuilt, and the reason therefore of the deficiency of cottage accommodation, was the dread which existed on the part of landlords that they would, by increasing that accommodation, also increase the poor rates. In 1854 public attention was so strongly directed to the subject by the late Rev. H. Stewart, that an association was formed among the landowners of Scotland for the purpose of improving the condition of the dwellings of the agricultural labourers. To show the influential character of that Association, he might say that it comprised among its directors the names of the late Prince Consort, four Dukes, a Marquess, and two Earls. He did not wish in any degree to refer to the labours of that Association in a disparaging sense—he believed they were attended by great good; but he referred to the fact simply for the purpose of showing that in it the landlords of Scotland had put forth their utmost strength and failed. That Association was now defunct. It did good work in its day. It built a certain number of cottages, but it failed to provide adequate accommodation for the labourers. These were strong statements to make, but they were not stronger than the facts of the case, because the Census Commissioners of 1861, in their Report, drew prominent attention to the fact that 36 per cent of the families of Scotland lived in houses of one room, either without a window or with one window only, and to the demoralizing effect of such a state of things. The Census authorities of 1871 still more emphatically drew public attention to this matter. They said that nearly one-third of the families of Scotland occupied houses of one room, either without a window or with one only. The following were the figures they gave:—Out of a total of 434,000 families in the towns, nearly 160,000 lived in houses of one room, and without a window or with one only; out of a total of 101,000 families in the villages, about 35,000 lived in similar houses; and out of a total of 202,760 families in the rural districts, nearly 43,000 lived in houses of the same kind. The Census authorities, in drawing attention to that state of things, strongly condemned it as highly injurious to the interests of the community—which could scarcely be doubted, unless they adopted the view of the noble Lord, who, when asked if he was aware of the fact that nearly one-third of the people of Scotland lived in houses of one room, replied—"Well, what of it?—they are all very healthy." It had been truly said by the Bishop of Manchester that "decency must be unknown, modesty an unimaginable virtue, where in one small room men, women, and children, grown and growing up lads and girls were herded together; where all the operations of nature, births, and deaths, &c., were performed by each in the sight and hearing of all." But the evidence did not stop here. A few years ago a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the state of the women and children employed in agriculture, and they presented their Report last year in regard to Scotland, and it was well worth perusal. The Commissioners reported that the deficiency of proper cottage accommodation for labourers was very great, and had a very demoralizing effect, and their Report was fully borne out by the Assistant Commissioners. They stated that not only was the amount of house accommodation for agricultural labourers miserably defective, but the quality of the existing accommodation was lamentably deficient all over Scotland. In Perth-shire the printed evidence of the present Secretary of the Highland Society stated that, as a rule, the cottages were a disgrace to the country. Ayrshire seemed to be the worst county in Scotland in that respect. Out of 42,500 of a population, there were 16,900 families living in single rooms. The Commissioners remarked that not only were new cottages not built, but the old ones were allowed to fall into decay and ruin, and no disposition was shown to repair them. On the Marquess of Ailsa's estate, it was mentioned that stables, byres, cart-sheds, and disused dog-kennels and out-houses were converted into dwellings for agricultural labourers. It seemed to him, without going further into statistics, he had shown there was a lamentable deficiency in cottage accommodation for agricultural labourers; that although great improvements had taken place within the last ten years, there was still much to be done; that landlords had shown themselves unequal to supply the want; and that, therefore, it was now expedient to turn to occupiers, and give them some encouragement to supply houses for themselves. The Bill was intended to do that. It did not ask for grants of public money, nor did it propose any addition to the rates, it simply gave power to occupiers to remove at the expiry of their leases these buildings and to receive a moderate compensation for the cottages built by them during their occupancy. That the occupiers thought the Bill practicable and likely to bring about good results was shown by the fact that two of the leading agricultural societies of Scotland had petitioned strongly in its favour. Its provisions were not inimical to free trade in land, and did not prevent the landlords doing with their land as they chose. This was in one sense a labourers' question, but it was also an occupiers' question and a public question, for it was equally the interest of landlords and of the public at large that the agricultural labourer, whom Adam Smith had described as the most productive of all labourers, should have decent house accommodation, and every legitimate inducement to remain at home. It was because he believed that the Bill would do much in that respect, and because he thought that its provisions were equitable and fair, and well worthy the consideration of the House, that he had much pleasure in moving its second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Fordyce.)

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE in moving, "That the Bill be read a second time that day six months," said, he did so on the ground that it would not in the least have the results which it was intended to have. He admitted to the fullest extent the want of accommodation that existed, and that it was desirable it should be supplied; but he held that the Bill, besides being mischievous in many of its provisions, would be utterly useless for the purpose for which it was brought forward. In proof of that he would instance the Report presented to the Commissioners of Supply of Aberdeen by a sub-committee, over which the convener (Mr. Irvine of Drum) presided. He felt convinced, from that Report, that in the county of Aberdeen, there would not be five cottages built by the tenants under the provisions of the Bill. He was sorry he did not see the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Mr. McCombie) in his place on that occasion, because he agreed with his opinions most entirely on this subject, and he thought the experience of the hon. Gentleman would fully bear out his views. His opinions had always been that it was a very unfortunate thing when the cottages fell into the hands of the occupiers; and that was also the opinion of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire, who, in a paper on Farm Servants said he was strongly in favour of crofts, but they ought to be let by the landlord, because he generally found the tenant-farmers more grasping than the proprietors. This was a tenant-farmer himself, who, by his energy and activity, had converted a good many of those small farms into a large and extensive burgh, which he was possessed of. The hon. Member belonged to one of those debating societies or trades unions which had sprung up, who, laying aside the practice of agriculture, devoted themselves to the abuse of the landlords of Scotland—a signal instance being found in the Chamber of Agriculture of Edinburgh. Now he (Sir James Elphinstone) held in his hand the annual Report of the Association, of which the hon. Gentleman had spoken in such contemptuous terms, and the House would see that what the Association undertook to do was to show to the gentlemen of Scotland the best mode of building cottages, the best materials for the purpose, the best modes of plastering, completing, draining, and glazing, and doing everything that could possibly lead to the comfort of the labourer; but they never undertook for one moment to find the funds with which those things could be accomplished. That book, however, and the plan with which it was accompanied, had been the means of spreading labourers' cottages from one end of Scotland to the other, and it was only required that funds should be obtained so as to enable the landed proprietors to build cottages on the commercial principles of being able to receive a fair percentage for their money, and they might depend upon it, they would build as many as required. What he would propose was, for the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Bill, which really was one of the most absurd documents that ever came to his knowledge—a Bill which absolutely in the 4th clause proposed that the tenant to whom you let your land should bind you down to his own conditions. The Scottish farmer did not in the least degree stand upon ceremony with the persons he was dealing with. The one would state his bargain, and the other his; but it was not by means of the tenant-farmers, who were sensible men, that these claims were raised—they did not care a bit about them—but by the agitators who never advanced any means at all. By the Bill it was proposed that the tenant was to build a house of any description, and that the landlord should take it off his hands, and then the tenant was to give the landlord a valid title to his own stores and his own land. The hon. Gentleman had better withdraw the Bill and induce the Government to take the matter into their own hands. They were ready enough to introduce Bills for Irish purposes. There was, he believed, however, a great want of labourers' cottages in Scotland, and he believed the want could be readily supplied, if it were made a commercial transaction. What the Government had to do was this—to bring in a Bill by which they would permit proprietors, in conjunction with their tenants, to give the accommodation they required. Every landlord he was acquainted with would be too happy and too ready to do that, if the money were advanced to them at the rate at which it was advanced to School Boards—4½ per cent for 50 years. Under any circumstances, the change must be exceedingly gradual. The habits of farm servants in Scotland were most regular. They were perfectly different from the habits of the English nature. They partook of the character of the country from which their origin was derived; and there was a great similarity in their habits and modes of dealing to those of more northern races, from whom they were descended. Instead of the bothy, these northern farm servants preferred huts, similar to those in use in Norway, except that Norwegian peasants were better provided for. There was no reason whatever why a tenant-farmer in Scotland, who wished to accommodate his labourers, should erect a kind of buildings which would last much longer than his lease. He (Sir James Elphinstone) had some which he covered with coal-tar and naphtha, and which would be perfectly sound habitations for forty years. In Norway, wood was used for the same purpose, and not only had the people comfortable and commodious dwellings, but they had an amount of accommodation, and a degree of privacy, which did not exist under the British system. There was no reason why the bothy system should not be made use of where you had unmarried servants, but where you had married servants it was of greater importance that they should have comfortable houses. The improvement of the bothy in the first instance was a matter of great moment. He would not weary the House with these matters, but would at once move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir James Elphinstone.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the last speaker had made important admissions as to the acknowledged want of accommodation, and the probability that cottages would be built if the money required were forthcoming. This admission was at once a sufficient proof that the farms of Scotland were deficient of the accommodation required for carrying on the work of the farms. It was admitted that the hovels which existed in a very large part of Scotland were still of a most miserable character, and that labourers were living in cottages in which farmers would refuse to house their beasts. There could be no doubt that it was necessary in a social point of view to provide better accommodation suitable for the workmen desirous of marrying, and considering the state of marriage life, and the births in Scotland without marriage, everyone would join in advocating the erection of cottages calculated to promote marriages, and thus diminish illegitimacy. Considering the immense improvement in the value of landed property in Scotland, and that the rents of farms had nearly doubled, within a few years, and were year by year on the increase, it was clear that there existed the means of providing suitable accommodation for labourers out of the rising incomes of proprietors. Still the fact of labourers being housed in places of such a wretched description, that if soldiers were put into them, there would be a howl throughout the land which would make improvements inevitable. It was clear that the time had come for this Bill to be passed into law to enable tenant farmers to do what landlords had failed to do. And with that change in the relations between tenant and farmer, which were inevitable in order to ensure to the tenants the equitable return for money spent in improving the farm, the farmers were quite prepared to provide the capital needed not only for the cottages of labourers but for all other farm buildings. Another reason for insisting on improvement was, that emigration had gone on until there was a deficiency of labour for agricultural purposes, and no wonder, considering the better habitations which the labourer could occupy in Australia or in America. He would therefore give his cordial support to the Bill of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Fordyce.) It was a Bill well calculated to reflect credit on him as a landlord earnestly desirous to promote the general welfare of the country, and particularly to benefit agricultural interests. He had no doubt that when once the Bill got into Committee, if it ever reached that stage this year, those Amendments in the Bill could be made which would tend to remove the doubts and fears of the landlords.

MR. VANS AGNEW wished to make a few observations on the subject of the Bill, which he had no doubt was brought in with the intention of improving the dwellings of the labourers in Scotland. He admitted very fully the necessity that existed for the accomplishment of that object, and he was sure none of those who could not agree with the terms of the Bill would dispute the deficiency of accommodation, and the inconvenience which existed; but he was unable to see that if the Bill were carried, it would have the effect of making matters any better in this respect, and he also saw provisions in the Bill which he did not think it would be desirable for that House to affirm or to pass. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Mr. Fordyce) had said the possessor should be entitled to compensation to the extent of the value of his cottages. It was a new thing to hear that the tenant-farmer was to be classed as the owner of the land which he held under another person who had the real right. Was it desirable, in a Bill of that kind, to give proprietary rights to a man who might be in only temporary possession of a farm? He might only be a yearly tenant. If the Bill were to go to a second reading, and they were to go into Committee, he should move that such rights should not be given to any man who had not at least 15 years of his lease unexpired. The Bill, moreover, even went so far as to enable the tenant to sell the site on which he had built the House—a site which in some cases the landlord himself would not be entitled to sell. The Bill further did not contain any exemption for existing contracts, nor did it provide against persons contracting themselves out of the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Member spoke of the building of cottages as the same thing as raising the crops for sale. It was a very different thing, a man sold a crop, but he left the land, which the tenant could have no right whatever to sell. The hon. Member spoke also of the exceptionally bad crops of last year; but really he could not see that these were arguments which should make them pass a Bill which was intended to be a law for the future as regarded tenants. He would not enter into the question of the consequences, the immorality and indecency which the present state of things produced. The House must be already aware that the consequences were most disastrous; but they had been told by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fordyce) that things were improving. He told them that according to the Census of 1861 there were 36 per cent of families living in houses which had but one room, and that according to the Census of 1871 there were 33 per cent. That was an improvement—small, it was true, but still a gradual improvement in the right direction. Then the hon. Gentleman told them with, he thought, somewhat too strong emphasis, that all the efforts, made by the landlords in Scotland in reference to building cottages of late years had failed. He (Mr. Vans Agnew) demurred very strongly to that statement. He had been observing for now more than 30 years great improvements in the cottages on the land. In his own county he had seen hundreds of new cottages put up, and in other counties which he had visited he had seen the same thing going on, and he was quite satisfied that the measure of the improvements effected by the landlords in Scotland had been simply the measure of what they were able to afford. He did not know of any landlord interested in that country who did not feel the difficulty there was in obtaining capital to build cottages, but yet who was doing his best in that direction, as far as means would allow. But they had been told that as the landlords had failed they ought to allow the occupiers to try their hand at building cottages. But what did hon. Gentlemen suppose that the occupiers would do if they were allowed to build cottages? Would they build the same sort of house that was now built by the landlords? What was the experience of hon. Members who had any acquaintance with Scotland? The first time he had occasion to attend an agricultural meeting, now a great many years ago, and when he was quite a young man, he happened to address in his own county an agricultural society on this very subject, and he had occasion then to point out to them the state in which matters were with regard to houses. The accommodation then provided for labourers was a long building with two small windows and one door partitioned off by two abominations called "box-beds," and that was considered sufficient by the occupiers for two families. They did not think the labourers required anything more. What was the cost of building houses? He could only speak for his own district. He could not build a good double cottage with three rooms in each cottage under £160. He might have built such a cottage a few years ago for £100; but wages and the prices of material had risen so high since then, that it could not be done for a less sum than that which he had stated. These houses would not let for more than £3 a-piece; and would any gentleman tell him that £6 was sufficient interest on a capital of £160? What he should desire to see would be a simple and easy method of charging the value of a sufficient cottage upon an estate when it was built. At present, to do that, he must petition the Court of Session, but that process cost £40 or £50, a sum which was simply prohibitive. If that were done, it would enable proprietors who might be under entails and fettered in other ways, out of their income to build one or two cottages or more every year, and to recover their money in the course of 12 months. Although he admitted that the want of good cottages was very great indeed, and that the consequences arising from that want were very deplorable, he could not give his consent to the second reading of the Bill as it stood. He would join most cordially with hon. Members who were anxious to promote the building of cottages if they would only go about securing that object in a more practical way—namely, by enabling proprietors to charge their estates to a small extent with the cost of the improvement. Then he believed they would see more cottages built; but he did not believe that if this Bill were passed there would be 100 cottages built under it in the whole of Scotland.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was not aware in whose interest the hon. Baronet who had moved the rejection of the second reading of the Bill had spoken, but he was certain that he had not spoken in the interest of the landlords of the country. He (Mr. J. W. Barclay) was afraid the hon. Baronet's experience of the management of land was not very recent, or he would be more deeply impressed with the crisis through which the agricultural interest of the country was now passing. What was the condition of agriculture at the present moment? Some 25 years ago, when the Free Trade policy was introduced into this country, they had a large surplus stock of labour in the country, but the rapid strides of industry which followed that policy had during these 25 years not only absorbed the spare labour in the country, but had of recent years caused a very large increase in its price. If they looked to see what was the position of the farmer during this period, they would find that the great bulk of his produce—namely, grain—had not at all increased, that the prices over a series of seven years averages had not increased; and that notwithstanding the bad crop of last year—the worst he believed during the present century—the price of grain had not materially increased. It was quite true that the price of meat had greatly increased; but the present price of meat had not arisen so much from the increased demand as from failure in production; and although the price of meat at the present moment was very high, yet the farmers did not get the benefit of it, simply because they had few cattle to sell. They had thus on the one hand the cost of production increasing very considerably; and on the other hand, no material increase in the prices given for the produce. The result of that certainly would be that rents must fall. The price of land would fall, as the farmers would not be able to give the rents which they had paid hitherto. The present proposal was a Motion tending towards the reduction of the money price of labour. The farmers could not expect that labourers would continue upon their farms at wages of 15s., 16s., and 17s. per week for seven days work—because on the seventh day servants had to attend to the cattle and horses—when they saw that other labourers, such as coal-miners, who were engaged in a not more difficult labour, and who worked only five days a-week, could make double that amount of wages. There were certain advantages connected with agricultural labour which induced labourers to remain in the country, but unless they had cottages for themselves and their families it was impossible to expect that they should do so.

It seemed to him that the opinion was growing more and more widely that the ownership of land had its duties as well as its privileges, and he thought it would be admitted that one of the principal duties was that of providing houses as a part of the permanent capital of the land.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA—THE NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN thought it might be for the convenience of their Lordships if he were to state that His Majesty the Shah of Persia would leave London for Portsmouth at 8.30 on Monday morning, and would reach Portsmouth about 10.30. a.m. A vessel, The Simoom, had been set apart for such of their Lordships as might desire to attend the naval review, which would leave the Dockyard at 9.30; and he believed arrangements were being made in connection with the House for a special train. The tickets, which would be issued by the Admiralty to-morrow, would not be transferable. The Admiralty were anxious to consult their Lordships' wishes as to ladies, and a certain number of tickets would be provided; but much would, of course, depend on how many of their Lordships put down their names as intending to go, and he should be glad if any Peer who did not wish to take a lady with him would intimate the fact. In any case, no more than one lady would be allowed to accompany a noble Lord.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA—THE MILITARY REVIEW AT WINDSOR.
QUESTION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE wished to know whether any provision was to be made for the accommodation of the carriages of Peers at the reviews at Windsor and at Woolwich?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, space would be set apart for the carriages of their Lordships at the Windsor review, and His Royal Highness the Ranger of Windsor Forest, in whose hands the arrangements were, had been pleased to forward tickets for distribution among their Lordships. The review at Woolwich was to be one of a less formal character, and he was not aware of any special facilities for Members of either House of Parliament.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN BILL.

(The Lord Henniker.)

(No. 102.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Interpretation).

LORD HENNIKER moved an Amendment, by which the definition of "child" was altered from a child under 13 years of age to 12 years. Under the alteration no person could employ a child between the ages of 8 and 10, unless the parent should produce a certificate declaring that the child had completed 250 school attendances within the preceding 12 months, and between the ages of 10 and 12 that the child had completed 150 attendances. As originally drawn the age was fixed at 12, but was altered to 13 by the House of Commons.

Amendment moved, line 16, to leave out ("thirteen") and insert ("twelve"). (The Lord Henniker.)

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON opposed the Amendment. As the Bill stood agricultural children ceased to be affected by it at 13 years of age, which he did not think was too long to require attendance at school. The practical effect of the Bill was that the child was released from the necessity of school attendance a year earlier than the age stated; because as the obligation to produce the certificate as a condition for employment ceased at 13, the obligation of school attendance did not operate after the age of 12. A child might, consequently, be employed after the completion of his 12th year upon producing a certificate of 150 attendances between his 11th and 12th year. The alteration, in his opinion, would render the Bill almost useless.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND questioned the accuracy of the construction placed upon the clause by the noble Marquess, and hoped his noble Friend (Lord Henniker) would adhere to his Amendment. It was necessary that in a measure restricting the employment of agricultural labour the prohibition should not be too stringent. It was essential that boys should be brought up to agricultural labour at a very early age—their earnings were of great importance to the parents, and at some periods of the year labour of this description was essential to the employers. Any prohibitions, therefore, that would materially affect these objects would be unpopular with both; and it was only by the co-operation of the farmers that a measure of this description could work.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that under the clause as it stood, a boy within a week of his 13th birthday would be unable to accept employment if he could not show 250 school attendances within the previous 12 months. By making the prohibition too stringent they would endanger the successful working of the measure, for its success would in a great degree depend upon the goodwill of the parties interested on both sides, and it was therefore necessary to make its provisions as little onerous as possible.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought the change proposed unadvisable. He believed that its effect in many cases would be that which his noble Friend the Lord President had described.

After some discussion, which was imperfectly audible,

On Question, agreed to.

Amendment made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Prohibition of employment of children under eight years in agricultural work) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Restriction on employment of children above eight years in agricultural work).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved an Amendment, line 3, after ("twelve months") insert ("Such child was ill for a period exceeding thirty days, or that"); and at end of clause add—

("Provided, that if it be proved to the satisfaction of a court of summary jurisdiction in any petty sessional division that there are any special reasons which make the application of the provisions of this section to any particular child unjust or inexpedient, such court may if it thinks fit issue a license to such child's parent excepting him from the said provisions for a period not exceeding six months: Provided also, that this section shall not apply to agricultural employment connected with the hay harvest, the corn harvest, or the gathering of hops.")

Their Lordships would readily conceive that there were a great number of cases in humble life which would afford reasonable cause for the detention of children from school, but which would not come under the Proviso of the clause—which was confined to the simple excuse of there being no school to which the child could be sent. The noble Marquess pointed out that a similar discretionary power was given by the Elementary Education Act to School Boards.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, the Government had no desire to make the Bill more stringent than it need be. He thought that a Proviso making some "unavoidable cause" sufficient would meet the view of the noble Marquess.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he preferred "reasonable" to "unavoidable." But he thought the clause was already too long, and would suggest that it should be divided into two, one of which could deal more fully with the question of excuses.

After some conversation,

LORD HENNIKER said, he would endeavour to frame a satisfactory clause, and would bring it up on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Certificate of school attendances to be given on application of parent) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Power to suspend temporarily restrictive provisions of Act) struck out.

Clause 9 (Persons employing children in contravention of Act to be deemed guilty of offence against Act.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved, after Clause 8, to insert the following clause:—

"The provisions of this Act with respect to the employment of children shall not apply in the case of any child who has obtained from one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, from the Diocesan Inspector of Schools, or from the Rural Dean of the rural deanery in which the parish to which such child belongs is situated, a certificate under his hand to the effect that such child has reached a standard equivalent to the fourth standard of the new code of regulations of the Education Department, made on the twenty-eighth day of February 1873."

At present the standard of qualification was a perpetually varying quantity, for the Education Department were constantly raising the standard, and it was therefore necessary to specify the particular degree of proficiency which should secure exemption.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON objected to the Amendment as not in conformity with the Act of 1870, which intrusted the test of proficiency to Her Majesty's Inspectors only. If they were to go upon the principle of having those certificates, it must be done through Her Majesty's Inspectors. There would be difficulties in the way of imposing that duty on the other functionaries who had been suggested. Again, if, in addition to the requirements of the Education Department, they took another and altogether distinct standard, they would involve themselves in the inconvenience of having two examinations, and would also inflict some hardship on the children.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that if "Her Majesty's Inspector" was to remain in the clause it would be practically a dead letter, because that officer would not have time to examine the boys who were to go to work. A boy who had not attained a certain standard on the day the Inspector went round might do so a month or two afterwards; but he would have to wait a twelvemonth until the Inspector's next examination before he would be entitled to get employment. He would not object, however, to the words "Her Majesty's Inspector," with this addition—"or, failing him, some person deputed by him."

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH would prefer to see that provision omitted altogether, and a certain continuous and gradual amount of instruction made compulsory up to a certain age.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE observed that the duties of the Diocesan Inspectors were entirely confined to the religious inspection of the schools, and they had nothing whatever to do with the standards prepared by the Education Department.

EARL FORTESCUE thought it on the whole more desirable to give the children a right to be employed as soon as they had attained a certain standard of proficiency, instead of making the acquisition of knowledge a secondary point, and attendance at school a primary one.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON accepted the suggestion that the words "or by some person deputed by him" be added after "Her Majesty's Inspector."

LORD HENNIKER observed that the clause was nearly the same as the Amendment he had on the Paper and was taken chiefly from the bye-laws of the London School Board. The proposed standard was one which most children of 9 or 10 years of age could reach, and his object was that children under that age should not come under the operation of the clause.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he was altogether opposed to the stereotyping of the standard of education, and moved as an Amendment that the standard under the Bill should be that prescribed for the time being by the Minutes of the Education Department in reference to the Parliamentary grant. If the Amendment were not adopted there should be a double examination of the children, one for the Parliamentary grant and another for the purposes of the Act, if this Bill were to become law.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the Amendment would place in the hands of a Department of the Government the right to prescribe the conditions on which a child might earn its bread. He hoped their Lordships would not depute such a power to the Committee of Council on Education.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON denied that he had made any such claim on behalf of the Education Department. He asked for nothing by the Amendment which Parliament had not sanctioned by the Act of 1870.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE supported the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH thought that an examination which would qualify a child for the Parliamentary grant ought to be regarded as sufficient for the purposes of this Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH thought that the Amendment would give to the Government the power of making the clause entirely nugatory. It would give to the Education Department—or rather to the body of secretaries, clerks, and commissioners, of whom it was really composed—a prerogative which now belonged to Parliament alone.

Amendment agreed to.

After further short debate, Clause (by leave) withdrawn; and new Clause moved and agreed to, as follows:—

Clause 8 (Cases in which provisions of Act shall not apply.)

"The provisions of this Act with respect to the employment of children shall not apply in the case of any child who has obtained from one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, or from some person to be deputed by him for that purpose, a certificate under his hand, to the effect that such child has reached the fourth standard of education as prescribed by the Minute of the Education Department for the time being in force with respect to the Parliamentary Grant, or such other standard as may from time to time be fixed for the purpose of this Act by Minute of the Education Department."

Remaining Clauses and Schedule agreed to with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendment to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 165.)

NORTH AMERICA—ALASKA BOUNDARY —SAN JUAN WATER BOUNDARY.

QUESTIONS.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE asked, What arrangement has been made to settle the water boundary line between the British Territory and Alaska; 2. If British subjects are to be paid for property taken from them on the Island of San Juan; 3. If the channels to the eastward of the Haro are open to British ships without let or hindrance; also the right of fishing. With regard to his first Question—that relating to the water boundary line—in the chart contained in the Blue-Book which had been laid on the Table of the House, the boundary was clearly defined, and he had nothing to say on that point, except so far as the navigation was concerned. It was equally essential that the navigation boundary should be distinctly laid down. He considered that the water boundary could be easily settled without arbitration—at least, he hoped so. At the present moment it might appear that this was not a matter of much consequence, but gold had been discovered up one of the rivers in this region, and it was highly probable that before long the exact water boundary would be a very important consideration. Since he had put his second Question on the Paper a Proclamation had been issued by the President of the United States making it known that the Government of that country would satisfy all just claims of British subjects. It was not, therefore, necessary that he should put that Question. He attached much importance to the third Question. The Haro Channel, was not navigable by sailing vessels, except when towed by steamers, there being a shoal in the middle of it. No doubt the United States of America would offer no objection to the passage of British ships in these waters, but he thought it would be well to have some definite arrangement respecting them. It was also very important that the right of fishing should be clearly defined.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the noble Earl had made much more difficulty about the water boundary than really existed. The Treaty with the United States settled the boundary generally with regard to the British possessions and Alaska, and a Bill had been introduced into Congress last Session appointing a Commission for the purpose of making arrangements as to the water boundary. Owing to the pressure of business, however, that Bill did not pass. The noble Earl, after the Proclamation issued by the President—and he had not since heard anything at variance with it—was right in not pressing for an answer to the second Question. With respect to the third Question, the boundary was defined by the Treaty to be in the middle of a certain channel. Unfortunately, the Treaty was not clear and precise in the definition which channel was intended, and under the Treaty of Washington the Emperor of Germany gave it as his award that the channel in question was the Haro Channel. He did not suppose there would be any impediment to the navigation of the eastward channels by British ships, but they were American waters. As to the Haro Channel, it was open to the ships of both countries.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION—ENGLISH AND SCOTCH CODES.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF BRISTOL rose to call attention to the minute of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council on Education, dated 22d May 1873, establishing a code of regulations for Scotland; and to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they will take steps to amend the English code by adding thereto similar provisions to those contained in article 19A. (3) and in article 21 of the Scotch code, so as to place the elementary schools of both countries on an equal footing as respects the aid to be derived from the Parliamentary grant? The noble Marquess, who was very imperfectly heard, was understood to state as his reason for bringing the subject under their Lordships' notice, that by the Minute of 1873 the Scotch schools were placed in a more advantageous position than the English schools; and he thought that this inequality should be redressed.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he would remind his noble Friend that one of the main arguments adduced by the noble Lords opposite, and by some also on that side of the House, in the discussions on the Scotch Education Bill last year was that the state of education in Scotland was exceptional, and that on that account certain arrangements ought to be made and prescribed by Act of Parliament in order—as the Act recited—“to keep up and maintain the existing state of education” in that country—particularly in what were called the higher branches. It was notorious that things were taught in parochial schools in Scotland which would not be thought of in English schools, and the Scotch were desirous that this system should not be interfered with. So jealous, indeed, were they on this point, that a special provision that the standard of education should not be lowered was inserted in the Act. Again, by an Amendment introduced in that House it was provided that the Scotch Education Board in Edinburgh should have the right to prepare and propose a Code for the consideration of the Scotch Education Department in London. This they had done with great ability. The Department in London had been able to agree with them as to the provisions to be introduced, while the Education Board in Edinburgh were very well contented with the modifications made in the proposals they sent up. There had been no system in Scotland similar to that which existed in this country, but the differences between the two systems were less now than they had ever been before. To the statement of his noble Friend that some of the arrangements made by the Minute of 1873 were more favourable to the Scotch than to the English schools, he would remark that other arrangements in different directions were more favourable to the latter. The express provisions in the Act of Parliament with regard to the higher branches of instruction would, he thought, enable the schools in Scotland where those higher branches of education were taught to earn more money. On the other hand, a deputation who waited on his right hon. Friend Mr. Forster the other day asserted that it would be difficult for Scotch schools to earn as much as could be earned by schools in England. This was a remarkable instance of the difficulty of ascertaining beforehand whether more or less could be made under the provisions of a particular Code. He could not promise to introduce the specific provisions of the Scotch Code into the English Code; and if he were to do so, without making other changes, the Scotch would immediately cry out against being excluded from certain provisions of the English Code. When the time arrived—as it did from year to year—to reconsider the Codes, it would be the duty of the Department to avail itself of the experience of both countries; but it would be most inexpedient to make a sudden change in the middle of the educational year. The managers of schools looked forward to changes being made at regular periods when it was known that the Codes came under consideration, and it would be most inconvenient to make a change in the middle of the school year. He could give no pledge except that the whole question should be considered from time to time in the light of experience. The allowance for special subjects under the Scotch Code was founded upon the express words of the Act of Parliament which required the Department to take special measures for meeting the demand for a higher class of education in Scotland.

ARMY—THE VOLUNTEERS—BRIGADE DRILL—QUESTION.

MR. FORDYCE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Volunteer Corps will be required to attend brigade drill where the cost of conveyance necessarily exceeds the Government Grant for the purpose?

The Marquess of Ripon

MR. CARDWELL : Sir, general officers have been cautioned that they are not to call upon Volunteer corps to attend, when they would be prejudicially affected by doing so.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS—ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE CATHOLIC SCHOOL.

QUESTION.

MR. CAWLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a coroner's inquest held in Salford, on Monday the 9th instant, on the body of a boy named Patrick Slane, aged nine years, who had been confined in the Roman Catholic Industrial School at Ashton under Lyne, and at which inquest the jury, whilst finding a verdict of death from natural causes, added that they were of opinion that the officers of the institution have not had sufficient experience to qualify them for the duties they have to perform, that they believe there has been considerable neglect in the domestic arrangements of the school, and that the deceased boy had not had either the kind attention or suitable nourishment required by a boy of his tender age and weakly constitution, and that in their opinion an inquiry by magistrates of the county, or some other duly authorised authority should be instituted into the whole discipline of the school; and, whether he is prepared to order such an inquiry; and, if so, whether it will be conducted in public?

MR. BRUCE : Sir, the Question of the hon. Member divides itself into two parts. First, the circumstances of the boy's death; and, secondly, the condition of the Industrial School. As to the first point, it appears that the boy was admitted in December last in delicate health, and suffering from the disease of which he died, and was placed under the care of the house surgeon. It is asserted by the managers, but was not satisfactorily proved to the coroner's jury, that the boy received every care and attention from the matron and officers. On the 26th of May he was, by the surgeon's advice, allowed to go home to his mother, where he died in a few days. His death ought to have been reported to the Home Office, but was not. The Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools has applied for full information to the manager who is in temporary charge of the school, but has not yet received it. Now as to the second point. The state of the school has been the subject of inquiry and correspondence for three or four weeks past on the part of Mr. Turner, the Inspector. The school was set on foot in 1869 by the then Roman Catholic priest of Ashton-under-Lyne. He was assisted by Mr. Aspland, a Protestant magistrate, and latterly by a small committee of Roman Catholic gentlemen of Manchester and the vicinity. The school was carried on with fair average success for the first two or three years; but on the inspection for last year it was found necessary to represent very strongly the want of cleanliness and effective teaching, and to threaten the suspension of the certificate. Unfortunately, in consequence of Mr. Aspland's illness and other circumstances, the management of the school and the receipt and control of the money paid by the Government and by local authorities for the maintenance of the boys committed to it were left without any interference in the hands of the priest, and the result is that the school is now involved heavily in debt, and that for some months past the discipline and treatment of the inmates have been very unsatisfactory. The late manager was removed by the Roman Catholic Bishop and another priest appointed in his place. Mr. Rogers, the Assistant Inspector, has visited the school, and conferred with the Committee. He will meet them again in a few days, and after receiving his Report, I shall be in a position to decide whether it will be necessary to revoke the certificate and discontinue the school, or whether such improvements in its future management will be guaranteed as will justify me in sanctioning its continuance.

ARMY—AUTUMN MANŒUVRES—COM-PENSATION.—QUESTION.

LORD HENRY THYNNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can give any reason why the claims for compensation for damages in the Autumn Manœuvres last year have not been all settled in Wiltshire; and, if he can state any time before which all such claims shall be paid?

MR. CARDWELL : Sir, all the claims except one have been amicably settled, and that one remains at present unsettled, because it is greatly in excess of any other similar claim, and the Compensation officer, not being satisfied as to its amount, is still in correspondence with those by whom it has been preferred.

ARMY—COST OF DEPOT CENTRES.

QUESTION.

MR. WHARTON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state the sum expended or to be expended in the purchase of land and purchase and erection of buildings for depot centres throughout the United Kingdom?

MR. CARDWELL: The sums, Sir, are stated in the Schedule of the Act of last year. The sum for the purchase of land at depot centres is £204,000, and that for the purchase and erection of buildings at those centres £1,627,000.

CRIMINAL LAW—

THE HALSTEAD MAGISTRATES—

CASE OF SAMUEL MAY'S.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of Samuel Mays, lately sentenced by the Hulstead Magistrates to one month's imprisonment on the charge of deserting his wife and family, and leaving them on the parish; the statement on his behalf being that the man had gone to Durham to find work, had remitted some of his earnings to his wife, had spoken to his employer for a house, and was preparing to send for his family; and, whether he will make an inquiry into the matter?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have inquired into this case, the facts of which are as follows:—Samuel Mays was apprehended on a warrant for leaving his wife and six children chargeable to the parish. It appeared that he had left his parish in Essex some nine weeks before his apprehension, and had gone to Durham in search of employment. This he obtained after the lapse of a week, and had during his absence sent his wife £1 16s., his wages being £1 a-week. He had, however, lost a week's work from no fault of his own, and his earnings had amounted to £7; he stated that he was in treaty for a house, but no evidence of this was offered. The offence of leaving a wife and children chargeable to the poor rate is punishable by three months' imprisonment; the magistrates sentenced him to one month's imprisonment, observing that the prisoner was quite right to go away if he could better himself, but if he did so he was bound to make arrangement for the support of his family in his absence. It is not easy to decide these cases satisfactorily. It would be a most dangerous position to assume that a man might leave his family to be supported by the poor rates on the chance of his obtaining employment elsewhere at some indefinite time. On the other hand, in cases where a man, as in the present instance, was unable to obtain a sufficient livelihood at home, and sought and obtained employment elsewhere, making remittances to his family, it was obviously desirable that the law should be leniently applied. I think that a less severe punishment would have satisfied the justice of the case. At the same time, I am satisfied that the imputation made elsewhere on the magistrate of personal feeling against the prisoner is unfounded. I have no doubt he did his duty impartially and according to the best of his judgment. The sentence has expired, and there does not appear to be any necessity for further inquiry.

IRISH JURIES LISTS—REMUNERATION OF CLERKS OF UNIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. G. BROWNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is intended to remunerate the Clerks of Unions in Ireland for the additional duty imposed upon them in making out Lists of Jurors?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, that these expenses would be dealt with under the Act of 1871. Probably his hon. Friend had in his mind the various Petitions which had been presented by Boards of Guardians, praying that the expenses under the Juries Act should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. That, however, was a question which would have to be considered separately both as regarded England and Ireland, and he could not hold out any hope that the course proposed would be adopted.

Mr. Cardwell

POST OFFICE—PURCHASE OF TELE-GRAPHS—OUTSTANDING CLAIMS.
 QUESTION.

MR. DENISON asked the Postmaster General, When the Return, ordered by the House on the 1st May last, regarding outstanding claims of Railway Companies for the purchase or rent of their telegraphs will be laid upon the Table; and, if all claims from the United Kingdom have been received and registered?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, Mr. Chetwynd expresses a confident expectation that the Return, so far as it can be given, will be ready by the 10th of July. We have received and recorded all the notices from Railway Companies requiring the Postmaster General to purchase their telegraph undertakings, which, within the time prescribed by the Telegraphs Acts, 1868-9, can be given. In the great majority of cases, however, the amount to be claimed has not yet been specified.

ARMY—THE NEW VALISE EQUIP-MENT.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether the Troops taking part in the coming Manœuvres will, both Regulars and Militia, be supplied with the new valise equipment; and, whether it is in contemplation to adopt a new pattern legging, or laced boot, and water bottle?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, the new valise equipment will not be supplied to troops taking part in the coming Manœuvres who are not already provided with it. An alteration has been made in the pattern of leggings to be issued next year; but trials are being made in order to ascertain whether a boot could not be introduced which would combine the advantages of boot and legging. A water bottle of the Italian pattern is being introduced into the service.

ARMY—MAJOR GENERAL SHUTE.
 QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether he has made further inquiry into the allegation that the Commanding Officer of a Cavalry Regiment had misappropriated the lodging allowance of the riding master, and for that purpose had falsified a War Office Return; whether the allegation was substantially true; whether, in order to exculpate other regiments, he is prepared to name the regiment in which this irregularity took place, and to explain what steps have been or will be taken by the authorities; and, whether the officer has been or will be shortly promoted to a high office?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, assisted by the information which has been furnished to me by the hon. Gentleman, I have made further inquiry into the charge that has been preferred against a cavalry officer by calling on that officer for an explanation. The officer referred to is the late lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Dragoon Guards, now Major General Shute, and the transaction occurred so long ago as 1871. On calling on the Major General for an explanation that officer responded in the frankest manner. It appears that in 1871 the lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Dragoon Guards, having a number of recruits and young horses, thought it absolutely necessary for the good of the service that the riding-master should live in the barracks, and as that officer had a family he gave up his quarters to him, drawing when the barracks were not fully occupied the consolidated allowance of fuel and light himself. When the barracks were quite full the riding-master was placed on the lodging list, and the commanding officer, instead of drawing the consolidated allowance of fuel and light, received the lodging allowance of the riding-master, amounting to £7 12s. There has been no loss to the public by this transaction; but the commanding officer ought to have represented the circumstances of the case, and it would not have been at variance with precedent for permission to have been given to him to proceed as regards the quarters as he did on his own responsibility. It cannot, however, be denied that the Return which he signed was not in literal accordance with the circumstances as they actually occurred. Major General Shute excuses this on the ground that he did so through inadvertence, and without properly examining the Return and satisfying himself of its correctness; but he has been informed by the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, that the Secretary of State cannot excuse the signature by an officer, for whatever reason, of a Return not true in fact, and

His Royal Highness has been requested to convey to him an expression of the Secretary of State's displeasure on this account. With reference to the last portion of the hon. Gentleman's Question, I find on inquiry that Major General Shute has not been promoted to any other office, if office it can be called, than that of honorary colonel of Volunteers, and I do not know of his being promoted shortly to any high office. I do not, however, wish this answer to be interpreted as conveying the impression that this error is to be regarded as a disqualification to all future time for employment suitable to his rank.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, that, in explanation of the Question he was about to put, he begged leave to state that the previous day the Lord Chief Justice of England charged the Attorney General with the responsibility of protecting the administration of justice by bringing before the Court all persons whom he might consider guilty of contempt of Court in reference to the present case. He would now ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the prosecutions for contempt of Court in reference to the Tichborne case, Whether on the part of the Government he is prepared to pay such costs; and, if so, whether he so acts by the advice of the Attorney General, or on what other legal advice; and also, as to the general expenses of this prosecution, whether he is prepared to state the amount already paid or incurred, and to what extent the Government are pledged to provide funds for this purpose?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the costs which have been incurred by anything that has been done under the direction of the Chief Justice in this matter are already provided for, under the head of "Law Charges," by the Vote of this House; and therefore I have no duty to discharge with regard to asking the Attorney General's or anyone else's opinion on the subject. As to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, which asks as to the amount of the costs already paid or incurred in the prosecution now pending, that Question appears to me an improper one. It can only—I will not say that it is intended to have such an effect—but it can only serve to prejudice the case which is now pending.

ARMY—COLONELS OF CAVALRY REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in the rumour that the pay of Colonels of Cavalry Regiments of the Line has been reduced to that of Colonels of Infantry Regiments; if so, by what authority such change has been effected; and, upon what terms the two last appointments to Colonelcies of Cavalry Regiments were made?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the price of cavalry commissions having been reduced to the infantry rate, there appears no longer any reason why the general officers of cavalry should receive, when appointed to regiments, a larger sum than officers of infantry; and, as it was in contemplation to submit to Her Majesty a Regulation on the subject, the officers who had lately been appointed to cavalry regiments had accepted the appointments subject to such a reduction, should it be approved by Her Majesty.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK gave Notice that he would put a Question as to the legality of the step taken by the right hon. Gentleman.

COMMISSIONERS OF EXHIBITION, 1851 —LAND AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

QUESTIONS.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that the Royal Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 have offered to lease for building purposes certain pieces of land fronting Kensington Gardens, and lying between Queen's Gate and the Albert Hall, forming a portion of the site originally selected by them to be devoted specially to purposes connected with science and art; and, whether tenders for the same were not to be sent in on the 18th instant?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that being an ex officio Commissioner of the Exhibition of 1851 he had made inquiries to enable him to answer the Question of his hon. Friend; but as there were other Gentlemen sitting on the Ministerial bench who were also

Sir Henry Storks

Commissioners, and would, no doubt, like to answer all questions relating to that Commission, he hoped the putting of a Question on this subject would not be drawn into a precedent. The Commission was constituted by two Royal Charters, the second of which conferred upon the Commissioners licence and authority to purchase and hold lands and hereditaments in any part of the Queen's dominions, and provided that such lands and hereditaments might from time to time be applied to such purposes as might be deemed fit. Thus an absolute discretion was vested in the Commissioners to buy and sell land. The Commissioners having from time to time purchased a large extent of land in the neighbourhood of the Exhibition, had, in the exercise of their power, sold some and let other portions of the property they had so acquired, with the object of raising funds for carrying out the purposes they had in view. The lands, with the houses standing upon them, to which the hon. Baronet's Question particularly referred, had been let upon lease as private residences by the Commissioners, and when the leases fell in the Commissioners would deal with those lands and houses in a manner which they considered would be the best for the interests intrusted to them. In dealing with the property to which the Question of the hon. Baronet referred, therefore, the Commissioners had acted entirely within their authority, and it was quite a mistake to suppose that the lands they held had been especially dedicated to purposes connected with science and art, or any other public purpose. They had let land for the Albert Hall, for the Horticultural Gardens, and for Government purposes; and in doing so they had not exceeded their authority.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, if the above circumstances are correctly stated, such a proceeding is not distinctly contrary to the spirit and provisions of the Act 21 and 22 Vic. c. 36, under which the Commissioners of 1851 hold their charters, and under which they have only power to sell off for purposes other than those of science and art, detached blocks of the land vested in them?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that the hon. Baronet, on looking at the Act, would see that the proper answer to his Question would depend upon a number of facts with which he was not at present acquainted. He was entirely ignorant of the contents of the Charters under which the Commissioners were appointed. It was his duty to have a knowledge of the Act of Parliament, and he had accordingly looked at it carefully, and the hon. Baronet would see from its terms that whether the Commissioners had or had not acted within their authority depended upon whether they had discharged certain liabilities enumerated by the Act of Parliament, as to which he really had no knowledge.

SIR HENRY HOARE gave Notice that he should take the opinion of the House upon the subject, by moving for a Return relating to the question on some early day.

ARMY—SUBALTERNS OF MILITIA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the event of the Subaltern of Militia recommended, by the Officer commanding, for a Commission in the Line not passing the qualifying examination, he will allow another Officer of the same Corps to be examined, so that the advantage may not be lost to that Regiment?

MR. CARDWELL: The case supposed, Sir, has been provided for in the War Office Circular of the 21st of April, 1871, Clause 31, Art. 8, which is in the following words:—

"In the event of a Militia Regiment, when a Commission is offered, having no candidate for it, or in the event of the candidate nominated failing after a second trial to pass the required examination, the Commission will be offered to the Regiment next on the roster which is not included in the number detailed for the current year."

THE NATIONAL GALLERY— FLOORING OF THE NEW BUILDINGS.

QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that it is intended to construct the floors of the new buildings of the National Gallery of wood; whether the Director and the Architect of the Gallery have been respectively consulted on the subject; and, whether he will be willing to consider the propriety of substituting fireproof materials in lieu thereof?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that the flooring of the National Gallery consisted of two things; in the first place, of that which upheld the surface, and in the second place of the surface itself. The solid part of the flooring was built of iron and of brickwork, and was therefore to a certain extent fireproof; but some disagreement had arisen between the trustees and the architect of the building as to the nature of the material that should form the surface of the flooring, the trustees preferring a wooden flooring, while the architect recommended a tile flooring. Perhaps there was not much to choose between the two materials, on the ground that one was less likely to take fire than the other; because having in view the fact that many of those who were likely to frequent the Gallery would be shod, not only with leather, but with iron, it would be absolutely necessary, in the event of the tile flooring being selected, to cover it with some material that would be equally liable to take fire with wood flooring. As the trustees were of opinion that wood flooring was for all purposes of convenient use better than tile, the former would be adopted.

TRANSIT OF VENUS IN 1874.

QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, To what extent the Government are prepared to comply with the request recently made by the visitors of the Royal Observatory, and by the Astronomer Royal, that the means of organizing parties of Observers in the Southern Ocean may be afforded, with the view of finding additional localities in the sub-antarctic regions for observing the whole duration of the Transit of Venus in 1874?

MR. GOSCHEN in reply, said, that the requests made by the officers of the Royal Observatory and the Astronomer Royal only reached the Admiralty yesterday, and he should therefore feel obliged if the hon. Baronet would renew his Question on a future occasion. He might add that the requests referred to would receive every attention.

POST OFFICE—EXTENSION OF TELEGRAPHS—MISAPPLICATION OF FUNDS.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the inquiry respecting the employment of certain funds under the control of the Post Office Department for extensions of the Telegraph system, which on the 21st of last March he promised should be instituted, has yet been concluded; and, if so, when its result will be laid before the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the inquiry to which the hon. Member's Question referred had been concluded, and the proceedings having been transmitted to the Committee on Public Accounts, it would rest with them to decide in what form the matter should be submitted to the House.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—EDUCATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will move the Second Reading of the Education Act Amendment Bill on Monday next; and, if so, whether he will place that Bill on the Paper as the first Order of the Day, in order that there may be time for a full discussion of the measure?

MR. GLADSTONE in reply, said, that, as the Question related to the general Business of the House, he should prefer answering it in place of his right hon. Friend. It was not the intention of the Government to bring forward this measure on Monday night in consequence of its being doubtful whether the necessary attendance of hon. Members for discussing the Bill fully could be secured. It was proposed to take the remaining Votes in the Army Estimates, and subsequently, if time permitted, to take the Education Vote. The Education Act Amendment Bill would be brought forward again as soon as possible, but just at present it was necessary that some further progress should be made with the business in hand. Care would be taken to fix a convenient day for taking the Bill.

INLAND REVENUE—DUTY ON VOLUNTEER PRIZES.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it be true that the sum of thirty pounds has been charged by the Customs for Duty on prizes won by English Volunteers at the "Belgian Tir National" in September last, and recently distributed to the successful competitors by the Right honourable the Lord Mayor of London; and if, under the circumstances, an order will be issued from the Treasury to remit the Duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the duty had been collected. He could not state the amount, but it was at the rate of 1s. 6d. per ounce on the silver plate. In 1871 it was resolved that for the future no exception should be made in favour of presentations, and it was under that rule the collection had been made.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA—REVIEW AT WOOLWICH.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, many hon. Members would desire to see the great Review of Artillery at Woolwich, and he wished to know whether a part of the ground might not be reserved for the accommodation of Members?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, that no doubt interest would be felt by hon. Members in the Review, in which 13 or 14 batteries of the Royal Artillery would take part. But there would be no stands, and the space for carriages was very limited. If any Members of the House desired a portion of that space and would communicate with him, he would endeavour to secure it for them.

CONTEMPT OF COURT—EXPLANATION.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I wish, Sir, to make a short explanation of a statement made, on my authority, by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, in reference to the cases for contempt of Court. My right hon. Friend was speaking from information which I had placed at his disposal, and in the course of his statement he said that the Attorney General had not been concerned in any of the cases connected with Members of this House. At the time I furnished him with that information I was not aware that Mr. Carter, whom I brought before the Queen's Bench at the direction of the Lord Chief Justice, was the hon. Member for Leeds. I was thinking only of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) and the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow).

PARLIAMENT—THE SHAH OF PERSIA'S VISIT TO THE CITY.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving—

"That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Rating (Liability and Value) Bill should be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relative to the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mail Contract," said, he wished to take that opportunity of referring to the course of Business for to-morrow. At the morning sitting it was proposed by the Government to proceed with the Rating (Liability and Value) Bill; and with regard to the evening sitting, the Government would be very glad, if it were possible, to turn it to account by putting forward the Public Business. But the Government was given to understand that as there was an entertainment to be given by the Lord Mayor to-morrow evening in the City, it would be difficult to obtain the necessary attendance of Members. That being so, it would be desirable to settle the question beforehand rather than trust to the chapter of accidents, because great inconveniences arose from the lapsing of the Order of Supply, and the arrangements made for Monday were thereby deranged. Unless, therefore, he had reason for supposing that he was under-estimating the desire of Members to attend in this House to-morrow, he should propose that, at the end of the day Sitting, the House should adjourn till Monday.

Motion agreed to.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)

BILL.—[BILL 146.]

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 17th June.]

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee).

Clause 4 (Repeal of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36 and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 40).

MR. COLLINS, who had an Amendment on the Papers, to move in line 8, after "1869," to insert—

"and the provisions of the thirty-second and thirty-third Victoria, chapter forty, shall be construed to extend to all public elementary schools," said, the Committee had decided that Sunday and ragged schools should be exempt, but a still stronger claim might be made out for public elementary schools, because they were a necessity which the law required to be supplied in every parish, and when such schools were supplied by others the pockets of the ratepayers were thereby saved. He should, however, propose his Amendment when the question of exemptions was considered generally.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,"

MR. MUNTZ said, that for three years or more the House had been assured by the Government that a great principle was involved in the subject of exemptions; but the moment the matter touched the question of expediency they shrank from their own declaration. The fact was no country could be governed upon abstract principles. The Committee had decided by an immense majority that the exemption should be continued to ragged schools; but the clause now before the House was nothing else than a proposal to repeal an Act which was passed after careful consideration, and which exempted from rates and taxes literary and scientific institutions supported by voluntary contributions, and by repealing the Act as proposed, the Legislature would be guilty of a breach of good faith. There was a literary institution in Birmingham, whose income was only £500 a-year, and if the exemption was removed it would be taxed to the amount of £150. He hoped the Committee would not throw over such institutions for the sake of what was not even an abstract theory, for the principle had been departed from in other cases. The best thing to do would be to reject the clause, and to have the question decided upon the Amendment which would be moved by the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins).

MR. COLLINS remarked that it was desirable the matter should be decided upon an uniform principle. If ragged schools were to be exempted, public elementary schools ought to be placed in a similar position. When the whole question was raised they ought to catalogue the institutions which should be brought under the operation of the clause.

MR. STANSFELD said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Muntz) was under some misapprehension, for he dealt with the exemption of literary and scientific institutions as if it were one with the claim for exemption on the part of hospitals and charities. But the only question was whether they should repeal the Act 6 & 7 Vict., which provided a positive exemption for literary and scientific institutions. The main object of the Bill was the repeal of all exemptions, and the clause had been framed in accordance with that view. The Act exempted literary and scientific institutions not only from the payment of poor rates, but from the payment of county rates, borough rates, and local rates of every description. Under what conditions? The societies must be for the promotion of science and art. The Act which exempted them was, in fact, an aristocratic Act. They were not all of them supported by voluntary subscriptions; in fact, some of them obtained Government grants, and it was only the wealthiest of these societies that were exempted, which occupied the whole of their premises, without being obliged to make up part of their income by letting any portion of them. They must also be certified by the certifying barrister under the Friendly Societies Act. Societies to promote education of the poor by providing training schools were not exempted. But among the societies for science and art he found two rather curious instances of exemption. The Popular Conservative Association was exempted; and, to show the impartiality of the certifying barrister, the Ribble Working Men's Liberal Association was also exempted. The societies benefited by the positive exemption of the Act were not such as brought education and useful knowledge within the reach of the great mass of the community, but the aristocracy of literature and the fine arts. He did not, therefore, see that they should come under the exemption granted to industrial and ragged schools by this clause.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was not prepared to assist the literary and scientific institutions in claiming an exemption against all the world. They obtained their exemption because it was supposed to have been the law acted on for generations that the want of beneficial interest in some particular person was a ground for exemption. For instance, the Mersey Docks were exempted. In consequence of hospitals and other institutions being exempted, a Bill was brought in by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Sir William Hutt) for the exemption of literary and scientific institutions, which had occasioned much litigation, under the direction of parish officers. The exemption of the Mersey Docks had been repealed; and he would rather have allowed the matter to rest on the old basis—namely, that where there was no beneficial interest there should be no rate, or that none should be exempted. They exempted Sunday schools and ragged schools, which, however excellent, were not better than hundreds of other institutions which were not exempted. In his opinion the Government, by the exemptions they had made, had, in fact, given up the principle of the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that with regard to the exemption of the ragged schools the matter stood upon a totally different ground from the other cases. That exemption was not absolute, because it was in the power of the local authorities either to rate or to exempt them. It was an entirely different thing to give an exemption to these literary societies which did not depend upon the local bodies at all.

MR. BAINES said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) was quite mistaken with regard to the real character of a large body of these institutions. They were not of an aristocratic character. Most of them were mechanics' institutions, and were established by Lord Brougham and Mr. Birkbeck for the purpose of giving scientific instruction to those who were engaged in the pursuits of industry, and it was working men who were chiefly benefited by such institutions. They had been exempt from rates for a period of 30 years, and the repeal of that exemption would be a great blow to their prosperity. If, by an ex post facto law, these institutions were now to be rated, many would find it difficult to pay the rates, because they subsisted mainly on the benevolent charity of the upper classes; and if he crippled them we should strike a fatal blow at our industrial supremacy.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the Solicitor General had pointed out that, while the exemption of Sunday and ragged schools was optional with the local authorities, that of scientific and literary institutions was absolute; and the question therefore arose whether all hospitals and charities, literary and scientific institutions were to be put on the footing which the Government had now constituted. He wished to know whether the suggestion of the Solicitor General would be carried out in the subsequent clauses of the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had not admitted that the exemption of Sunday and ragged schools was sound in principle, but he had pointed out that there was a distinction in their favour which did not exist in this case, and therefore left hon. Members free to vote differently now. In the former case the Government could only bow to the will of the majority.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, it could hardly be urged that the Government gave way on a former occasion, with regard to this matter of the Sunday and the ragged schools, to the general wish of the House, because when the proposal was challenged by hon. Members opposite, Her Majesty's Ministry voted with, and, in fact, constituted a considerable part of the majority on the division. He still thought, therefore, that, having supported the exemption of schools, they could not consistently withdraw that of literary and scientific societies. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board speak of these societies as rich and aristocratic bodies; on the contrary, they were all more or less in want of funds and struggling for existence. He admitted that, in respect of some of them, the benefits which they conferred upon the country were not confined to the poor, but he thought it was an advantage rather than an objection that they benefited all classes of the community. The right hon. Gentleman said that Government already contributed to the maintenance of many of these societies. As regarded scientific societies, that was surely not the case; but even if it were so, surely that was no reason for subjecting them to rates, but rather the reverse. The Midland Institute, already referred to by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) was, he feared, a typical case. Our metropolitan societies might survive the imposition of rates, though they would be seriously interfered with in many important researches which they were now conducting; but as regarded provincial associations, it was clear that if this clause was passed all would be seriously crippled and many entirely closed.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he wished to correct a misapprehension of the hon. Member who had just sat down. His hon. Friend had stated that it was not right to say the Government gave way on this subject of the Sunday and ragged schools to the general wish of the House, because they constituted a great part of the majority; but the hon. Member had forgotten that this very question was fought out rather sharply between the Government and the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Reed) in former years. The Government thought it was an exception for which much might be said; but they foresaw that it would be made an apology for attempting to introduce other exemptions, and therefore they opposed it as resolutely as they could; and the fact was that they divided with the minority of 70 against a majority of 220 on the occasion. Having thus given way to the wish of the House, it was necessary to adhere to the concession; and that was the reason why the Government voted with the majority the other day. With regard to the ragged schools, there was this to be said for the exemption—that the desire of the local authorities was generally to exempt them. He believed the cases were very few indeed—about nine—in which the local authorities had declined to grant the exemption. But what was the case at the present moment with regard to the literary and scientific institutions? His right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) had justly said that this was a law which, as it existed, was in favour of the aristocratic or wealthy portion of these institutions which did not stoop to let out any part of their buildings. The humble mechanics' institutions, however, could not afford to keep the whole of their buildings in their own hands, and in letting off a portion they came within the law which made them liable to rates. But suppose an institution could let a room for £9, and that would involve the payment of the £10 in rates, the room would not be let, and the £9 would be wasted. The noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) had suggested that they might make this an optional system for literary and philosophical institutions; but what would be the consequence? The result would be to introduce battle into every rating body in the country. They knew that the parochial and other local authorities frequently regarded with jealousy many of these institutions, and considered they were not entitled to exemption, and that they consequently struggled against the law as it now was, and raised all manner of litigation to show that such institutions were not so entitled. He hoped the Committee would not allow a public principle of great importance to be pulled to pieces in detail. The Government were laying the foundation for a new system of local taxation, and in the performance of that duty they were about to bring the property of the Government under taxation. The property of the Government was the property of the people, and, as such, might have strong claims to exemption; but he was afraid that if, in a case like that now before the Committee, they were to perpetuate an exemption so exceptional, there was great fear that they would fail in the main purposes of the work they were about. If philanthropic sentiments were applied in detail they would come to this—that everything that was considered useful or philanthropic ought to be exempted—a man and wife serving the State were most useful and therefore should be exempted. That was the true end of all these benevolent gushes of hon. Members. In 1858 a Select Committee, composed of Members of great authority, investigated the subject, and they reported in favour of all places occupied for charitable, scholastic, or scientific purposes, whether beneficially occupied or not, being rated. He therefore hoped the Committee would turn a deaf ear to the seductive eloquence of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) and maintain a clause which was consistent with the general principles of the Bill.

Sir John Lubbock

MR. CAWLEY said, that it was one thing to lay down the principle that these institutions should be rated, and quite another to say how they were to be rated. There might be a provision that they should be subject to a mere nominal rating. As to there simply being power to exempt ragged and Sunday schools from rating, he could assure the Committee that there was good legal opinion in support of the theory that they could not be rated, but were absolutely exempt. The Preamble of the Act asserted that it was expedient that these schools should be exempt, and the enacting part enabled the overseers to do that which the Preamble recited should be done.

MR. HIBBERT said, a great number of these institutions were perfectly able to pay rates. Among those which had claimed exemption under the Act were the Preston Law Library, the Birmingham Philosophical Institution, the Royal Academy of Music, the London Royal College of Chemistry, the Manchester Royal Institution, the Manchester Society for the Promotion of Natural History, the London Philological Society, the Statistical Society, the Society of Arts, and the Royal Society at Burlington House. None of these could be called institutions for the poorer classes. It was said it would be impossible to rate such institutions, but they could be rated without any difficulty.

MR. R. N. FOWLER saw no reason why the same principle should not be applied to those institutions which were of great value and had a tendency to keep men out of the public-house, as had been applied to the question of education by the Government.

MR. STANSFELD said, the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) was under the impression that all mechanics' institutions were exempted, but that was not the case. The Act said that no place should be rated which was exclusively devoted to the purposes of science, literature, and the Fine Arts; but, according to judicial interpretations of the words employed, if any part of the premises was used as a library, or room for the reading of newspapers and periodicals, &c., the exemption did not apply. He believed there were very few good mechanics' institutions without a library and news-room.

MR. J. LOWTHER remarked that many of the institutions which it was sought to exempt were not local institutions, but belonged to wealthy bodies, and had ramifications all over the country. He wished to ask whether it would be fair, when they were rating national property, that such institutions should be exempt from rating? If they were exempted, then societies which were really national would be supported out of local rates. It would be better that there should be an advance out of the rates for such institutions than that they should continue the mischievous system of exemptions. If it were right that the local rates should contribute towards the support of Sunday and ragged schools, and literary and scientific institutions, the contribution should take the direct form of a rate-in-aid, and not the circuitous form of an exemption.

MR. FAWCETT remarked that the conduct of the Prime Minister and of the Government in allowing themselves to be seduced by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Reed) into exempting Sunday and ragged schools had placed those who honestly and consistently supported the abolition of all exemptions in a position of considerable difficulty. He had never been more surprised than when on Tuesday last the Government surrendered at discretion on the question of the exemption of Sunday and ragged schools without uttering a word of protest. He had just been reading the most remarkable speech that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had ever made, in which he proposed to tax charities, and it presented a strange contrast to the present proposal to exempt Sunday and ragged schools and literary and scientific institutions from rates. The Prime Minister had assigned as a reason for his having surrendered at discretion on the present occasion the fact that he had been beaten by a great majority on the subject three or four years ago. Since that time, however, a very considerable change had occurred. At that time Government property was exempted from the payment of rates, and the necessity for Sunday and ragged schools had not been removed by the establishment of Public Elementary Schools. For his part he could not understand why Sunday and ragged schools should be exempted while voluntary elementary schools were to be rated.

Now that the principle that every child was to have education brought home to it had been adopted, they would be acting not with wisdom but with cruelty in encouraging parents to send their children to ragged schools, by which a stigma would naturally be fixed on them. He regarded the principle of permissive exemptions as most dangerous, and therefore he should vote for retaining the clause.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, he thought the clause was a most irrational one, inasmuch as while it proposed to abolish the old exemption which had been enjoyed by literary and scientific institutions since the sixth year of the present reign, it proposed to retain the modern exemption enjoyed by Sunday and ragged schools. He had voted for the exemption of Sunday schools, in the hope that similar institutions would also be exempt. It would be unfair and illogical to exempt Sunday schools and not to exempt public elementary schools.

Mr. MUNTZ, in reply, said, that the only argument used upon the Treasury bench was the argument ad misericordiam, and that was not worthy of much attention.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 261; Noes 103: Majority 158.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5 (Abolition of exemption under 4 & 5 Fict. c. 48) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Abolition of exemption of property used for Local Government purposes) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Payment of poor rate for Government property, and scheme for defining and valuing the same).

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he wished to make a short statement explanatory of some clauses which he had put on the Paper, and which he believed embodied a preferable scheme to that comprised in the Bill. On the second reading of the Bill he stated that he believed the House was acting hastily in coming to the conclusion that it was for the interest of the community at large that the exemption of Government property should be repealed in so wide and sweeping a manner as was proposed, and that the Government was a little hasty in supposing that the House and the country had brought to bear any serious pressure in favour of so important a change. Some 12 or 15 years ago there were some endeavours on the part of the representatives of boroughs or localities in which Government property was situated to secure the repeal of the exemption of that property; but of late years the House had not heard much on the subject, the fact having been that the action taken by the Government in distributing year by year a sum of money amongst those localities had given a great amount of satisfaction. He thought that in any plan for the settlement of this question they should proceed upon that principle, instead of adopting the objectionable plan now proposed by the Government. He did not see how Government property could be assessed in the ordinary sense of the term, and thought it would be far better to lay down a plan by which Government might make contributions towards the rates. With regard to the question of rating important buildings such as the Houses of Parliament and the Horse Guards, they never were intended to be rated; but he thought that a sum might be set out by the Treasury and the Local Government Board. Any large contribution towards the rates would be adding so much to the value of private property, and he trusted the Committee would pause before assenting to the proposition of the Government.

Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN denied that the existing system gave satisfaction.

Mr. CAWLEY moved, in line 37, to leave out—"Where at" and insert—"From," in order to give him an opportunity of stating his objections to the whole of this portion of the Government scheme. In respect of this part of the Bill the Government had placed upon the Paper an entirely new proposition; but neither in this nor in their former proposal did the Government state how the different classes of Government property ought to be rated. The first proposition was to leave it to Government to prepare a scheme which they were to lay on the Table in the next Session and ask Parliament to affirm, giving an opportunity to the parishes interested to oppose the scheme as a Private Bill, and to incur all the expense and trouble which that step involved. The scheme now on the Paper was little better, and had been suggested by the proposition of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Stone). It was proposed that the different classes of Government property should be rated upon principles agreed on between the Treasury and the assessment committee of the particular parish, and that failing that agreement the matter should be settled by arbitration. But he ventured to say that the arbitration provided by the Bill was simply a delusion, or in plain English, a sham. Arbitration properly so called must be decided by independent parties acting upon principles which were laid down to guide the arbitrators, whose decision should be final. But in each of these essentials the Government proposal failed. In the first place, there were no principles laid down to guide the arbitrators; and in the next place, there was no independence, for the Government retained all the power in their own hands. As to the appointment of an umpire the Government proposition was that, not only when the arbitrators disagree, but at the request of either party the umpire should be nominated absolutely by the Lord Chancellor. That simply amounted to this—the Government said they would go to arbitration, but that the umpire must be their nominee. And further, they might object to the umpire's decision. What value could there be in such a proposition? The Amendment which he had to propose was that the Bill should do nothing more than enunciate the principle that Government property should be rated, and that the Treasury should bring in a Bill which should lay down the method upon which the various classes of Government property should be rated. That, he believed, was the only thing that could be done satisfactorily at present. The simple course for the present was to confine legislation to enacting that Government property should be liable to rates, leaving the Government to bring forward in another Session a measure laying down the principles upon which the valuation should be made.

MR. STONE said, there were no fewer than five proposals on this subject before the Committee—the original proposition of the Government, the series of Amendments which he ventured to place on the Paper, the somewhat similar series of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld), the proposal of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), and that of the hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Slater-Booth). Of these the proposition of the hon. Member for Salford would be the least acceptable to those whom he had consulted. It would be equivalent to an indefinite postponement of the question; or, at all events, till the fresh Act of Parliament to which he referred had been brought in. The proposal besides was of a most unusual kind. It was that the Treasury should cause to be prepared—by some means he did not specify—a measure laying down the principle on which Government property should be rated without the smallest indication of what that principle should be. It was almost impossible to devise a general principle applicable to the great variety of hereditaments now proposed to be brought within rateability. The system which prevailed was entirely destitute of principle. The Government now made a proposal practically identical with one he had himself suggested—namely, that the assessment committee and the Government should each appoint an assessor, and some independent person—say the Lord Chancellor—should appoint an umpire. The decision of the umpire was to be final; except in so far as that Parliament was to have an ultimate voice in the matter; because the right hon. Gentleman proposed to bring in each year, or from time to time, a Bill containing the values arrived at by the umpire, which the House, it was to be presumed, would at once sanction. He must say that in this matter he thought the right hon. Gentleman had acted with great candour and liberality.

MR. W. H. SMITH expressed a hope that the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) would not press the Amendments of which he had given Notice, as the propositions of the Government seemed to be generally satisfactory. He wished, however, to know what the Government proposed to do in one respect. At present there was an arrangement with respect to the Parks under which the Government contributed a sum of money to the paving rate, though the Parks were not liable for poor rates. He apprehended that there would be no desire in rating Government property to the poor to withdraw from that other arrangement as to the paving rate; but he should like to hear from the Go-

MR. STANSFELD said, the Government certainly had no intention of reducing any contribution which they already made to the rates of the metropolis, and the Bill would not interfere with any existing statutory bargains as to contributions towards rates, whether in respect of Government property or of various other public institutions. The proposal of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) would amount to the postponement of the whole subject of the liability of Government property to rates for another year without any certainty that it would be dealt with next year, and he supposed it would not be pressed. The remarks and suggestions of the hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Solater-Booth) deserved the respectful consideration of the Committee. Having himself followed that hon. Gentleman at the Treasury a few years ago he had found there many records and traces of his able, vigorous, and critical supervision of expenditure. He would, however, submit to that hon. Member that Parliament and the country, and certainly the localities interested, would not be content with the simple continuance of the existing state of things, but would expect legislation to be adopted creating a positive legal right on the part of the local communities to rate Government property, whatever method of assessing it might be determined upon. His own original suggestion was that the Government should institute an exhaustive local inquiry into the particulars and conditions of each case, and propound a scheme and place on the Table a Bill on its own responsibility, with schedules containing a list of Government property in the various rating areas, with the assessable value at which it was proposed to rate them. He had also proposed that any assessment committee objecting to a valuation should have a right to appeal to a Select Committee of that House. It was urged that that would put the assessment committee to an expense which they would not be likely to undertake; but he believed, from his official experience, that in almost all cases there would be no practical difficulty in coming to a reasonable and amicable conclusion between the Treasury on the one hand and the local bodies on the other. He had no objection to the principle of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Stone's) proposal of arbitration except one which the hon. Gentleman had himself fairly stated; and if they started the scheme which his Amendments would bring into operation, he thought in the great majority of instances the Treasury and the assessment committee would agree without any reference to arbitration. He proposed that the valuation of the umpire should not be a final valuation, but that it should be inserted in the Bill which the Government was bound to lay upon the Table of the House, and that it should be open either to the Government or to the assessment committee to object to the valuation. In that way he thought a satisfactory conclusion would be arrived at.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he had not much confidence in the appeal to Parliament in reference to the decision of arbitrators, because Parliament would not be inclined to take trouble in the matter; but on the whole, he considered the plan proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) a fair one, and should support it.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he was glad that after many years agitation and remonstrance Government property was to be rated to the relief of the poor. The plan hitherto pursued of making charitable contributions was objectionable, and he was also of opinion that the principle of rating in respect of such property should be that adopted for private buildings and institutions. In that way all complication would be got rid of. With regard to the appointment of an umpire by the Lord Chancellor, he thought that so far as his personal knowledge of a fit person was concerned, they might just as well go into the street and appoint a crossing-sweeper. He must act upon the suggestion of others, and although intentional partiality could not be assumed, it was not reasonable that as a leading Member of the Government he should have this nomination. The first principle of arbitration was that it should be conclusive and final; but here the proposition was that after the matter was submitted to arbitration, after it was agreed that an umpire should be appointed, and after a decision was given, if that decision happened to be against the Government everything went for nothing, and the matter was to be brought before the House of Commons. Nothing could be imagined more complicated and unsatisfactory than such a proposition, while, with regard to the expense, it would be next to terrific. He represented what was called a dockyard constituency, but he spoke for the inhabitants and ratepayers of the parishes. They were not satisfied with the compromise now proposed. They wanted to know why the Government establishments should be placed on a different footing from those of ordinary manufacturers. It professed to be a Bill to abolish exemptions, while the Government exemption was not abolished at all.

MR. CAWLEY said, he was unwilling to throw any obstacle in the way of the new proposal of the Government, and he would therefore withdraw his Amendment. The Government, however, by placing the appointment of the arbitrator in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, were retaining in their hands the power of appointing both arbitrator and umpire. Such a provision appeared to give a character of unfairness to the whole transaction. He should have preferred to give the appointment of umpire to the Lord Chief Justice and the Courts.

MR. SCOURFIELD also thought it would be better to give the appointment of umpire to the Lord Chief Justice.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. STANSFELD moved, in line 17, to leave out from "of the," to "A scheme," in line 29, and insert—

"Same, and where the gross or rateable value has been fixed by an umpire, shall state whether the Treasury assent to or dissent from such value."

"The Treasury shall cause a Bill to be introduced into the House of Commons for confirming every such scheme, and such Bill shall be deemed to be a Public Bill."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MACFIE said, he wished to call attention to a little matter affecting Scotland. Under the Lindsay General Police Act, all persons holding property in burghs were bound to maintain footpaths along their premises, and if footpaths do not exist, to make them. In one or two burghs, and especially in Leith, the question had arisen as to the liability of Government property. At Leith there was a fort belonging to the Government. There was no footpath, although one was needed, and the result was that pedestrians were subjected to great danger. Besides, large pools were formed which caused much unhealthiness. The Corporation had pointed this out to the Government, and had asked them to repair the road in accordance with the Act of Parliament, but the answer was that they were not liable in the same way as other owners. He never thought that interpretation of the law correct, and it certainly was opposed to the spirit of the legislation in which they were now engaged. He would like to ask his right hon. Friend (Sir Henry Storks) whether it was necessary for him to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice?—for his impression was that he would at once say that the refusal had resulted from a misunderstanding, and give an assurance that the necessary work would be done forthwith.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, the attention of the War Office had been called to this complaint in regard to Leith Fort. They had inquired fully into the circumstances, and the opinion was that the Government were not liable as to this footpath, and that the repairs should be carried out by the municipal authorities.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8 (Effect of Scheme), agreed to.

Clause 9 (Alteration of Scheme).

MR. STANSFELD moved, in line 7, after "and," to insert—

"If any differences arise between the Treasury and any Assessment Committee as to the preparation of a new scheme for altering the gross and rateable value of any Government hereditament, or with respect to the gross and rateable value of any Government hereditament specified in any new scheme prepared or proposed to be prepared by the Treasury, such difference shall be referred to arbitration, and all the provisions of this Act with respect to the original scheme and to arbitrations shall apply to such new scheme, and the Treasury shall, if necessary, frame and lay before the House of Commons a scheme in accordance with any award made upon arbitration."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Payment of poor rate for property newly occupied by Government), agreed to.

Clause 11 (Communications with assessment committees, and effect of their petitions as to schemes) omitted.

Supplemental.

Clause 12 (Deductions of rate by tenant of mine) agreed to.

Clause 13 (Exemption of stock in trade).

MR. MUNTZ moved, at end, to add—

“And the words ‘stock in trade’ shall be deemed to include all machines and machinery other than such as are built in the freehold, and that no machinery shall be liable to be rated beyond what is technically called the first motion.”

The hon. Member said, that at present assessment committees adopted different systems of valuation. It was difficult to say what was attached to the freehold. In some parishes that which was nailed was considered to be attached to the freehold, and that which was screwed was not, while in other parishes just the reverse system prevailed. Then, again, some machinery and lathes were very valuable, and some were not. He maintained that everything which was attached to the freehold and engines built into manufactories should be assessed as from what was called the first motion, which was perfectly well understood in all places of business. If there were not some such definition as that which he proposed assessment committees would still be perplexed, and questions would be raised for the Court of Queen’s Bench to determine. He proposed this Amendment to prevent litigation and unfair assessments, and he hoped the Committee would agree to it. He was sorry that there was not a larger number of Members present to consider this important subject.

MR. HENDERSON said, that the present indefinite state of the law with regard to the rating of machinery had given rise to great perplexity and misunderstanding, and thought that it was absolutely necessary that something should be done in this Bill to define the duties of assessment committees and to enable small owners of machinery to understand more clearly the footing on which they stood. If moveable machines, though attached to the freehold, were to be rated, they would have to rate thrashing machines, steam-ploughs, and even sewing machines.

MR. WHITWELL said, he thought the line of demarcation should be this—what belonged to the landlord and was fixed to the soil should be rated; what was moveable and belonged to the tenant ought not to be rated.

MR. CAWLEY said, he did not think this line of demarcation would be a satisfactory one, nor did he agree with the definition suggested by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz). He thought that machinery ought to be excluded as machinery, and that the line must be drawn so as not to extend beyond the moving power and the main shafting. He would insert in the Amendment the words—“All machines and machinery other than that by which the motive power is generated or transmitted.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the difficulty was not in the law, but in the nature of things. The question was one frequently litigated, and one likely to be litigated in the future. The question always was whether the attachment of the object to the freehold was sufficient for a lawyer to say that it was affixed to the freehold. The answer to the question must depend on the nature of the object, the nature of the attachment, and the nature of the freehold; and it was impossible to say beforehand what for this purpose was fixed and what was not fixed. The question could not be answered in the abstract, and was essentially one for experts and one of minute detail. It was a mistake to attempt any definition. At all events, the definition now suggested would fail to work satisfactorily. The object of the clause in exempting stock in trade was to exempt that which it was difficult to rate; but there was no difficulty whatever in rating fixtures.

MR. CAWLEY said, the question of what constituted fixtures, which had been raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman, had nothing to do with the matter immediately under consideration. For his own part, he challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman to do what he had thrown out, and tax all machinery, whether attached to the freehold or moveable. The Government, however, he knew, did not dare to do that. The Amendment which he had placed on the Paper, and which, though having the same object, was, he conceived, better calculated to secure the object of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) aimed at ascertaining what machinery or moving power was attached to the freehold, and to tax that only. He was aware that no form of words could absolutely prevent litigation.

MR. E. POTTER said, if an attempt were made to rate machinery in mills it would be loosened from the freehold in a week.

MR. MUNTZ withdrew his Amendment in favour of that suggested by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley).

MR. CAWLEY moved to add these words—

“and all machines and machinery, whether attached to the freehold or not other than that by means of which motive power is generated or transmitted, shall be deemed to be stock in trade and included in the provisions of the said Act.”

MR. HIBBERT though sympathizing with the object of the Amendment, thought it would produce very grave alterations in the law. Many kinds of property which were now rateable would not be rateable if the Amendment were carried. Moreover, the Amendment would give rise to many difficult questions. For instance, a vat did not generate or transmit motive power, and therefore it would scarcely come under the Amendment.

MR. CAWLEY said, a vat was not machinery.

MR. HIBBERT thought, however, a question might be raised on this point. The Amendment would upset the decisions arrived at by the Courts of Law during the last 100 years, and, besides, its terms were so indefinite, that it would produce a numerous batch of cases involving the question as to what was motive power.

SIR THOMAS BAZLEY said, that by the ancient law of this country, the tools by which a man earned his living were exempted from taxation. The Amendment ran counter to that principle by taxing machinery, and would be as impracticable as it was unjust.

MR. CORRANCE said, he should vote with Her Majesty's Government. He had only risen to express his astonishment at the extraordinary audacity of the proposal.

MR. MUNTZ contended that furnaces could not properly be called machinery, and that machinery was stock in trade.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the object of the Bill was not to increase exemptions, but to withdraw exemption from property which at present escaped taxation. The Government stated at an early period that they had no intention to alter the law of rating, for if once they attempted it they could not finish the Bill this Session. The present section would not alter the law; but the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) would do so very seriously by exempting a large portion of property which was now liable. [MR. CAWLEY: No!] Well, then, if it was not now liable what was the use of the Amendment?

MR. MARLING said, he thought it was reasonable that they should take this opportunity of defining the law somewhat more clearly than it was at present. He would suggest to the Mover of the Amendment the introduction of these words—“All machines and machinery other than that by which motive power is generated and transmitted and attached to the freehold.”

MR. BIRLEY supported the Amendment. The practice of rating in manufacturing districts hitherto had been to rate the steam power and first motive power, and not to rate the running machinery in the mills.

MR. PEASE observed that this Bill, the longer it was discussed appeared more and more like a compact between the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) and the Solicitor General for the benefit of the lawyers. The owners of machinery were pressed between assessment committees on the one hand, and the right hon. Gentleman on the other, and there would be no resource but the Courts of Law.

MR. STANSFELD denied that any purpose existed to create legal difficulties. All the Bill proposed to do was to abolish certain exemptions from rating, and to extend the Act of Elizabeth to certain hereditaments which had hitherto escaped rating. But those who were interested in machinery wanted practically to create a new exemption in its favour. The Amendment if adopted by the Committee, would not, he felt sure, be agreed to by the House on the Report of Amendments. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would withdraw it, and reserve the question for consideration until some more fitting time.

MR. SAMUDA said, the Government were bound to state whether it was intended to rate all machinery or not.

MR. STANSFELD said, he did not intend to touch the present law.

MR. SAMUDA said, that the Courts of Law had given conflicting decisions upon the law, and if it were not intended by this Bill to tax machinery, there should be no objection by the Government to the Amendment. It seemed that the Government intended to put the manufacturers of this country at a disadvantage compared with those of other countries.

MR. HERMON observed that all that our manufacturers desired was that their liability in respect of their machinery should be distinctly defined. As the time had arrived which the Prime Minister had fixed for bringing on another subject, he begged to move that progress be reported.

MR. CAWLEY said, that the proposition of the Government was that because they had only thought proper to introduce a certain extension of taxation the Committee had no right to enter into the question whether certain things should be rateable or not. The hon. Member drew attention to the fact that whereas under the Irish Act only that portion of the machinery was rateable which was used for the production of the motive power, the Bill to amend that Act proposed to render all machinery in a mill rateable, whether used in the production of motive power or not.

MR. CORRANCE said, that if the Amendment were adopted there would be no limit to which it might not be applied. He opposed the Amendment.

MR. STANSFELD said, he thought that the best course would be to report Progress at once.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS— CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR. RESOLUTION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, who had given Notice that he would move "that the Contract for the conveyance of Mails between the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar with the Union Steam Ship Company be approved," said, that he observed that the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had proposed that this matter should be referred to a Select Committee, and to the adoption of that course, as far as he was concerned, he had no objection. He was satisfied that the more this matter was investigated, the more carefully it was looked into and sifted, the more the prejudices which appeared to have collected round it would disappear. But, although he had no objection to the subject being referred to a Select Committee, he did not conceive that the adoption of that course would relieve him from the duty of saying something in support of the proposal he was now making to the House. He would endeavour to compress what he had to say into the narrowest compass; but, as it was in his power to remove some prejudice and misconception, he conceived that he was only doing justice to the cause he undertook to advocate in attempting to do that, even although they might not go to a division that night on the subject, but send it to a Select Committee. Those who might form that Committee, if it were appointed, would not, he thought, object to receive from him, who must and ought to know something about the matter, some little information which might be of use in guiding their deliberations and investigations. He would not go again over the ground he travelled the other night, but briefly state that the Government determined, for reasons which he stated the other evening, that it was desirable to establish steam communication between Aden and the Cape of Good Hope. Having so determined, they, after a certain time, received tenders for that service. They also received another offer of a new proposal for decreasing the period of time for the service which he would call the Western line, between the Cape of Good Hope and England; and in negotiating these matters with the Union Steamship Company they treated the two services as substantially one question, and mixed them up together, believing that they would get the best terms for this country, and also at the same time obtain very good terms for the Cape of Good Hope. The result was that a contract was entered into with the Union Steamship Company, the details of which he stated the other night, and would not repeat, but which he believed would be very beneficial to the Cape and exceedingly economical to this country as regarded the Zanzibar service. Having done that, the Government met with a very considerable disappointment. They found that that which they thought would be so beneficial to the Cape of Good Hope did not meet with the approval of the Cape colonists; and they decided very properly—as an old colonist himself he was the last man to say anything against it—that the true meaning of self-government for the colonies was not to govern the colonies for the colonists, but by the colonists, and that if they objected to the measure as being against them, although not approving their arguments, yet the wisest and most constitutional course was to yield to their wishes; and finding that the contract—which was not now in question—did not meet the views of those for whose benefit it was designed, the Government withdrew it. Still, the main object with the Government was that contract for the service between Zanzibar and the Cape, and the withdrawal of the other contract only threw that question into difficulty. The question arose how they were to deal with the Company which entered into the contract between Zanzibar and the Cape. It was easy, no doubt, to criticize any course the Government might adopt under such circumstances; but some course had to be adopted, and what was it to be? He did not believe the House would think they would have done rightly if they had used the legal power they had, owing to the fact of the two contracts, the Eastern one and the Western one, although both negotiated together, being drawn up separately, and had insisted on the Company performing the one when they had taken away the other. Because it was obvious that the terms they obtained were grounded on two considerations—namely, the one the annual payment of £15,000 to the Union Steamship Company, and the other the extension of their contract to the Western service; and if they took away from it one of those things it would have been inequitable and unjust to hold the Company to the other. Were they, then, to discard the contract altogether, to call for fresh competition and start anew? That, also, would seem to have been exceedingly harsh and unfair. The Union Company had been put to great expense through our failure to carry out the extension of the contract between England and the Cape. They had invested about £350,000 in providing new ships for carrying out the contract. They had been doing the Zanzibar service without any equivalent, but only paving the way or advertizing the future success of the line. And now, when some slight germs of improvement and commerce there were just beginning to show themselves, it would have been most deplorable, in the interest of the suppression of the slave trade, and also a most harsh and cruel thing, if that contract was to be taken away from them altogether. ["Oh, oh!"] Moreover, it would have been very bad policy, because when companies were entering into contracts with the Government, and the Government were notable to answer with certainty as to the decision of that House upon them, that decision, if it were adverse, would leave the companies saddled with a heavy loss; and the result would be that in the end the country would have to pay an increased rate for those contracts. So that a liberal policy was their wisest and truest policy. Once let the companies get the notion that Governments were unsafe parties to deal with, and there would be no limit to extortion. ["Oh!"] The Government would never be certain that Parliament would ratify what it did; and if the burden was thrown on the Company which contracted, the necessary consequence would be that large demands would be made in the shape of insurance to cover that risk. The only other course which seemed to be open to the Government was to go on with the contract, but to make some compensation to the Company for the failure and loss of the Western contract. So far, he could not help hoping that when hon. Gentlemen looked fairly at the matter in Committee there would not be any great difference of opinion. But then there came the question—a most difficult one, on which there arose much difference of opinion—namely, what guide were they to take under those circumstances? If they could not be guided by the old contract, part of the consideration having failed, and if the consideration which remained was obviously inadequate, of what principle were they to take hold as their clue in that matter? On the best consideration they could give, the Government thought the proper principle was to take an offer that had been made by the Company independently of any collateral consideration or any other contract, and make it the basis for obtaining the most moderate terms they could secure. But the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) said, that was not the right course to pursue; that they had a tender from the British India Steam Company, not for £29,000 as was the tender of the Union Steamship Company, but for £16,300, which was made to them; and that fixed the value of the service. The British India Steam Company were willing to do it for that sum, and that sum, the hon. Member (Mr. Holms) said, was the utmost they would pay, and it would be inexcusable to pay more. Now, the answer to that argument appeared to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to be absolutely conclusive. He had laid Papers on the Table which hon. Members had had an opportunity of reading. It appeared that in the Autumn of 1871 the Government were considering the propriety of entering into such a contract. They had not made up their minds whether to do it or not, but wanted information to guide them. They requested the Post Office to obtain that information. The Post Office "sounded," if he might so call it, two Steamship Companies, the Union and the British India, and the result was that the Union Company offered to do it for £29,000, and the sum which the other Company was reported to be willing to take was as low as £15,000. Then, asked the hon. Member, not unnaturally, Why fix the country with the larger and not with the smaller payment? That was just the matter which required explanation. Hon. Members and he were quite at one on that subject. He was unable to give that explanation the other night, and why? Because he was not in possession of it. If he had been he would have given it. He did not think it proper to offer the House a guess or a conjecture. He had waited for absolute certainty, and having got it, it was his duty to state it to the House. The fact was this—The Government requested the Post Office to give them some idea at what rate that service could be done, and they applied to the Union Steamship Company, which stated £29,000. Then the Post Office applied to Mr. Monteith, the Director General of the Post Office of the India Government, for his opinion, and he wrote to Mr. Tilley, the Secretary of the Post Office, a letter—now before the House—in which he said that the British India Company would perform the service for 5s. per mile; not absolutely, however, as those who had read the Papers knew, but coupled with the condition that it should last for 10 years, and should be part of the general service of India. At the time that Company in India was desirous for the renewal of the service they had been carrying on for many years between Calcutta and Bombay, and they took exactly the same view of the subject as was subsequently taken by the Union Steamship Company. That was to say, they did not want apparently to have anything to do with it by itself, but wished to make it the means of getting something else which would enable them to do it for a small sum. The hon. Member for Hackney said that this was an absolute and independent contract. It was no such thing. It was coupled with the condition that they should obtain a renewal of their former contract with the Indian Government. That that was so, was fully evident from the letter of Mr. Tilley, in which he said—

"If you will be good enough to refer to Mr. Monteith's private letter, you will find that the rate is 5s. per mile for ten years' service, as a part of the General Indian Service, and that is the light in which I have always read it."

Well, what happened? The Government were not in a position to accept or reject those offers or suggestions. They had not matured their plans, but they next found the two Companies tendering together, the one for the conveyance of mails from Aden to Zanzibar, the other from Zanzibar to Table Bay. What had happened in the meanwhile they had no means of knowing; but what he had stated was only another proof that the tender for £16,000 was not really an independent tender for the service, from the great facility with which the British India Company gave it up to the other Company, he supposed as not being a thing of very great value. That was the tender that the Government received in June, and it was ultimately accepted, together with a reduction of the tender for the Cape mail.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Hon. Gentlemen seemed to be incredulous when he stated that to be the true construction of the matter, but he would furnish them with evidence that it was. He had that morning received a letter from the British India Steam Navigation Company, whose tender of £16,000 had been condemned by the hon. Member for Hackney. The letter was as follows:—

"13, Austinfriars, London,

"June 18, 1873.

"To the Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

"Sir,—The attention of the Directors of the British India Steam Navigation Company (Limited) having been called to the question which has arisen in Parliament regarding the offer made by them in 1871 to perform a mail service between Zanzibar and the Cape of Good Hope, I am instructed to forward to you the enclosed memorandum, which explains the position of the Company in making the offer referred to.

"I have the honour to remain, Sir, your very obedient servant,

"P. MACNAUGHTAN, Secretary."

The following was the memorandum in question:—

"Memorandum from the British India Steam Navigation Company (Limited).

"1. Mr. Tilley's note of the 11th of June, 1873, referring to the offer of the British India Steam Navigation Company (Limited) to undertake a service from Zanzibar to the Cape, correctly described the position of the Company in the matter.

"2. The offer was to do the service in connection with and as an extension of the Company's Indian services. It was not a spontaneous offer, but rather one made at the request of the Director General of the Indian Post Office. As an independent service the British India Steam Company would not have tendered at all, or at all events not at the rate named, because they were well aware of the difficulties attending such a service on the East Coast of Africa.

"3. If the Company were asked now to undertake this service, they would not be prepared to do so on the terms then named."

[Cries of "Date."] The date was the 18th of June. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen seemed still to be incredulous. Was it that they did not think the Company understood what they themselves really meant, or that they had not stated all the facts in reference to the matter? However that might be, nothing could be more proper than that the entire subject should be inquired into. He did not, however, think it right to let it go to a Committee without stating the grounds on which Her Majesty's Government had acted, and which they conceived to be conclusive against the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney—namely, that the tender in question was a conditional offer made in reference to independent and collateral advantages which were to be secured. The proposal naturally fell to the ground when those collateral advantages ceased, and that part of the question was virtually disposed of. The entire subject, however, was eminently a proper one for inquiry by a Committee, more particularly as it was the House, and not the Government, that should come to a final decision with respect to it. The real question was whether the Government had taken the right course in considering that the Company was entitled to something more in consideration of the circumstances he had stated; and, if so, whether they had fixed that something more at the right amount. He had no objection, therefore, to offer to the proposed reference to a Committee, the lightest part of whose labours would be the investigation of that which the other night made a considerable and unfavourable impression on the House—namely, the circumstances under which the tender of £15,000 came to be made. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That the Contract for the conveyance of Mails between the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar with the Union Steam Ship Company be approved."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. HOLMS moved, as an Amendment, that the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman be negatived. He had thought that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was intended to remove prejudices; but when it was stated by him that the Union Steamship Company sent in a tender for the Eastern as well as the Western Coast of Africa, and that both were to be treated as one, he (Mr. Holms) felt obliged to say that that statement was entirely inaccurate, inasmuch as the Union Steamship Company sent in on the 25th June, 1872, a joint tender with the British Indian Company for the conveyance of the mails from Aden to the Cape.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, No.

MR. HOLMS: If the right hon. Gentleman referred to the Papers he would find that that was so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Not jointly for the whole service, but one for the one part and the other for the other part.

MR. HOLMS said, the tender was absolute and was subject to no condition whatever. That joint tender was accepted by the Government, and arrangements were made to divide the gross amount between the two Companies. The arrangement did not in any way affect the condition of any other tender. Again, in August, 1872, as would be seen by the Papers, the Union Steamship Company asked the Government to reduce the contract for conveying the mails from Zanzibar to the Cape to eight years in consideration of their obtaining an extension of the Western contract. It followed that the right hon. Gentleman could not have himself investigated the question when he said that this was a tender from the Union Steamship Company for both the East and West of Africa. It was clear that the Government had completed their arrangement for accepting the joint tender of the 25th of June, and were beginning to parley about the Western contract. Only on the 3rd of this month the Union Steamship Company had sent to hon. Members of this House a statement, in which they declared that in October last they entered into a contract with the Government for a mail service three times a month between England and the Cape, and another contract for a monthly service between the Cape and Zanzibar. The statement that the two were made dependent one on the other simply vanished into nothing. The Cape colonists surely knew what was advantageous for themselves; but they had declared for months that this was not advantageous to them, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer maintained that it was. In 1863, when the contract for conveying the mails between this country and the Cape was entered into, the Cape colonists were asked for a subsidy, which they were willing to give if the Government would agree that the mails should be conveyed in 36 days instead of 38; but the Government did not agree, and the contract was completed without the subsidy, the postage being raised from 6*d.* to 1*s.* From that time to this the colonists had looked forward to getting a cheaper rate of postage, and yet the Government sought to saddle them with a contract which would not expire until the year 1881, and under which the high rate of postage would be kept up. The right hon. Gentleman asked if it would be fair to hold the Union Steamship Company to the tender of £15,000, if they took away their other contracts. He (Mr. Holms) would hold them to nothing unfair, but the quicker they put the contract up to public competition the better. The right hon. Gentleman asked them to have compassion upon the Union Steamship Company, because they had expended £350,000 on account of these contracts. The truth was that the Union Steamship Company had been forced by the competition with which they were assailed to give better boats and better accommodation, and had they not been able to make the voyage in 30 days they would have been extinguished by other and better boats. At a meeting of the shareholders held on the 17th of October, 1872, the chairman made a speech, the object of which was to show how necessary it had been for the Company to spend money in vessels. He said they commenced with steamers of 600 or 700 tons burden; that they then employed boats of 1,300 or 1,400 tons, and found them as inadequate to meet the growing trade as the former vessels had been, and they had got boats of 2,000 tons, and seven years hence he did not hesitate to say they would require bigger ships if they were to continue to hold their own. This was before the contracts, and did it not throw a flood of light on the position of the Company? The whole of this affair had been a godsend to them, whether they got the contract or they did not. They went into the market when vessels were comparatively cheap; they bought more than they required; and if they were to sell the vessels now they would realize a very considerable profit. The chairman, indeed, stated that the vessels which had cost £500,000 could not be replaced for £100,000 more. That proved that they had got a good sound investment in the vessels which they possessed. If this question was to come down to a point of compensation let them treat the Company handsomely. They had paid over £3,000,000 in compensation to the United States; and if £11,000 was too little for this Company, let them give them more, provided there was just and proper cause for giving them anything at all. But a Company which had had contracts with the Government since 1857 surely knew perfectly well that no contract was binding until it had been passed by the House of Commons. He now came to the most extraordinary portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. He had told the House that the offer of the British India Company was bound up with another, and it was not an offer on which he could found anything; but it would have been much sounder if he had made that reply in June, 1872, instead of June, 1873. What was the position of the British India Company in relation to the Government now? They had contracts on hand, and they did not wish to quarrel with the Government of the day; and they would do what they could to bridge over the difficulty with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. An offer of this kind, not loosely made, in relation to every port between England and Zanzibar, must have received careful consideration at the Post Office, at the Treasury, and at the Colonial Office, where it formed the foundation for that despatch asking the Cape Colonies to give £4,500 in relation to the offer. Could it be said that the calculations of the Post Office and Colonial Office were based upon nothing? The proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, that the figures in Lord Kimberley's despatch were such as nothing could be founded upon was one of the most unbusinesslike that he had ever heard made in the House of Commons. Mr. Tilley, in his letter to the right hon. Gentleman said, that so long ago as 1871 the offer was made, and it was not a formal tender for an independent service, but an estimate on which the Government might treat. The British India Company had accepted the northern route. They were of opinion that it was not necessary to have a subsidy for the service from Natal to the Cape, because there was a good trade already from Natal to the Cape. With regard to the question of the appointment of a Select Committee, everything would depend on the composition of that Committee. No Committee was needed to express a judgment upon the way in which this business had been transacted; the House could give its judgment on that. He thought we might have a Committee to inquire generally into the transactions of the Post Office in relation to mail contracts, and more especially in relation to the private arrangements that were entered into in connection with them afterwards; and he thought the House would perhaps be ready to grant such a Committee by-and-by. As to the Committee which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) was going to propose, he should be glad to hear what the right hon. Gentleman had to say in its favour, and would then perhaps offer some remarks on the subject.

MR. BOUVERIE, in rising to move as an Amendment—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which Articles of Agreement were made on the 7th day of May 1873 between the Union Steamship Company, Limited, and the Right Honourable William Monsell, Her Majesty's Postmaster General," said, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given some explanation of the despatch which had been laid upon the Table since the last discussion and that he had not made a speech like that which he had delivered on the last occasion. With all deference to his position, he (Mr. Bouverie) must say that a speech less calculated to conciliate the judgment of the House, or to persuade it that this arrangement was for the public advantage, he had never heard. The right hon. Gentleman had then to defend what was alleged to be an improvident arrangement, and he told the House that it was the last body in the world that should pronounce an opinion on the contract; that it was subject to all sorts of influences, and that it should leave him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) master of the situation; but the impression produced by the reading of the Papers was that the House would not have liked to have left the contracts in the position in which the right hon. Gentleman would have them placed at his absolute discretion. These were matters which required explanation, and therefore he ventured to put this Notice of Motion on the Paper. Another matter which required explanation was the omission of the Treasury Minute with reference to the last contract. Such a Minute was not a merely formal matter, but it was one of considerable importance. When the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) spoke the other evening he had so much knowledge of the subject that he took it for granted the House had more knowledge than it really possessed, and that it was aware how many contracts there were before the House dealing with this matter. There were three contracts which had been placed on the Table dated the end of last year, one with the British India Navigation Company, and the two with the Union Company, all for different portions of the line. One of these contracts which the House had not been asked to confirm—the service between this country and the Cape—had been withdrawn by the Government. So had the first one for the service between Zanzibar and the Cape. Then came another proposition for the service between the Cape and Zanzibar, to pay for the same service which had been offered for £15,000 the larger sum of £26,000. That was a circumstance which required explanation before the Select Committee. Another fact which required explanation from the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the omission of the Treasury Minute. The House would recollect why it was called upon to sanction these contracts at all, or why the Standing Orders required that a Treasury Minute should be attached to these contracts. It was upon this very matter of mail contracts that one of the most powerful Committees ever appointed by that House sat in 1860. They recommended that the House should confirm mail contracts, and that this Treasury Minute should be attached with the view of preventing blunders and jobs. In the present instance there was, of course, no idea of any imputation of jobbery, and he was sure that his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney would be the first to repudiate any such imputation. But there was, at all events, the appearance of an overt blunder having been committed which should be inquired into. This Company had got the contract to carry the mails from the Cape to Zanzibar for eight years for £26,000 a-year, when seven or eight months before, they were willing to undertake the same duty for £15,000. The hon. Member for Hackney was quite right in saying that these two Companies made a joint tender for £25,000 a-year for two contracts—£10,000 for the bit between Aden and Zanzibar, and £15,000 for the bit between Zanzibar and the Cape. Then appeared this extraordinary circumstance—that the Post Office authorities, when they submitted this offer to the Treasury on October 29, 1872, stated the consideration for which the Union Company were willing to reduce the term of this service to Zanzibar from ten to eight years, so as to make it synchronous with the termination of the Peninsular and Oriental contract, the consideration was that their Lordships should extend to the same period a new mail contract from England to the Cape of Good Hope. They said they had got so favourable a contract at £15,000 that they were willing to reduce the term by two years if only the Government would agree to give them an extension, which they much desired, of the contract between the Cape and England. That extension was given to them; but the contract for it was subsequently abandoned by the Government on the remonstrance of the Cape colonists. The measure then of the sacrifice of the Union Company in this abandonment was not £11,000, to be paid for the service to Zanzibar for eight years by the taxpayers of the country, but it was two years' additional term, which might be added to the £15,000 for the Cape and Zanzibar contract. They were however, now told that this service for £15,000 per annum was such a loss to the Union Company that the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it his duty to sacrifice £11,000 per annum more of the public money to console them for the loss of the extended contract between England and the Cape. It seemed to him that according to the Papers on the Table there was no ground whatever for taking £26,000 per annum as the real value of this contract to the Company when they agreed to give up the contract between England and the Cape. He wished to remind the House that this was not a new class of question. He did not think it desirable that the House should bait the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this question. He felt sure that he had decided according to his "lights," but it appeared from the papers that all the circumstances were not under his consideration at the time. And that was what the Committee on Mail Contracts in 1860 reported to have been the case in regard to the Galway and Dover Mail Contracts. The Committee reported that in making and modifying these contracts it was clear there was a want of concert and of well defined responsibility. The Committee also recommended that new mail contracts should be open to competition; but that as to extensions or modifications of former contracts it was impossible to lay down any rules, and a discretion must be left to the Executive, subject to the control of Parliament. The Committee about to be appointed should apply these rules and recommendations to the present case. It was odd that one of the most prominent Members of that Committee, which was presided over by the late Mr. Dunlop, was the present Secretary to the Treasury, who moved the adoption of the Chairman's Report. The House was therefore entitled to look to him in order to see that the recommendations of that Committee should be fully enforced. It appeared, moreover, that this line was originally started, not for the purpose of offering facilities to trade, but with a view to the suppression of the slave trade. He doubted whether the House of Commons were justified in pursuing these indirect objects by a system of mail subsidies. If the slave trade were to be suppressed it would be much better to do it in a direct manner. The present case was essentially one for a Select Committee; but its Members should not be the holders nor the expectants of offices. They ought not to sit upon the Treasury bench and perhaps should not be ambitious of sitting there. They should be gentlemen capable of forming an independent opinion. There should be one gentleman on each side representing the opposite views on this question, but these two Members should be themselves debarred from voting. A Committee of that kind had been appointed to inquire into the Leeds Bankruptcy case, and other instances of such Committees were mentioned in Sir Thomas May's Book. He thought such Committees had more of a judicial character than ordinary Committees appointed by the House. When the conduct of a Minister or official person was in question it was objectionable to have a Committee composed of his Colleagues, or of those who were supposed to take a more or less official view of the matter. Indeed, this appeared to him very much like taking a jury from St. Giles's to try a pick-pocket. There was an influential element in that House of independent

Members who neither held office nor desired to form an official connection with the Government, but who were men of substance and of brains, and capable of pronouncing an independent opinion on such a question as the present. Therefore, if the House should agree to the appointment of a Select Committee, he would to-morrow or on Monday propose to nominate a Committee of seven Gentlemen to try the question of these contracts, and to name also his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney and some Gentleman on the part of the Treasury as Members of the Committee without the power of voting, in order that they might elicit the facts for the judgment of the tribunal. This, in his opinion, would be a fairer and better solution of the question than the course proposed by the hon Member for Hackney; and he trusted it would commend itself to the fairness and good sense of the House. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which Articles of Agreement were made on the 7th day of May 1873 between the Union Steamship Company, Limited, and the Right honourable William Mansell, Her Majesty's Postmaster General,"

(Mr. Bouverie.)

MR. HUNT said, his right hon. Friend who had just sat down proposed the reference of this subject to a Select Committee, and he understood that the Government made no opposition to that Motion. From the way in which the proposition had been received, he inferred there would be no opposition to such a course. Therefore, he was not disposed to enter into the merits of the question to-night; but there was one point he was rather anxious about, and which he did not think his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie) had quite elucidated—namely, as to the way in which the Committee was to be chosen. There was a recent precedent on the subject. In 1868 it was his good fortune or misfortune to enter into the Cunard and Inman Contract, which in the following year was called in question in the House of Commons. It occupied the attention of the House for a considerable time, and it was ultimately determined that the contract should be referred to a Select Committee. He offered no opposition to that course, and a Select Committee was appointed, but it was nominated by the Committee of Selection. The order on that occasion was that five Members should be appointed by the Committee of Selection and two Members by the House. He had not heard whether his right hon. Friend proposed that the Select Committee should be appointed in that way. [Mr. BOUVERIE: I am quite willing.] He (Mr. Hunt) would propose that the matter should be treated in the same way as was done in the case of the Cunard and Inman Contract.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he did not intend to enter into the merits of the case, especially as the Government had signified its willingness to refer the matter to a Select Committee. But one or two matters had been referred to by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) with regard to which he thought his hon. Friend was in error. He understood the hon. Gentleman to say that the joint tender of the two Companies preceded the offer of the Union Company for the extension of its service.

MR. HOLMS begged pardon. What he meant to say was that the arrangement of the Government for the extension of the Western Contract was entered into after the joint tender of the 25th of June.

MR. CRAWFORD said, the proposal made by the Union Steamship Company for the extension of its services was made on the 12th January, 1872, and it was after that tender had been made, and while it was under the consideration of the Government, that, on the 25th of June following, the joint tender was made by the two Companies for the joint service. He denied that there was any attempt made by the Union Company to take money out of the pockets of the taxpayers; they proposed to remunerate themselves by the extra traffic they would derive.

MR. HOLMS agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) that the Committee ought to be appointed in the manner he had indicated. It should be one in which the House and the country would have the fullest confidence. He would suggest that both the contracts should be submitted to that Committee.

MR. WHITE said, he could not allow the Zanzibar Contract to be referred to a Select Committee without declaring his opinion with regard to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought this evening to have expressed regret for his utterances on the former occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had, in really strong terms, but with the blandness which became him, protested against the character of that speech. He (Mr. White) confessed himself that he had never heard a speech which gave him so much pain as the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when this matter was originally brought forward. For the first time, he felt what must have been the mental torture—the absolute agony of the Prime Minister and of the Secretary of the Treasury—on seeing all the principles which they had so earnestly, so honestly, and so efficaciously advocated, trampled underfoot and treated with contempt by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman told the House he could not help feeling it was much more desirable that the responsibility of entering into Post Office mail contracts should rest with the Government, than that it should be transferred to the House of Commons, because such a transfer would tend to introduce personal solicitation, lobbying, and other practices which he should be sorry to see introduced into this country. He (Mr. White) could testify that the whole course of the policy of the House since he had occupied a seat in it, had been to assert the right to question, revise, and control, all such contracts which successive Governments had made. Owing to ignorance, or perhaps want of forecast, or of information on the part of such Governments, we had existing mail contracts to the amount of £1,260,000 per annum; whereas it was notorious that the service could in all respects be now as efficiently done at considerably less—he believed at less than one-half that cost. He felt sure that, if the right hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), sitting on the right hand of the Speaker as Finance Minister, had given utterance to such sentiments as those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the whole of the Liberal side of the House would have been in a blaze. There would have been one wide-spread feeling of indignation, and he confessed that he himself looked upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer's condemnation of the reiterated and emphatic declarations of the Prime Minister with regard to the constitutional control of Parliament with feelings of abhorrence.

MR. RATHBONE said, that if the Union Company had wished to go on with a contract they might have done so, and, if not, the House would have been perfectly willing that compensation should have been given them for any expense they might have been put to—the matter to have been settled by arbitration. If that were done, the amount which the country would have to pay would not be one-fifth of that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer now proposed.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words 'a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which Articles of Agreement were made on the 7th day of May 1873 between the Union Steamship Company, Limited, and the Right honourable William Monsell, Her Majesty's Postmaster General,' be there added."

MR. HUNT moved to add, at the end of the Question the words "such Committee to consist of Seven Members, Five to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, and Two to be added by the House."

MR. BOUVERIE said, he thought the present was hardly the occasion to raise the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) which was entirely distinct from his proposal. Indeed, if the words of the right hon. Gentleman were added to the proposal, any hon. Gentleman would be entitled to claim that it be divided and the Question put separately. In the course of his remarks he had said nothing about the mode of appointing the Committee, and his sole desire was that there should be one of an independent character. In 1867 in the case of Meer Ali, involving the character of a Member of that House, and in 1854 Committees had been appointed in the way which he had suggested. He thought the best course would be that the right hon. Gentleman should wait until he saw the list of the Committee, when he might move the rejection of any names to which he might object.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he thought the proposal of his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Hunt) was a fair one, and, besides, it was in accordance with the last precedent, when a contract such as that under discussion was referred to a Select Committee. He had heard the name of the probable Chairman and some of the Members of the proposed Committee mentioned since he had come down to the House, and he did not think it expedient that the matter should be arranged in that way.

MR. GLADSTONE said, no one could have listened to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) or of his right hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Bouverie) without feeling that their object was that the composition of the Committee should be perfectly equitable. For his part, he thought that the Government should take as little part as possible in the matter, and that they should be guided by the general feelings of the House. The more agreeable, and perhaps more regular course, would be to take the Motion for the appointment of a Committee first, and next the question as to the mode of its appointment. He presumed that Notice would have to be given with respect to the two modes of appointing the Committee; and believing that his right hon. Friend and the right hon. Gentleman opposite might approximate in their views, he thought great advantage might arise from giving the subject 24 hours' consideration.

MR. DISRAELI: I must remind the House that on the previous occasion referred to—the contract with the Cunard Company—a similar discussion took place, and the same views were expressed, and the House arrived at the result which has been suggested by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt). No doubt we ought to consider the feelings of the Committee of Selection as much as possible; but the objection of the Members of that Committee to appoint in inquiries of this character usually arises from the fact that such investigations are of a personal nature. Now really we cannot say that an inquiry into the conduct of a Department of the Government is to be looked upon as a personal investigation, or that the Committee of Selection would feel that delicate embarrassment which is natural to them when they have to appoint Gentlemen to inquire into the conduct of individuals. The difference is so distinct that I think the House will at once recognize it; but I agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) that in all these cases it is expedient not to act with any precipitation. I do not think the question will at all suffer by being postponed for 24 hours, and I have no doubt we shall then arrive at a decision which will be thoroughly satisfactory.

MR. HUNT said, he would withdraw his Amendment; but he desired to point out that it was similar in its terms and in the mode in which it was proposed to the precedent he had referred to.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA. THE REVIEW IN WINDSOR PARK.

QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND wished to know, Whether it was intended that their Lordships should sit on Tuesday next? The Review at Windsor on that day would not commence till 5 o'clock, and those of their Lordships who intended to be present could not possibly attend the meeting of the House. He wished to know if the Government had considered the probability of their having a poor attendance in the House on that evening, and whether it would not be as well to decide that there should be no sitting?

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he could not answer the Question, but his noble Friend (Earl Granville) would be present before their Lordships adjourned, and would be able to give the desired information.

LORD REDESDALE suggested that there should be no sitting on Monday. Many of their Lordships desired to be present at the Naval Review on that day, which would prevent them attending the House. He should be glad to be informed on that point.

At the close of the sitting,

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA— NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD.

QUESTION.

LORD CHELMSFORD inquired whether it was the intention of the Government to move an adjournment over Monday next, on which day the Naval Review in honour of the Shah would be held.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that there was but one Motion of importance on the Paper for that day. He did not know whether his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) intended to bring it forward.

LORD REDESDALE said, he should certainly do so in the event of the House meeting.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the matter was in the hands of their Lordships. He should be guided by the opinions that might be expressed in reference to it.

No noble Lord rising,

EARL GRANVILLE said, he should make the usual Motion for adjourning till Monday.

ARMY—CANDIDATES FOR COMMISSIONS.—QUESTIONS.

LORD VIVIAN asked, What steps are taken to ascertain the character of gentlemen who apply to be examined for direct commissions in the Army; and whether any, and, if so, what means are taken to prevent those who have been expelled from public institutions from entering into competition? He feared that the system of examination would exclude many excellent men from the Army; but while it did exist he thought it was for the Government to give a pledge that at least it should be so carried out as to insure the best men being obtained. He understood that in a recent examination there were 600 candidates for 80 commissions. Some of the persons who presented themselves were, he was told, very "rough diamonds," who, no doubt, might be knocked into shape in the service. Two of them, he was told, had been dismissed from the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. He hoped that this last statement was incorrect, for it would be strange that gentlemen dismissed—probably for drunkenness or grave insubordination—from that institution, and consequently excluded from the Artillery, should be allowed to serve in the Line. For Line service, men of high moral character, energy, and determination were required; but he feared that such were not the men who were coming in for examination under the existing arrangement. The best thing, he believed, would be to revert to the Commander-in-Chief's List, and to let the responsibility fall on him. He feared that if anybody were allowed to compete, the Army would eventually become unfit for any gentleman to enter.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, in reply to the noble and gallant Lord's first Question, that paragraph 13 of the regulations for first appointments required a certificate of good moral character from the clergyman of the parish in which the candidate had recently resided, or from the head of the College or school where he had been educated during the two preceding years, or some other satisfactory proof of good moral character. As to the second Question, the phrase "public institutions" was ambiguous—he presumed it referred to public military institutions. With respect to them, it had always been the practice to report every case of expulsion from Woolwich to the Commander-in-Chief—in fact, the expulsion could not take place without his authority. Cases of removal, which had always been distinct from expulsion, being the result of some minor irregularity or possibly of inability to comply with the educational requirements of the place, should be similarly reported, and were also dealt with by the Commander-in-Chief. In the two cases referred to by the noble and gallant Lord, the Office papers did not show that any such notification was made at the time—an omission which would not occur again. As to public institutions of a non-military character, His Royal Highness's opportunities of obtaining information were not equally good; but it was in contemplation to insert a rule requiring a candidate to mention the school or place of instruction which he had attended since the age of 12; so that should His Royal Highness think further inquiries into the antecedents of any candidate necessary, he might have full opportunities of doing so. His Royal Highness was now—as he had always been—the arbiter of the fitness of any gentleman for a commission in the Queen's forces, and his facilities for determining it had not been diminished by the changes recently made.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND asked, Whether His Royal Highness had the option of refusing permission to go up to be examined?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE replied, that if His Royal Highness deemed any candidate unfit to serve the Queen, no one could question his right to withdraw him from the competition.

LORD VIVIAN believed the two gentlemen referred to had passed the examination among the first candidates. Would they get their commissions, or could His Royal Highness refuse them as unfit?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, both cases, neither of which were cases of expulsion, were now under the consideration of His Royal Highness.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY asked, Whether the Commander-in-Chief could object to a man who had passed the examination as one of the first 80?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE apprehended His Royal Highness had such a right.

EARL GREY said, that since the responsibility of selecting candidates had ceased to rest directly with the Commander-in-Chief, there was reason to fear that less care than formerly had been exercised. He deprecated the lowering of the high character hitherto borne by British officers, and hoped that in any revision of the Rules it would be distinctly laid down that no man had a right to go up for these competitive examinations who could not satisfy the Commander-in-Chief that he was in all respects an eligible person for admission into the British Army. A written certificate was often of small value, being written very often by a man with little knowledge of the candidates.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, it was a duty of the military authorities to ascertain beforehand, as far as possible, the moral character and general acquirements of a candidate; and he had the power, which he exercised with every discretion, of rejecting any unfit man. It was, however, an extremely difficult and delicate matter to find out the exact character of young gentlemen; and in the two cases referred to by his noble and gallant Friend (Lord Vivian), anything more perfect than they were represented to be could not be conceived. This showed the necessity of great care; and if by accident a candidate's unfitness occasionally escaped discovery, it would be no fault of the authorities, if they could help it, but would be one of the accidents attending competitive examinations. Removal and expulsion were frequently confounded—but, in fact, they were very different things, for the former might be necessary in the interests of discipline for a very trivial offence, and it would be hard to exclude a man whose subsequent behaviour was good from the public service. In other cases removal almost amounted to expulsion and ought to be a disqualification. He regretted the occurrence of these cases, and trusted that in any future case of removal a repetition of this unfortunate error would be avoided.

ARMY—CONTROL DEPARTMENT— AUTUMN MANŒUVRES, 1872— REPORTS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for the War Department Whether any Reports were made by Lieutenant General Sir Robert Walpole, Lieutenant General Sir John Michel, and the Generals commanding Divisions, upon the working of the Control Department during the last Autumn Manœuvres; and, if so, to move an Address for their production. As had been stated at the time they were proposed, the Autumn Manœuvres were designed to serve as schools of instruction and to test the efficiency of every arm of the service. It therefore was important to know whether the Control Department—an important feature in Mr. Cardwell's re-organization of the Army—had proved efficient at at present constituted. What he desired to ascertain was the working of the Department, and whether it was likely to be efficient in time of war as proved by its efficiency in time of peace. The Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, in his interesting Report on the last Manœuvres, had spoken of the whole arrangements as more or less tentative, and had commended the zeal and attention of the officers of the Control Department. But without disparaging His Royal Highness's opportunities of seeing what occurred—he had himself said he frequently knew no more of what was going on than a casual spectator—it was obvious that the Generals commanding the various forces and their Brigadiers could give a more detailed account of the working of the Department than the Commander-in-Chief. The only subordinate officer, however, who in the published Report had been allowed to give his version of the proceedings was Mr. Maturin, a subordinate officer of the Control Department, who, alluding to reports that there had been inconvenient delays on the part of his Department in the supply of provisions and forage said, he had made inquiries which had shown that they were unfounded, and that he had much satisfaction in referring to the "favourable opinion expressed by the General Officers of Divisions, &c., as to the proceedings of this Department." Now, what might satisfy Mr. Controller Maturin might fail to satisfy their Lordships, and it would create a bad precedent to allow a public officer to refer to the opinions of other officers and to refuse the production of those opinions. He hoped, therefore, these Reports would be laid on the Table.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, Sir Robert Walpole and Sir John Michel had reported to His Royal Highness on a great number of subjects, including the working of the Control Department. The Generals of Divisions had also reported to those two Generals, whose Reports, indeed, were founded on those of the General Officers. The object of the Manœuvres—the testing in time of peace the efficiency of our arrangements for war—rendered it necessary that everything should be freely reported upon by the General Officers in command of corps d'armée; but it would be impossible for this to be done with the requisite freedom if it were known to those by whom the Reports were prepared that they would be circulated as public documents. He believed the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief would support him in this view. With regard to the published Report of Mr. Controller Maturin, had he (Mr. Maturin) specially referred to the General Officers' Reports as expressing approval or disapproval of the system of the Control Department, he could not have objected to their production; but this was not the case, for Mr. Maturin's reference was to the efficiency of the Control officers, whose exertions had been spoken of with commendation by His Royal Highness in his Report. Indeed, Mr. Maturin's Report had, in the first instance been appended to that of His Royal Highness and had been published as an integral part of the latter.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND then moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of the above Reports.

LORD CAIRNS remarked that according to this doctrine, Controller Maturin had more power than the Members of Parliament, for no Minister of the Crown could state the purport of a document in the possession of the Government without producing it.

EARL GRANVILLE contended that as a Member of the Government he was at liberty to state that diplomatic Correspondence was in a certain direction without being bound to produce the whole of that Correspondence.

LORD VIVIAN hoped the noble Duke would press his Motion.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE approved the principle of concentrating the great departments of supply; and remarked that many of the difficulties encountered by the Control Department, such as railways and horses, would not arise in time of war. He had heard various complaints showing that the Control Department had not always worked satisfactorily, and he could not see that any disadvantage would accrue to the public service if certain extracts from the Reports of General Michel and General Walpole, and from the Reports of Brigadiers if necessary, were laid before Parliament.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE hoped the Motion would not be pressed, for it was impossible to expect that officers would report frankly and unreservedly if their Reports were to be published; and, moreover, complaints really trifling would be supposed by the general public, lacking the knowledge necessary to judge such points, to be important. He might have been in fault in publishing Mr. Controller Maturin's Report—and there was clearly no more reason for publishing this than the Reports of General Officers. The conduct of the officers of the Control Department was admirable, and no men could have shown more zeal; but there were, no doubt, shortcomings in the system, and many points would require amendment. It was important the shortcomings should be ascertained, in order that they might be remedied, and he believed the Control Department would by degrees be brought into such a position that it would not encounter so many detractors as it certainly did at present.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that after what had fallen from the illustrious Duke he did not think he should be justified in pressing for the production of the Papers; but he was satisfied, from the course of the discussion, that he was quite justified in drawing their Lordships' attention to the subject—particularly as he found it required a great deal of persuasion to induce the Control Department to believe there was any possibility of their having any shortcomings. He had heard that the Control Department had not been a complete success during the Manœuvres, and that statement seemed to be confirmed by the fact, that the Under Secretary for War had declined to produce the Reports upon the subjects—if these Reports had been of a favourable character there would have been no difficulty about producing them. He hoped that for the future any document referred to in a published Report would be produced.

LORD DE ROS said, that half the difficulties of the Control Department were attributable to the want of draught horses, and to the absurd and wasteful plan of converting cavalry horses into draught horses. This was like using blood horses in farming. It was unwise to attempt to save expense in such a way.

LORD WAVENEY said, that the impression produced on his mind was that great care and efficiency had been shown by the Control Department in connection with the Autumn Manœuvres, both in the preparations beforehand and in the actual practice in the field.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE explained that the objection he had taken was to the principle of the production of the Papers—an objection entirely borne out by what had fallen from the illustrious Duke.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn).

ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE

MEMORIALS OF OFFICERS

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Return of the number of officers of the army who have memorialised His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief with reference to their position and prospects consequent upon the abolition of purchase; and for, Copies of all letters from the generals commanding districts forwarding the said memorials."

He had, he said, on a former occasion called attention to the existence of a feeling of discontent among officers of the Army resulting from the manner in which the abolition of purchase had been carried out. He believed, indeed, that he had rather under-stated than over-stated the extent of that feeling. He believed that a feeling of discontent now pervaded the whole Army, arising from the position in which they were placed by that great change. There was not a mess-room in the entire service in which the position of the officers was not freely criticized, and the conduct of the Government commented upon in no very flattering terms. In such an important body as the officers of the Army, it was a most unsatisfactory state of things that that feeling should exist. When he previously brought the subject under the notice of the House, His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief pointed out how the grievances of the officers were to be brought under his consideration. He believed the number of those who had sent in their claims was very large; and it was in justification of what he had stated on a former occasion that he had put his present Motion on the Paper. He did not ask for what the officers said, nor for their specific complaints; but, in the first instance, for the number of those who deemed themselves aggrieved by the alteration of the law. He must observe that there was not a single Member of the Government connected with the War Department during the passage of that Bill who did not, on more occasions than one, point out that the position of the officers was to be no worse than it was before purchase was abolished. Therefore it was but natural, when purchase was abolished and officers found their position was now really worse, that discontent should prevail in the Army. He did not ask how it was proposed to deal with that question; but of this he was perfectly certain that a departmental inquiry would not satisfy the officers of the Army. He ventured to say that nothing would satisfy the officers or the country unless Her Majesty was graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission of inquiry into the subject, composed of thoroughly impartial and competent persons in whom both the service and the public would have confidence. If a Royal Commission so constituted were appointed, and their decision was adverse in many cases to the officers, still the officers would feel that they had had a fair inquiry, and that, however much they might dislike the result, they were bound to be satisfied with it. On these grounds he hoped the Government would recommend Her Majesty to issue such a Commission.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the number of officers of the army who have memorialised His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief with reference to their position and prospects consequent upon the abolition of purchase; and for, Copies of all letters from the generals commanding districts forwarding the said memorials.—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that he was anxious not to withhold from the noble Duke the information which could be legitimately given to him that he would not resist his Motion for the Return.

THE MARQUESS OF HERTFORD said, he had never in the whole course of his long service seen anything like the feeling of discomfort and dissatisfaction which now existed among the officers of the Army. There prevailed a strong distrust of the War Office, not of the Horse Guards, for they respect the Commander-in-Chief and were as well inclined as ever to obey all military authority. When last year Lord Abinger moved in the most temperate manner for an Address to the Crown praying for a Commission to inquire into the case of 600 old captains, who were to be superseded by Artillery and Engineer officers, there was a majority—though he admitted a small one—on that occasion. Nevertheless, the Government ignored that majority entirely, and the warrant came out superseding those 600 old captains. The War Office have now restored 200—or one-third—of those old officers to their proper places exactly in the way the noble and gallant Lord asked to be done—and though it was true that even one-third of a loaf was better than no bread, the officers naturally felt much annoyed and disgusted with the inconsiderate conduct of the Secretary of State. Another small incident which lately occurred also showed what was being done, and how the Army was being taken out of the hands of the Horse Guards and placed under civilians. On the 1st of March last the official Army List was expected. What must have been the feelings of the officers when, on opening The Army List, they saw at its head, instead of the venerated name of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, the name of the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell, Secretary of State? He could only say that his blood boiled to see it, and that feeling, he believed, was participated in by a great part of the Army. Colonel Hart, with the true feeling of a soldier, put the name of Her Majesty as commanding Her own Army, and he hoped that example would in future be followed in official Army Lists. He had no feeling against the Secretary for War. On the contrary, he had a great admiration of many of his qualities, knowing the pains he had taken to make himself acquainted with the Army and to grapple with many difficulties; still he could not but think that the right hon. Gentleman was very ignorant and regardless of the feelings of the officers. The Government would, he trusted, very soon grant a Royal Commission, for he was convinced that nothing short of that would be satisfactory to either the officers or the men of the Army.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND expressed a hope that the Return would soon be laid on the Table. The Session was passing away, and it was very desirable to ascertain without delay the views and intentions of Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE assured the noble Duke that the Returns would soon be in their Lordships' hands, and that a full opportunity would be given them of considering the intentions of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

ECCLIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for amending the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Acts 1840 and 1850, and for other purposes—Was presented by The LORD PRESIDENT; read 1st. (No. 170.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

CROWN SALMON FISHINGS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. ELLICE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is not the usual practice, where salmon fishings on the sea coast belong to the Crown, to offer the refusal of the lease of such fishings to parties interested in the property immediately adjoining; whether the lease of salmon fishings on the sea coast ex adverso of the burgh of Crail is not at present, or has not until lately been in accordance with the said practice, vested in the hands of the municipal authorities of that burgh; whether an application for the renewal of such lease has been peremptorily refused to the said municipality; if so, whether he will state the reason for such refusal, and whether and to whom such fishings have been otherwise privately disposed of; and, whether he has any objection to produce the Correspondence upon this subject?

MR. BAXTER: It has been, Sir, the usual practice, as a matter of courtesy to individuals and of convenience to the Department, where salmon fishings on the sea coast belong to the Crown, to offer the refusal of the lease of such fishings to the ex adverso proprietors, but not, as stated in the Question, to parties merely interested in the property immediately adjoining. The salmon fishings on the sea coast, ex adverso of the burgh of Crail, are at present under lease to the municipal authorities. An application, however, for the renewal of the lease to the municipality has been declined, because it was considered that it would be better for the interests of the Crown and the public to let the fishings, with other adjoining fishings extending for some miles along the coast, to a practical salmon-fisher, the sea frontage within the limits of the burgh of Crail being too narrow to admit of a separate fishery being established there to advantage. The fishings along a considerable extent of coast have accordingly been let to Messrs. Johnston and Sons, salmon-fishers, who at present rent the fishings from the sub-tenant, to whom the burgh let them. It would be quite unusual to produce Correspondence on such a subject.

MR. ELLICE: I want to know, Whether the right hon. Gentleman does not consider that, as a general rule, proprietors of land ex adverso of the sea-shore, ought to have the refusal of the salmon fishing belonging to the Crown on such shore, and that where a different course is proposed to be taken, due notice should be given to such proprietors, in order that they might have full opportunity for representing their cases to the proper Department?

MR. BAXTER: I am not prepared to answer the Question at this moment, though I may say I consider that in this case, ample justice has been done to all parties.

LOCOMOTIVE ACT, 1861—INSPECTION OF BRIDGES.—QUESTION.

MR. HOWARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will state to the House the reasons why a request, made on 21st of April last, in conformity with Clause 6 of the Act of 24 & 25 Vic. c. 70, for an Inspector to be sent to report upon the capabilities of certain bridges in Bedfordshire and Cambridgeshire to carry locomotive engines, remained unnoticed for seven weeks; and, on what grounds, or under the provisions of what Act, the person making the request was required by the Under Secretary to give an undertaking to the Home Department to pay all expenses incurred by such Inspector?

MR. BRUCE: Although, Sir, the Act has been in operation since 1861, this is the first case which has arisen under the section referred to. The delay has arisen from the necessity of ascertaining the facts from the surveyor of the bridges in the first instance, and then of communicating with the Board of Trade as to the appointment of a person to make the inspection. So much time, however, would not have been spent if the applicant had correctly stated the names and addresses of the surveyors against whose notices he appealed. As to the second part of the Question the Act provides, with the view of securing an impartial arbitrator, that the question shall be determined by an officer to be appointed, on the application of either party, by the Secretary of State; but it makes no provision as to the payment of the officer's expenses. The matter is one of purely local concern, and the costs ought to be paid by the parties interested.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHS IN RURAL DISTRICTS.—QUESTION.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is owing to the financial difficulties in the Post Office this year that telegraph works in rural districts which had been sanctioned and promised have been stopped; and, if so, when the public may expect them to be resumed?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, pending the consideration of the questions now before the Committee on Public Accounts, the telegraph extensions in rural districts have been suspended. It cannot at present be stated when they will be resumed.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS—PLATTE BONE ROCK.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT BURY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the buoy which was formerly placed on the Platte Bone Rock, near the Island of Guernsey, has been removed, and, if so, when, and by whose orders; whether the said buoy still appears in the latest editions of the Admiralty Charts; and, whether any notification of the removal of the said buoy was issued by the Admiralty previous to the loss on the Platte Bone Rock of the steamer "Waverley," on the night of the 4th of June?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE in reply, said, that the Admiralty had no jurisdiction over buoys, except in the case of the dockyards. The buoy in question had been removed at the suggestion of the local authorities, inasmuch as it had so frequently been washed away, that there was no reliance to be placed on it. The removal of the buoy was notified to the Admiralty on the 26th of May, before the loss of the Waverley, and it had been replaced by beacons, and that was all the information he was possessed of on the subject. Notice of the change had been given to the channel pilotage.

LAW OF HOMICIDE—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce this Session a Bill to amend the Law of Homicide in general, or that portion of it which relates to Infanticide?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that a Bill on the subject was prepared and he should be very glad to introduce it. It would not be well to do so, however, he thought, unless there was some probability of passing it, and as to that he could say nothing with certainty in the present state of Public Business.

FRANCE AND BELGIUM—EXAMINATION OF TRAVELLERS' LUGGAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to the recent Convention between Austria, Italy, and Germany, abolishing the visitation of passengers' luggage at their respective frontiers; and if Her Majesty's Government would consider the propriety of extending this convenience by similar Conventions with France and Belgium?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I believe, Sir, that a notification has appeared in the newspapers, to the effect that a Convention has been made between Austria, Italy, and Germany, abolishing the visitation of passengers' luggage at their respective frontiers; but no communication has been made on the subject to Her Majesty's Government from the Governments of the countries in question with respect to its provisions. Under those circumstances I could not undertake to say whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to make any proposals on this point to the Governments of France and Belgium.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to move that the House do adjourn this day at the close of the Morning Sitting, said, it might be convenient, as some portion of the House might desire to attend on Monday and Tuesday next, that he should state what was the Business which it was proposed to take on those days. It was proposed to proceed with

Committee of Supply, taking the Army Estimates first on Monday, and secondly, the Education Vote; after that, if there was time, with the Lords' Amendments to the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill, and the Valuation (Ireland) Bill. On Tuesday morning it was proposed that they should proceed with the Intestacy Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King), the principle of which had been already sanctioned by the House, and which now stood for Second Reading; then with the Canada Loan Bill the Valuation (Ireland) Bill, if not disposed of on Monday night, and the Juries Bill.

Moved, "That this House do adjourn this day at the close of the Morning Sitting.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had shown every desire to suit the convenience of the House; but he thought it would be well not to take the Army Estimates on Monday, as many hon. Members who would wish to discuss them would not be able conveniently to attend on that day. He would also put it to the right hon. Gentleman, whether he would not reconsider his proposal to take a Bill of such importance as the Intestacy Bill on Tuesday morning?

MR. NEWDEGATE asked when the Judicature Bill would be again submitted to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) that it was a choice of evils on the part of the Government, who would be very sorry to inflict inconvenience on any hon. Gentleman in the discussion on the Army Estimates. But as the greatest happiness of the greatest number was the rule of action generally, so the smallest unhappiness of the smallest number was the rule which the Government endeavoured to adopt on this occasion. It was on that ground that they had come to the conclusion that the Army Estimates would be best discussed on Monday. With regard to Tuesday, there was the Judicature Bill, which might go into Committee, and the Juries Bill, the Committee on which might be continued, but with respect to which he was confident that the difficulty raised the other night with respect to local taxation had been removed out of the way. The observation of the Government had been, that both these Bills were measures in which a large number of the House took an interest, and the discussion of which they would desire to attend; and the Government had endeavoured to arrive at the best judgment they could.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON again expressed a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would not proceed with the Army Estimates on Monday.

MR. MONK said, he trusted that the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill would not be brought on after 12 o'clock, or at an hour when it could not be discussed.

MR. BRUCE said, it was the intention of the Government to bring on the Bill at such a time as would enable the House to discuss it.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he did not object to the Order of Business on Monday, but he objected to the arrangement which had been made for Tuesday.

DR. BALL said, he strongly objected to proceeding with so important a Bill as the Intestacy Bill on Tuesday morning.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he should be glad to receive any suggestions from hon. Members. Perhaps it would be more agreeable to the House if he were to propose to take the Canada Loan Bill first on Tuesday and the Valuation (Ireland) Bill second, and if the two measures did not consume the whole day they might then perhaps proceed with the Juries Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That this House do adjourn this day at the close of the Morning Sitting.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)

BILL—[Bill 146.]

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Guichen, Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 13 (Exemption of stock in trade).

Question again proposed, "That the words

"and all machines and machinery other than that by means of which motive power is generated or transmitted, shall be deemed to be stock in trade and included in the provisions of the said Act,"—(Mr. Cawley.)

—be added at end of clause."

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. F. S. POWELL rose to move, as an addition to the Amendment, the following words:—"In the case of any mill or manufactory or building used for any such purpose." He said the Amendment would bring the law of England into harmony with that of Ireland, and that was a thing which was extremely desirable.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

After the word "and," to insert the words "in the case of any mill or manufactory or building erected or used for any such purpose."
—(Mr. Francis S. Powell.)

Mr. STANSFELD said, he thought it was desirable that the Committee should know exactly their position upon the question immediately at issue. There seemed to be an impression in some minds that the 13th clause altered the law, and in some respects narrowed the exemption of stock in trade. The simple effect of Clause 13, however, was to repeal the 2 & 3 Fict., c. 87, s. 2, which made the exemption of stock in trade temporary, thus leaving it a permanent exemption. The result was, as he contended, that the Bill before the House did not alter the present law of rating machinery, while the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), modified, as it would be, to some extent by that of the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. F. S. Powell), would really alter the law and introduce changes the results of which could not be foreseen at present. He would be very sorry indeed to vote against the Amendment, because he wished to be in no way committed against its object; but it was surrounded at present with difficulties which would require the most careful consideration, and if the Amendment was pressed to a division, he would be compelled on the part of the Government to oppose it, because he could not pledge the Government to the terms suggested, though at another time his mind would be open on the subject. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend would be content for the present to leave the question an open one. He urged that more especially, because the Amendment was really foreign to the immediate object of this Bill.

Mr. CAWLEY said, he could not consent to withdraw his Amendment, which he considered to be directly germane to the object of the Bill, and if the question was to be settled at all that was the proper time to do so. His Amendment was nothing more than an attempt to define what was and what was not stock in trade, and to explain an apparent contradiction of the law. A man was rated in respect of his occupation of an hereditament, and the Courts had held that the hereditament was to include whatever was attached to the freehold. The exigencies of commerce, however, had introduced machines which required attachment in order to give them stability, and hereupon the Courts held that machinery affixed to the hereditament by a large bolt was rateable, while a loom screwed to the floor was not an attachment to the freehold, and was not rateable. He did not wish to throw obstacles in the way of the progress of the Bill, but unless it was distinctly understood that the whole question should be fully considered, and a discussion allowed on the Amendment, or addition to the clause on the bringing up of the Report, he felt bound, in honour to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, to take a division at the present stage.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL believed that the effect of the Amendment, of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) if carried, would be to introduce great confusion in the administration of the law instead of to simplify matters. As the law now stood, it was not the machinery that was rated, but the whole of the property as enhanced in value by the machinery—the fixed machinery. The Amendment proposed to get rid of all that. ["No, no!"] It was proposed by the Amendment to rate "all machines by which motive power was generated or transmitted." It was said that the object of the Amendment was to make clear what machinery or portions of machinery should be rated; but it was difficult, if not impossible, to lay down any distinct rules on the subject. The question was one not so much of law as of fact, which must be decided on its merits in each case.

Mr. STAVELEY HILL thought some better rule should be laid down as to what machinery was and what was not rateable. It was not fair towards either the Courts or the ratepayers that matters should be left as they were, for the present state of the law was as bad as it could be. The rule proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) would be a great improvement. No less machinery would be rated under it than was rated at present.

Mr. WHITWELL hoped the question would be deferred till the Report, in order that some better definition might be introduced.

Mr. LOPES would vote against the Amendment. If the words proposed by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) were merely intended to define stock in trade, they were wholly unnecessary; but if it were intended by these words to exclude machinery fixed to the soil, which, although it was not rateable per se, was rateable indirectly, because it enhanced the valuation of the soil, then it was a most objectionable proceeding, seeing that the main object of the Bill was to extend the area of rateability.

Mr. BRISTOWE hoped the Government would not under any circumstances listen to the suggested Amendment, which, instead of simplifying the Bill, would complicate matters ten times over, and land them in insuperable difficulties. He could not see how the generating or motive and transmitting power was always to be determined with a view to rating as in the case of steam power, waterwheels, windmills, and so forth. If the proposal were unfortunately sanctioned, it could not be worked or carried out by any human being.

Mr. HERMON suggested that the Bill should be proceeded with with caution, and not hurriedly, for as it was a money Bill, it could not undergo revision in the other House. He hoped the Government would accept the Amendment which was now before them. He was quite prepared to admit that certain kinds of machinery should be rated, but the power to rate machinery ought not to be carried to such an extent as was contemplated, which would include every little thing down to the minutest points of detail.

Mr. ANDERSON supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford as being calculated to assist the operations of assessment committees.

Colonel BARTELOT said, that having carefully considered the Amendments of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) and the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. F. S. Powell), and remembering that the object of the Bill was to extend and not to decrease the area of rating, he was opposed to both of those Amendments. Though he had voted for exempting Sunday and ragged schools, he almost regretted having done so, as he thought it would be much better that the Bill should contain no exemption whatever.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, that, looking largely at the question, the great motive which had impelled the movement for a change in regard to local taxation had been the complaints of the owners of real property with respect to realty being rated as against the vast personal property of the country which was not rated. Undoubtedly it was a most extraordinary application of the doctrine advocated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) to say that when the complaint was that the range of rateable property was too narrow, they should proceed to narrow it further. They could not narrow the range further consistently with justice to the owners of real property. The strength of the Amendments consisted in this — that there was a great difficulty in the application of the law as it now stood; but would those Amendments answer the purpose of removing that difficulty? In his opinion, the Amendments of the hon. Member for Salford and of the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. F. S. Powell) did not even touch the case, and would create a great deal of confusion and difficulty in the application of the present law. There was no doubt great difficulty in drawing a line of demarcation between fixed machinery which was rateable, and machinery which was not fixed and which was not rateable. The difficulty was one, however, which could not be settled by the present Bill. Moreover, he contended that it was an entire mistake in conjunction with this Bill to endeavour to supply a clearer definition. They had declared that Sunday and ragged schools should be exempted from rating, but they had not attempted to define a ragged school, and he was informed that the question as to what constituted a ragged school had been made the subject of a contest in a Court of Law. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford assumed that stock-in-trade was exempted because it was a proper subject for exemption. That was not the ground of its exemption. The Government had exempted stock-in-trade, because it was impossible to catch it; and if the Amendment touched a description of machinery which it was possible to catch—and it had been proved that it was possible to catch it, because it was already rated—in what sense could they contend that it ought now to be exempted? That being so, the Government would give to the Amendment the most decided opposition.

Mr. PEASE pointed out several anomalies which existed in the present system of rating, and said they must be dealt with by the Government sooner or later, and he thought the sooner they were dealt with the better it would be.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, he was strongly in favour some days ago of sending the Bill to a Select Committee, and what was now happening convinced him, that that course ought to have been adopted. Points such as those which had been recently raised were not of a nature to be decided by a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HENLEY said, it would be a fortunate thing for everybody but the members of the legal profession if the clause and all the Amendments were got rid of together. The Judges had lately been paying Parliament very handsome compliments for the manner in which they carried on the work of legislation, and it seemed to him that that clause would form another blessed example. In his opinion, they could have gone on quite well with an annual Continuance Bill, and then this question would not have arisen. He certainly should decline to vote for either of the Amendments, because he believed that if they were adopted, they would only make confusion worse confounded.

Mr. HENDERSON said, assessment committees appeared to act on the principle that all machinery was rateable, and urged that it would be well if a remedy were provided for the evils of the system.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question put, "That the words

'and in the case of any mill or manufactory or building erected or used for any such purpose, all machines and machinery other than that by means of which motive power is generated or transmitted, shall be deemed to be stock in trade and included in the provisions of the said Act, be added at the end of Clause 13."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 227: Majority 150.

Mr. PELL said, that as he understood there was to be no passage through Temple Bar after half-past 8 o'clock, and as his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Corrance), who had an Amendment on the Paper, had informed him that if he went on, he must speak for an hour, he thought the best thing he could do would be to move that they report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress."
—(Mr. Pell.)

Mr. GLADSTONE trusted the hon. Gentleman would not persevere with his Motion, because the Committee had at present a very good and sufficient attendance of hon. Members. If the number should be much reduced, the Government would consent to report Progress.

Question put, and negatived.

Sir GEORGE JENKINSON moved, as an Amendment, in line 13, after "perpetual," to insert—"in so far as it applies to stock in trade only, but not to any other description of property." Its object was to limit the perpetual exemption from rating to stock in trade, and not extend it to other descriptions of personal property.

Mr. STANSFELD said, he had looked carefully into the Acts, and could not accept the Amendment, which would have a different operation from that which the hon. Baronet intended. The House had already decided not to render personality or the general ability of parishioners liable to rating; and it was not desirable to go back to this already decided question.

Mr. LOPES said, the Amendment would impose a liability to rating upon every description of personality other than stock in trade. He could not therefore support the Amendment.

Sir GEORGE JENKINSON did not want the Committee to say affirmatively that any kind of personality should be subject to rating, but only to say that the rating of personality other than stock in trade should not be perpetual.

Lord JOHN MANNERS said, the Amendment, if carried, would necessitate the passing of an annual Bill for the exemption of all personalty except stock in trade.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CORRANCE, in rising, according to Notice, to leave out the clause altogether, said, he believed it to be vexatious to certain classes and unnecessary. By the Bill, law and custom were strained in order to bring things into taxation that had always been exempted. The question must become a class question at the ensuing Elections, and he urged on the Government to let it stand over until the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to introduce a general measure on the subject.

MR. STANSFELD defended the clause, which was necessary to prevent the absurdity of an annual Bill dealing with exemptions.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 77: Majority 51.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

House adjourned at half after Five o'clock till Monday next.

ARMY—HALF-PAY OFFICERS—"THE ARMY LIST."

QUESTION. ORDER.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE desired to ask the Under Secretary for War a Question of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Why the General Officers on half-pay of their regimental commissions had been displaced from their usual position in The Army List, and placed among officers of greatly inferior rank. It happened that he was one of the unfortunate persons so treated; and he at first supposed himself somehow, without sentence of court-martial, cashiered; but, after looking vainly through 747 columns of officers' names, he came to a retired Lieutenant of Marines, and on the following page found the names of himself and officers of much greater merit. Half the half-pay officers were mentioned in the natural place, and he was at a loss to know why the alteration had been made?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND rose to Order. Although he was very unwilling to interpose between the noble Earl and the House, still he could not help venturing to remind the noble Earl that it was an understanding between the two sides of the House—and a very good and useful understanding—that no matter of importance should be brought forward without public Notice given, except in cases of great emergency. The question to which the noble Earl had commenced to allude was one of importance, but it was not one of sufficient emergency to require the dispensation of the usual Notice. Many of their Lordships would probably like to say something on the subject, and it was only right that they should get notice of its introduction. He confessed that he was one of those who would like to have the opportunity of discussing this and similar proceedings of an unprecedented character, which had been the result of recent arrangements of the War Department.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he concurred with the noble Duke who had just spoken in thinking the matter one of importance, and that the most convenient course would be to give proper Notice of the Question.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE was altogether in the hands of the House. If the noble Duke or any other of their Lordships with less nervousness than himself would make a substantial Motion respecting the subject on the Paper it would receive his support. But he might, perhaps, be allowed to just remark—

EARL STANHOPE: I desire to appeal to your Lordships on behalf of the rule which we all have from time to time found so convenient. It is of great importance to both sides of the House that this rule should not be departed from except in cases of great urgency. I remember that on one occasion many of your Lordships were deprived of an opportunity of joining in an important question in connection with the Alabama Claims merely because there was only a private Notice given, and the Peers in general had no idea of the intended object when the Mover rose.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE concurred in all that had been said in support of the rule of the House which required Notice to be given of all Questions:—but as private Notice had been given to him, and the inquiry had been made, he thought he might as well reply to it at once. The reason why the names referred to had been removed from the place they had hitherto occupied in The Army List was this—When The Army List was revised it was thought desirable to keep the effective and the non-effective portions of the Army separate, and in the new arrangement the General Officers on half-pay were placed at the head of the list of Non-Effective Officers. This arrangement was adopted on the authority of the Secretary of State for War and with the concurrence of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief.

(The Lord Romilly.)

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^d (according to Order) with the Amendments.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved Amendments by which "burial places" and sites for parsonages disconnected from churches were included among the purposes for which land might be conveyed.

Clause 6, which declares the Act not to extend to Scotland or Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved to omit the words "or Ireland."

LORD HATHERLEY (for Lord Romilly) assented to all the Amendments except this which proposed that the Bill should extend to Ireland. That was an entirely new proposition, and to bring it forward now on the last stage of the measure was not judicious. Besides, it was not known that this Bill would be acceptable to the people of Ireland. He believed that this Amendment would endanger the passage of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not wish to press this Amendment in opposition to the noble and learned Lord, although he did not see that there would be any objection or difficulty in applying the Bill to Ireland.

Amendment withdrawn.

Other Amendments agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CHILDREN'S EMPLOYMENT IN DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BILL.

(The Lord Buckhurst.)

(NO. 162.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD BUCKHURST, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that last Session he introduced a Bill similar to the present, and it was read a second time. He was afterwards induced to withdraw it, partly because the lateness of the Session afforded but little chance of its being considered and passed by the other House but chiefly on the representation of noble Lords that as drawn it might have the effect of interfering with athletic and gymnastic exercises generally. In order to avoid that difficulty the present Bill had been so framed as to be applicable, as far as could be secured, only to children under 12 years of age, and to the employment of such children in any muscular exercise or any performance practised or given by way of trade or for the purpose of gain, whereby limb or life or health of such child might be endangered or injuriously affected. In various parts of the country, as well as in the metropolis, young persons and very young children were constantly employed in performances which exposed their lives to considerable danger. The noble Earl read newspaper reports of some of these performances. One described a performance which had taken place in a music-hall in the Metropolis, where a child about six years of age performed various feats with astonishing coolness and striking neatness and quickness, on a trapeze, suspended from the ceiling, at what most people would call a dizzy height. The little fellow also went through a ceiling-sible for anything unsatisfactory that had occurred.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON hoped that the Correspondence would be laid upon the Table so that it might be properly considered before the close of the Session.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, 'till to-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

EAST AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE— TREATY WITH THE SULTAN OF ZANZIBAR.—QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN (for Mr. KINNAIRD) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a Treaty reported to have been received and signed by the Sultan of Zanzibar on the subject of the East African Slave Trade, is the Treaty offered to the Sultan under instruction from the Foreign Office by Sir Bartle Frere, or whether it differs in any important particular from that Treaty?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, no Copy of the Treaty as signed has yet been received at the Foreign Office; but Dr. Kirk reports that it contains a stipulation, of which he was directed to obtain the insertion, with a view of making the Treaty as originally presented to the Sultan of Zanzibar by Sir Bartle Frere more effectual for the object for which it was concluded.

Earl Granville

ARMY—THE DUKE OF YORK'S SCHOOL.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES DILKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any foundation for a statement that has recently been made by some newspapers, that Her Majesty's Government are considering a project for removing the Duke of York's School to the country, and converting the buildings into barracks for Cavalry and Artillery?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, it has long been in contemplation to remove the barracks from Knightsbridge, and various places have been proposed to which they might be removed. The Royal Commission on Military Education recommended the removal into the country of the Duke of York's School, and that has given rise to a suggestion that the site might be made available for the purpose in question; but no plan of the kind has been adopted by the Government.

POST OFFICE—GENERAL POST OFFICE, EDINBURGH—SALARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. MILLER asked the Postmaster General, If he will explain to the House why the clerks and other officials in the General Post Office, Edinburgh, have not had their remuneration increased as has been done in the case of the officials in the Post Offices at Glasgow and Dundee; and, seeing that the Secretary of the General Post Office at Edinburgh is performing the duty of Inspector of the Southern district of Scotland, so that the duties of Secretary have in part, if not all, to be performed by a clerk, whether it is the intention of the Postmaster General to appoint an Inspector of the Southern district, so as to relieve the Secretary of that duty, and admit of his full attention being given to his special duties as Secretary?

MR. MONSELL: A report, Sir, is about to be made to the Treasury with respect to the wages of persons in the Edinburgh Post Office who correspond to those employed at Glasgow and Dundee; but I am not prepared to recommend a general increase of salary throughout the establishment. As the present system works satisfactorily, it is not my intention to appoint an Inspector for the Southern District of Scotland.

BRAZIL—CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any progress is being made in the settlement of the claims of British subjects upon the Brazilian Government.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the latest Reports from Rio do not, I regret to say, hold out very favourable prospects of an early settlement of the claims of British subjects upon the Brazilian Government. By the last mail, Mr. Mathew, Her Majesty's Representative at Rio, has been instructed to continue to press for a speedy settlement of these claims.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

QUESTIONS.

MR. SCOURFIELD asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If the amount of increased accommodation demanded in Elementary Schools where greatly in excess of the number of children who can be expected to attend, even when compulsory bye-laws could be enforced, especially in parishes where the population according to the Return of the late Census is declining, is in accordance with the provisions of the Elementary Education Act?

MR. W. E. FORSTER in reply, said, that nothing could be more clear than the provisions of the Education Act—that school accommodation should be provided in every district for the children in that district. It was the duty of the Department to ascertain what was the accommodation required, and in doing that the circumstances of each district must be taken into account. The Act provided means by which any district which thought a wrong decision had been arrived at, might appeal against such a decision and demand public inquiry; no such inquiry, however, so far as he knew, had yet been demanded. There were two cases mentioned by his hon. Friend. One was, the case of the number of children who could be expected to attend even when compulsory bye-laws could be enforced. That he could hardly answer definitely, unless he knew what kind of expectations might be entertained. The second case was, that in which there was a decline of the population. That was a point which the Education Department had taken into account, as well as the opposite one—where an increase might be reasonably expected.

MR. SCOURFIELD: When a public inquiry is demanded have the party asking for the inquiry to pay the expenses?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have not got the Act by me. I believe there is a provision on the subject.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— GENERAL VALUATION (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. VANCE said, that it would be inconvenient to Irish Members if this Bill were put down for to-morrow.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, that important business relating to England, which had been fixed for to-morrow, had been adjourned to a subsequent day, and he objected to business which was deeply interesting to Irish Members being fixed for to-morrow.

MR. GLADSTONE said, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would attend the sitting to-morrow, he would find that business of great importance both to England and Ireland was fixed for to-morrow—namely, the Canadian Loan Guarantee Bill.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS— CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR. QUESTION.

In reply to Lord JOHN MANNERS,

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not intend to propose that the Orders of the Day should be postponed to allow the Motion of which Notice had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) to be brought on, for the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry with reference to this subject. As no Notice had been given of any opposition to the right hon. Gentleman's Motion, he had been under the impression that no objection would be offered to the names intended to be proposed by his right hon. Friend. If objection were taken to those names, of course the subject would not be brought on at a very late hour.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

£389,000, Control Establishments, Wages, &c.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT said, that considering that to be one of the most if not the most important Vote in the whole of the Army Estimates, he wished to make it the subject of a few remarks. They should be brief, as he feared to do more would be a mere waste of time, as the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Office did not appear inclined to make any alteration in the department, about which so many complaints were made, nor did he seem disposed to allow the country to know what was its precise working. He (Major Arbuthnot) felt it his duty to protest on this and every other occasion against things being allowed to remain in their present unsatisfactory condition. Two years ago, he gave Notice of a Resolution on the subject. At that time, preparations were in progress for the Autumn Manœuvres of 1871, and he determined not to move in the matter at the time, as he wished to give the Department the fairest possible trial, and that determination had met with general approval, the principal organs of the Press admitting that he had hit upon a branch of the military service which was a weak point in that service, for which the Government was responsible. Indeed, The Times newspaper in an article dealing with military questions, at the close of the Session expressed its approval of the course he took, adding, that "the postponement of his Motion would afford reasonable time for the mature deliberation of the Government, and at the same time enable the subject to be thoroughly discussed." How had that been fulfilled? The Government might have maturely considered the question, but they had made no changes, and there certainly had been no discussion on the subject. Last year, when he made a Motion for inquiry, and notwithstanding the difficulties which were in his way, owing to the late period at which he was enabled to come on, he was told by some of his Friends who heard him that he had made out an unanswerable case; but, however that might be, it certainly had not been answered. The right hon.

Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance made some observations, to the effect that the Control department was formed on the recommendation of Lord Strathnairn's Committee. In reply he would only say that he had Lord Strathnairn's personal assurance that his reason for objecting so much to the Control department was, because it violated what he considered vital principles laid down by the Committee over which he presided. Then the right hon. Gentleman supported the principle of interchangeability among subordinates; in fact, he openly and avowedly advocated the theory that one day a Control officer might have charge of bread and beef, at another time of complicated military stores, and at another time have under him men and horses and be administering military law and discipline. If that principle were acted on we need hardly seek further for a sufficient cause of total inefficiency. The right hon. Gentleman also said that General Officers had reported favourably of the system. Now, he had never yet found a general officer who praised the Control department as it at present existed, and he did not know that he had ever heard one defend it. After a debate on this subject, also in "another place," he did not think the right hon. Gentleman could fall back upon the reports of General Officers for the defence of the department, for the Government had refused to produce the reports of the General Officers respecting it at the Manœuvres, on the ground that they would produce bad blood. The illustrious Duke who made that statement added that not a word could be said against individuals; and he (Major Arbuthnot) was ready to endorse that statement, because from all quarters it appeared that the Control officers had worked with the greatest zeal and energy. What then could have been the tenor of their reports except a condemnation of the system. There were two points on which he wished to say a few words, because they involved great questions of principle. Those points were, the absence of any reserve or any system for the expansion of the Control department, especially the transport, and the non-existence of any system of utilizing local resources. To prove the first point, he need only refer to the Returns which had been recently circulated, which showed that after having brought in detachments from every part of England and Ireland, and after calling on the Artillery to perform the duties which ordinarily devolved upon the Control at Aldershot, Dublin, and all the principal garrisons, they were able to place in the field only 630 Control horses and 714 Control drivers, whilst the combatant branches furnished 641 horses for transport purposes, and 743 drivers. Besides those, there were 273 hired horses and 137 hired drivers, and 2,030 horses were bought and subsequently sold. That showed that after several months' preparation, the transport service was equal to moving only about one-half of the Army placed in the field for the campaign, or in other words; a force of something like 15,000 men, and even then, it must be remembered, too, that not more than one-half the duties which would devolve upon the department during war had to be performed during the Manœuvres. The supply of the munitions of war did not enter into the question at all, and, as regarded the supply of food even to the Army, the strain upon the department was not very great. Much of the work that would devolve on this department in war was performed by contractors, while the regiments were, to a large extent, supplied with food by means of the canteens, and most of the officers provided themselves privately. These facts led him to believe that these Manœuvres, if they were intended to be a rehearsal of what would be done in time of war, or to test the capability of the transport department, showed that that department fell very far short of the mark, and that the expenditure was almost an unnecessary one. It was absurd to suppose that in time of war we could break up the artillery dépôt, the only means, miserable as it was, of expanding our field artillery we possessed; nor could we take men and horses from our attenuated regiments, and battalions for that purpose. The system now pursued was merely robbing Peter to pay Paul. It was a policy of makeshifts which General Trochu had denounced before the Franco-German War, and which probably accounted for much of the disorganization then existing in the French Army. Then, as to the question of the utilization of local resources, he was of opinion that in a sound system of transport and supply the resources of every district of the country, as regarded food and the means of transport, should be so well-known and organized that they could be utilized at the shortest notice. That was not the case at the Autumn Manœuvres. With regard to the contracts for rice, flour, bran, hay, and other articles, the prices, to him, were unaccountable when compared with the current prices in the metropolis and many of the principal towns throughout the country. [The hon. Member here quoted from a recent Parliamentary Return.] It would be interesting to know on what principle and by whom these contracts were made. There was one other matter upon which he wanted some explanation. Not long ago a battery of artillery, quartered at Sheffield, and having 12-pounder guns, was to be supplied with 16-pounder equipment, and received orders to march to Hilsa. The Control department was communicated with, and arrangements were entered into for the transport of the guns. Notwithstanding that the battery had to pass near Woolwich, the 16-pounder guns were sent down, and the 12-pounders brought back, and the battery horses, many of them four-year olds had to draw the far heavier equipment the whole way from Sheffield to Hilsa. It might be said that this was owing to some mistake of an individual, but it showed that there was something faulty and wrong in the system. The first step to its improvement would be to institute an impartial inquiry into the existing state of things, and he warned the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, and the Surveyor General, that if, as was sometimes said, the existence of the present Government was coeval with the existence of the Parliament, they would not find it pleasant, sitting in Opposition, to see all the faults and imperfections which if they were not now endeavouring to screen, they were at least wilfully shutting their eyes to, ruthlessly and mercilessly exposed by a searching inquiry.

Mr. WHITWELL said that, so far as his observation went, he was bound to say that the Control department was progressing in the right direction. Last year he called attention to certain defects which, in his opinion, existed in the department, and it was only right to say that during a considerable encampment of Militia which had since taken place in his own county, those defects entirely disappeared, and the labours and operations of the department were attended with the utmost success. Moreover, had the hon. and gallant Officer seen what was done on Saturday last at Woolwich he would have had no cause of complaint. For his own part, he believed there was no department in the Army whose service was more entitled to praise than the Control and the system of transport now established.

MR. O'REILLY said, he had taken some interest in that subject, and moved for certain Returns to show how the system worked, but they had never been furnished. They must all know that, although the movement of troops was directed from the Horse Guards or some high military authority, the carrying out of the system lay with those whose efficiency was often of a very questionable character. In this case the Horse Guards and not the Control department were responsible.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, they had had plenty of Reports from general officers, but they had never yet had a Report from an officer in command of a marching regiment. Now, he had received a letter from an officer of a marching regiment in the late Manœuvres, in which the writer stated that the Control had broken down more than once; that the meat became tainted, and that the hired transport broke down upon the march. He also described the system as imposing too much work on the men, more than they were able to perform with justice to themselves or the service, and they were often compelled to remain without their dinner until 8 or 9 o'clock at night, and then dine on the worst possible fare.

LORD ELCHO believed with his noble Friend the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil), that more duties were imposed on the men in the Control department than they could perform, and that was a practice which he trusted his right hon. Friend would put an end to as soon as possible. That was the cause of the disasters which befell the French Army in the Franco-German War. Moreover, as our Control system did not rest upon the precedents of France, Prussia, or Russia, nor upon the recommendation of Lord Strathnairn's Committee, he regarded it as tentative and experimental. The Report of His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief upon the Autumn Manœuvres showed an improvement this year over last; but it was said that the Report published was not that which His Royal Highness first wrote, but an amended Report; and it was also said that Reports of the Generals in command were not favourable to the Control Department, showing its serious shortcomings. The production of those Reports had been refused. Parliament should insist upon seeing these Reports, as upon the proper working of this important department the House ought to be supplied with every information as soon as possible, and the best time to furnish it was not during a war, but in time of peace.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, he would touch on one or two points which had been referred to in the course of the discussion. His hon. and gallant Friend had talked of the number of Control officers at the Autumn Manœuvres; but he should recollect that we had those Manœuvres for the purpose of instruction, and of giving officers an opportunity of seeing what practice in the field was. Then as to horses. He (Sir Henry Storks) had said the other night that cavalry was a mere question of expense. If the House wished to vote a large number of horses and men, as a military man he might be glad to see it; but that, in his opinion, would be a great mistake, and what we should aim at, was having such a nucleus of a force of instructed men as would be capable of easy expansion. As to local resources, there was the most accurate knowledge on the part of the department. They knew everything connected with the railways and their plant, and he did not hesitate to say that if it were required to send a force from one end of England to the other it could be done at the shortest notice. Moreover, in a great emergency, power had been given by Parliament to take the railways and employ them in the service of the State. As to the supply of food during the Autumn Manœuvres, looking at the weather, the distance, and the difficulties, he thought the service was, on the whole, admirably conducted. His noble Friend the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) read a letter from a regimental officer, complaining that the men had been kept for a long time without their dinners, and that the meat arrived late. But he would ask his noble Friend, who knew something about those things, whether he thought it right to come down to the House and read the letter merely of an individual officer in a regiment bringing such a charge against a department? With regard to contracts, there was a variation in prices no doubt, and such a variation there must be, and anyone who read the headings would find that prices varied according to the places of delivery. If a contractor had to deliver hay, flour, or other things at different places, he would require a higher or lower price according to the distance. He believed, however, the contracts were made with the greatest regard to economy, after the fullest examination, and with the utmost desire to do justice to the country. With respect to the constitution of the Control department, the object was to consolidate antagonistic departments, and to define duties and to fix responsibilities. No matter how many officers you might have employed, you must still have a superior officer in the field to whom all stores must be addressed, for without that you could have no security. He could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that there was no one who appreciated his remarks better than he did, or who was more willing to give them due weight than he was.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he concurred in the remark of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the City of Hereford (Major Arbuthnot), that the Vote was a very important one, for, having regard to an army in the field, there was no doubt the Control department deserved the most serious consideration. He was not one of those who would ask that the confidential Reports of general officers should be laid on the Table of the House; but when his right hon. Friend opposite (the Surveyor General of Ordnance) found fault with his noble Friend the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) for reading the letter of an individual officer, and sheltered himself behind the Reports of general officers, he would ask that, if the substance of these Reports should not be laid on the Table, it should at least be stated by his right hon. Friend. Nothing would give more confidence or more satisfaction to the public, than that the right hon. Gentleman should get up and state that, if the Reports of the general officers were confidential, those officers were of opinion that the Control department was as satisfactory as we had a right to expect or as they wished. It must be remembered that we could not make requisitions in this country, as could be done in Prussia. The Prussian system would not be tolerated here for one moment. The two things were not to be mentioned in the same day. Therefore, we must on that account make great allowance for the Control department. If the Reports of the general officers were favourable, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would get up and say so.

MR. CARDWELL said, he must put it to the Committee whether what was now asked of him was not most extraordinary. Either a document ought to be produced or it ought not. If a document ought not to be produced nothing should be said of it. His Royal Highness, after full consideration, on a review of all the Autumn Manœuvres, had placed the results of those Papers before the House in the form which he had decided.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he had certainly not given the name of the officer whose letter he had mentioned, for it also was a confidential communication; but he should be happy, with his permission, to give his name when the right hon. Gentleman produced the Reports of the general officers.

LORD ELCHO said, he objected to the title of Controller as an ill-chosen one. He would have called the controllers purveyors, and thought they should be placed under the officer in command. Whatever might be thought of the department, however, he could not allow the opportunity to pass without offering one word of praise to his right hon. Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance. Every one who had the pleasure of seeing that most magnificent review on Woolwich Common on Saturday must agree that the service of the Control department was most efficient and satisfactory in furnishing those excellent waggons which made admirable stands; and he ventured to suggest that if they were handed over to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, they would be found very useful on occasions of public meetings in the Parks.

Mr. SALT thought it most important that the troops, and especially the Militia and the Volunteers, should not be exposed to greater hardships or inconvenience in the way of supplies than were absolutely unavoidable. In fact, he believed that such a course would do much to stop recruiting. There might be difficulties in furnishing supplies, but they must be overcome. That was a subject on which a civilian had a right to speak. He did not blame any one, and spoke as a complete outsider; but it appeared to him that a soldier marching a whole day should have supplied to him, or carry with him, at least one good meal.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that extra provision had been made for the supply of the troops during the Autumn Manœuvres, each man being furnished with a bread and cheese ration. If the hon. Member would refer to the contracts he would find that there was a considerable contract for cheese at 62s. per cwt. It was an extra ration to be supplied between the early morning meal and the usual midday bread and meat ration.

Mr. SALT understood that in some cases money was furnished to the troops instead of bread. It was almost impossible to get bread, and when they did get it, the money served out would not buy enough, in consequence of the exorbitant price charged.

LORD HENRY THYNNE mentioned the case of some troops who had marched very early in the morning and did not get to camp till 9.30, when the only food served out was a piece of junk, and the horses received no fodder at all till next morning. During the whole of the Manœuvres, the food supplied was very coarse, more especially the cheese, and gave great dissatisfaction to every one.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £1,980,700, Provisions, Forage, &c.

Mr. O'REILLY pointed out, that while in all other cases, officers of the same relative rank received the same relative allowances, chaplains of the Forces did not receive the same allowances as other officers with whom they ranked.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that the matter was now under consideration.

Mr. MELLOR asked whether attention had been directed to the excess of expenditure for transport occasioned by railway companies charging soldiers more than other passengers. He was told that a soldier on furlough was charged 7s. 10d. for travelling from Manchester to Dublin; while any other person could travel the same distance for 7s. 2d.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, the department had been in communication with the railway companies on the subject of transport, and he was sorry to say that no satisfactory result had been arrived at. On certain occasions deductions were allowed, as they would be by the South Western Company on account of soldiers going to Windsor on Tuesday. The department avoided as much as possible sending soldiers by railway. Marching, when that was practicable, was good for the men, if only the difficulties of billeting could be overcome. In one instance an exchange of troops at Dublin had been effected by employing one of Her Majesty's troop-ships, and the saving on the whole transaction was £1,600.

COLONEL NORTH also drew attention to the allegation just made that even a soldier on furlough was charged 8d. in excess of the ordinary fare.

Mr. CARDWELL said, that a soldier on furlough ought to travel on the same terms as a private individual, and, if he were not allowed to do so, it could only be hoped that the new regulations which the House was passing would remedy the grievance.

Mr. WHITWELL complained of the insufficiency of the allowance of 4s. to Volunteers for attending battalion drills. He hoped that some better arrangements than those that existed at present would be made for the purpose of bringing Volunteers to the military centres.

Mr. CARDWELL said, that the allowance had been increased some time ago to 5s., and he believed on the average it was sufficient.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT urged a complaint as to the withdrawal of forage allowance from Artillery field officers. Calling attention to the fact that many officers who had been receipt of forage allowance for years—in one case as much as 17 years—on account of rank conferred on them for service in the field, were now deprived of it on being made substantive majors. He did not believe so glaring an injustice could have been brought under the Secretary of State's own eye.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that the allowance which had been withdrawn was an irregularity which had escaped detection for a length of time. The complaint should, however, receive his careful attention.

MR. WHARTON said, the allowances to permanent Staff sergeants of Militia in lieu of food, fuel, and clothing were fixed some years ago, when food and fuel were much cheaper than they were now, and the consequence was that they were very insufficient.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped that something would be done to remedy the hardship of persons who had soldiers billeted upon them during the Autumn Manœuvres—because the amount of money paid at present was not sufficient to compensate them.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that it was proposed to give an additional 3½d. per billet beyond the sum mentioned in the Mutiny Act, and this regulation would apply to the Manœuvres of last year, as well as to those of the present.

LORD ELCHO said, it was rumoured that horses were now being bought that were sold at the close of the last Manœuvres, and that we were, of course, paying for them the advance in the market price. Would it not be possible to save what was lost in sale and repurchase, by arranging with the farmers to keep them while they were not wanted? He wished also to ask whether the department could not introduce Australian meats, which were coming into such general use, and which he knew, from personal experience, was as good food as could be put before any one.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that all the horses purchased by the Government were marked, so that they would not be re-purchased by them. As to Australian meats, nothing would be more difficult than to make the British soldier eat what he had not been accustomed to; and until Australian meats came into more general use he should not like to try them in the Army.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT said, he should like a further explanation of the alleged irregularity with regard to the drawing of forage, because he had drawn it himself many years. He had always believed, and did so now, that he had drawn it on the authority of a Royal Warrant. If the allowance were to be regulated, as suggested by the Surveyor General, by the amount of mounted duty to be done, saving might be effected in the case of certain controllers who from considerations possibly of personal safety never mounted a horse. He suggested it would be beneficial to soldiers to use salt meat once a-week, for the simple reason that as the salt ration would cost less than the fresh, the balance might be expended on peas, suet, or anything else the men preferred. He believed if that was done, the men would raise no objection, but would rather approve the variation of diet. While recommending that course for adoption, however, he would strongly urge that salt meat should only be issued to the troops when living in barracks or standing camps, and under no circumstances to those engaged in moveable camps, as was the case during the Autumn Manœuvres of 1871 and 1872. He did that for two reasons—namely, that under the latter circumstances it could not conveniently be subjected to the necessary process of being well soaked before use; and secondly, because its issue, not requiring so much foresight and exertion as fresh meat in the matter of supply, would still further limit the very slight test to which the control department had been subjected during the late military exercises.

COLONEL STUART KNOX, in pursuance of the Question put by the hon. Member below the gangway (Mr. Mellor), wished to know whether some steps could not be taken to enable the soldiers on furlough to travel by railways at the ordinary military rates, in the same manner as officers were permitted to do?

MR. CARDWELL said, that every effort had been made by the Government to obtain justice for the soldier in this respect; but the matter was in the hands of the railway companies, and not in those of the Government.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £743,100, for Clothing Establishments, Services, and Supplies.

SIR HARRY VERNEY inquired why tailors in regiments were not employed to make their comrades' clothes. He was of opinion that a large proportion of the men's clothes might be made in the regiment.

SIR HENRY STORKS replied that it would be altogether impossible to carry out the proposition of the hon. Baronet as regarded the Infantry. The nature of regiments made alterations as to the fitting of the work up, and the Cavalry did make their own clothing.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL thought that fatigue clothes should be supplied to the men engaged in the Annual Manœuvres. In order to prevent their best clothes from being destroyed on those occasions, as they were in the present system.

MARSHAL ARBUTHNOT suggested that the surplus of the canteen fund should be applied towards purchasing the fatigue clothes referred to by the noble Lord.

MR. CARDWELL said, that any canteen fund surplus ought to go in reduction of the prices charged in the canteen, and not to the purchase of clothes.

MARSHAL ARBUTHNOT said, he had always kept up the price of the beer sold in the canteen in the interest of the health of the men. It was difficult to prevent a large canteen surplus from accumulating, and equally difficult to know how to spend the surplus allowed by regulation.

LORD ELMCH drew attention to the untidy and useless leggings supplied to the soldiers; they were a perfect scandal to the British Army. Neither sportsmen nor Volunteers would think of wearing such uncomfortable articles. He hoped that leggings of some better pattern would be supplied to the Army, because it was of the utmost importance that the men's feet and legs should be comfortable when on the march.

SIR HENRY STORKS admitted that nothing could be more unsightly than the leggings, and the matter was under consideration. In reply to the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil), he could not pledge himself to furnish the soldiers with fatigue dresses, but arrangements were in contemplation to allow the soldiers to wear their old clothes, so that that they might keep their good suit to appear in on parade.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,070,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1873 to the 31st day of March 1874, inclusive."

MR. GREGORY drew attention to a new and cheaper system of rifling old cast-iron ordnance in such a way as to permit lead-coated projectiles to be used. It was well known that they had a large stock of those warlike stores that might be made available. The question was a technical one, and he felt some difficulty in speaking upon it; but looking at the high price charged per gun, he considered the matter was one deserving the attentive consideration of the Committee. Evidence on the subject had been taken before the Select Committee on Ordnance which sat in 1863, and the tendency of that given by Colonel Lefroy, Captain Scott, and other officers, went to show that, both as regarded efficiency and safety, the Britten gun was superior to the Armstrong and the Palliser, carrying, as it did, a distance of 8½ miles, with a mean deviation of 5·9. The experiments were conducted with the powder hitherto used, which was violently explosive, and likely to increase the recoil; but, with the non-explosive pebble-powder, the experiments would probably be still more favourable to the Britten gun. Further trials should be made before incurring additional expense under the new system, and he ventured to think that a lesser sum would answer all practical purposes for the present, than the one under consideration. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £100,000.

MR. HICK seconded the Amendment, which he thought was one of great interest, and required the serious attention of the Committee. His attention was more particularly attracted to the subject by a paper of Mr. Bashley Britten, which had been brought before the Institution of Civil Engineers in April last, of which Institution he (Mr. Hick) was a member. The author of that paper grappled with the question in a most masterly manner, evincing a thorough knowledge of the whole subject, and using arguments in support of his view which he (Mr. Hick) considered unanswerable. The broad issue raised was this—could they, if the knowledge they now possessed were rightly applied, reduce the present enormous cost of their ordnance without lowering the standard of its efficiency, so that the country might be better armed, and at the same time be relieved of a heavy burden. And he thought that now, when they had instruments which tested with accuracy not only the pressure of the powder upon the chamber of a gun, but also the velocity of the shot as it left the muzzle, there could not be any difficulty in doing so. Those instruments had been introduced into America long before we had adopted them, and by their use the manufacturer of guns would be able to measure their strength according to the pressure they would have to bear. That pressure-gauge must be to ordnance designers just as important an instrument as the analogous pressure-gauge was to the engineer who schemed a steam engine; that was to say, if an engineer had to construct a boiler, and knew what pressure it would have to bear, he could apportion its strength to the pressure; but if he were not aware of what the pressure was, all he had to do was to make it strong enough not to burst under any pressure. In one case he could, by adapting means to ends, with intelligence, construct a scientific instrument; in the other, he could only make a very clumsy machine, needlessly expensive and needlessly strong. He might point to the large boiler that could not burst, and ask you to admire the great skill with which he had made it so thick, so sound, and so perfect that nothing could burst it. If he did so, he would be only calling attention to a mere monument of his ignorance and folly. Just in the same way, if the ordnance engineer knew the pressure his gun would have to bear, he could make it of sufficient strength; but if he did not know the extent of the pressure, he had to make his gun strong enough not to burst under any pressure. Where a gun was made stronger than it was practically required to be, it was so much money thrown away. Mr. Britten therefore asked why, with the knowledge we had acquired from the use of these instruments, we should go on blundering in the dark, instead of making weapons properly designed according to that knowledge, and representing economy of science? Beyond that, the new pressure gauge had introduced a partial revolution, for it had informed them that the powder they were using was unnecessarily violent, and so strong, in fact, that it rapidly destroyed the insides of their guns, and rendered them completely unserviceable after a few rounds. The consequence was that they had now introduced pebble powder largely into the service, whereas hitherto they had only used it by way of experiment. Pebble powder, as most hon. Members were aware, consisted of large grains, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{5}{8}$ ths of an inch square, and was much slower in burning than ordinary powder. From a table compiled from the preliminary report of the Committee on explosives, it was found that the maximum pressure upon a gun 126 inches long, and with an 8-inch bore, when pebble powder was used, was one-half less than when the ordinary powder was used, and such powder propelled the ball with far greater velocity, it being in the one case 1,380 feet per second, as against 1,320. The pebble powder burned slower than the common powder, and although at the moment of ignition its pressure was only one-fifth that of the ordinary powder, being as six tons on the square inch to 30, yet it expanded with a greater volume when the ball advanced about six inches in the barrel, and the result was that the projectile was discharged with greater force than that effected by the more highly explosive powder; the maximum pressure of which upon the interior surface of the gun was just double that of the other. Mr. Britten therefore said, and in doing so, he opened up the whole question, that if the ordinary powder were to be continued in use there would still be the necessity for constructing the guns of greater strength than was sufficient to bear its strain; but if the pebble powder, which was at present only used by way of experiment, were to be employed, that strength might be reduced one-half, and the cost of the guns would be proportionately diminished. Although it was the custom to boast of our Woolwich guns as being infinitely superior to all others, because of their strength, yet the foreigner simply said that his guns were strong enough for the purpose required and would be no better if made ten times stronger as regarded material. That seemed to him (Mr. Hick) so clear, that it required a proper answer before the Vote was passed. Mr. Britten had not only pointed all that out but had suggested a remedy, and had proved that in designing ordnance, if due attention was paid to the economical employment of all the forces set to work, instead of making weapons as they now did, wholly of very costly material, they might with perfect safety rely largely on cast iron which was so much cheaper. He was aware that the authorities at Woolwich were constantly pestered with the schemes of inventors, but Mr. Bashley Britten's was one which had stood the test of strict inquiry, having been extensively applied in America, and the country ought to have an answer about it. He would now call attention to one or two suggestive facts as to the waste of money incurred in producing guns of an inordinate strength, and would quote Mr. Britten. From those facts, which were open to correction, it would appear in the case of a 6½-ton gun, which had been most severely tried at Woolwich in testing samples of powder, and which though nominally of 7-inch calibre, carrying a 115 lb. shot, yet in reality, was of 8-inch calibre, and carried a shot of 180 lbs., the charges were full battering charges of 35 lbs. of powder of all kinds, mild as well as violent, and yet this bored-out gun had endured some 1,400 or 1,500 rounds. It must be borne in mind, that as an 8-inch gun, it ought to weigh 9 tons, and the thickness of its walls should be 13½-inches, whereas the fact was, that as a 7-inch 6½-ton gun, its walls were only 11½-inches thick. Yet that 11½-inches of wrought iron proved amply strong enough to resist a pressure of over 30-tons to the inch, considerably more than fell on the 35-ton 700-pounders firing service charges, where the pressure was only 24-tons per inch, and to stand which the monster gun was built up with walls of no less than 22-inches of metal. Mr. Britten, therefore, fairly asked, why should not half of that metal, on the outside, be of cast iron? It was only required to withstand the recoil, and was not required for strength; in fact, it could not give it, for the simple reason that a very large proportion of the mass laid far beyond the range of elasticity of any metal whatever. For himself he believed that a considerable proportion of our wrought-iron guns, and the most expensive parts of our large guns—namely, the outside shell which carried the trunnions—might be made of cast-iron. Those large guns, which he would admit were beautiful specimens of workmanship, now cost from £2,000 to £3,000; and he thought they might be reduced some 30 to 40 per cent in cost without being rendered a bit less efficient. He asked them why the use of cast-iron had been abolished. The objection to its use came from the Report of the late Ordnance Select Committee, which he had seen, and found one clear fact in—namely, that it admitted that the cast-iron rifled guns which Mr. Britten tried, bore every test, and gave satisfactory results, but that similar guns on the Armstrong shunt system of rifling, and some others fired with rigid projectiles had all failed, but that was from no fault of the material, but from the absurd system of rifling adopted. Mr. Britten's plan, however, of coating the shells with lead effectually prevented the gun from bursting. But although the Britten guns succeeded, they were not adopted because the shunt guns failed. Yet, after that, the shunt system was adopted for the service, several hundreds of wrought-iron guns being so made, although it was remarkable that these would not stand, and that the plan had ultimately to be given up, several having burst explosively, while in many the interior was frequently found to split. A peculiarity of that system of rifling was contained in the grooves which varied at different parts of the gun, for instance, at the point of discharge, and up to 24-inches of the muzzle, they were deep, admitting of easy passage to the shot, but at that distance they culminated in an incline, up which it had to travel, thereby compressing the studs on its surface .005 of an inch. In fact, the shot was gripped tightly and perfectly centred, just when it left the muzzle at the moment of its greatest velocity. Besides that, these projections were of cast-iron faced with zinc, and when compressed at the muzzle of the gun as they were, he thought that if anyone had wished to destroy them he could not have resorted to a more ingenious plan for the purpose. He would now allude to one more fact. They had still in service many thousands of cast-iron guns; what pressure did they bear when they were fired? That had been ascertained, as he believed, at Mr. Britten's suggestion, as followed:—The service charge for a 68-pounder cast-iron gun was, as it had always been, 16 lbs. of what was called poudre brutale, and it had been found that that caused a pressure of from 17 to 18 tons per square inch, while the full battering charge for a rifled wrought-iron gun of the same calibre was 35 lbs. of the new pebble powder, causing a pressure of from only 13 to 16 tons per square inch. The cast-iron gun weighed only $4\frac{1}{2}$ tons, yet it had to stand more than the wrought-iron 9-ton gun. But that was not all, for these cast-iron guns had been proved with charges of 28 lbs. of the old violent powder, thereby subjecting them to a strain even more severe than fell on the 35-ton gun firing the full service charge of the new powder, a fact more astounding when it was recollected that the thickness of the cast-iron was only about 9-inches, against 22 of wrought-iron and steel combined. Not 2 per cent of the 68-pounders supplied by the best contractors ever failed under that enormous proof. Was that evidence of its weakness or uncertainty? His experience, as he believed was that of all other civil engineers, was, that when well made and properly handled, it was quite as certain as any other iron, and that, in fact, in large masses, it was less liable to vary under manipulation than wrought-iron or steel. The fact was, that if care had been observed, and pebble powder employed, some of the breech-loading guns which had been given up might have been used at the present time. Although we had lately been selling many of our cast-iron guns, still we had many more in the service; and he contended that they might be made fit for a great deal of work by simple rifling, which could be done at a trifling cost with the machinery we had at Woolwich. A very important question hinged upon the present Motion. It was whether that House was to have the control of these large sums of money or not? The House had a right to know why they were spent. He had no doubt the money was honestly spent, but was it wisely spent? No establishment in the world could be managed with greater care, greater precision, and greater regard to economy than the Arsenal at Woolwich was. During the last five years, however, we had spent something like £2,500,000 upon guns which were now utterly useless, and although "the Woolwich Infants" were admirable guns, he maintained they were needlessly strong, and was of opinion they cost more than was really necessary. In fact, in the last 15 years we had spent £10,000,000 on our ordnance, and what had we got for the money? Had we had value for it? If not, why not? We knew from the Report of the Committee that £2,500,000 went in Armstrong guns, which were now thrown aside. How much more of what we voted was wasted, we did not know. There had been breech-loaders, shunt guns, wedge guns, Palliser guns, and now we had what was significantly called "the Woolwich system;" but what greater right had we to say it was correct, than when Armstrong guns were being made by thousands. It might be supposed that a necessary consequence of these improvements would be that some alterations would have been adopted for reducing the excessive cost of these weapons; but the models and patterns settled and sealed eight or ten years ago, remained the models for to-day and to-morrow, and there did not appear any chance of the slightest change being entertained. The designs were fixed, and right or wrong, were to be persevered with. Such conduct, however, was simply absurd, for if the country was to hold its power among nations, it could only do so, by at least keeping pace with them in the application of science to the art of war. In order to do that, invention must be stimulated, not depressed, and there ought to be a general confidence that anyone, who by study or genius was able to suggest an idea which might be worked out for the public good, would receive from the Government fair consideration. In fact, the gun of the period, for the future, must be the highest embodiment of the scientific principles on which its success depended. They still required an enormous number of rifled guns. Scarcely one of their fortifications was properly armed with them, and in their dependencies they had hardly anything save the antiquated smooth-bore. Their gun factories had been busy; but with their present plans could not furnish what they wanted, nor could they afford to pay for it. There was plenty to do in making the monster ordnance needed for their ships and coast defences. Those were special service weapons, and they required comparatively few. As to utilizing our cast-iron guns, he believed many of them might be used in checking the landing of troops, and that they might be rendered very serviceable in our dependencies. They would be thoroughly effective at a mile if they were only rifled, and they might be rifled in their places at a very trifling cost, without bringing them home. In conclusion, he might say, he scarcely expected the Motion would be carried; indeed, he hoped it would not, for he trusted that the occasion for it would be removed by the Government giving them an assurance that the question should be fairly tried, and that the money voted for ordnance should not only be honestly, but wisely spent.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £970,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1873 to the 31st day of March 1874, inclusive." — (Mr. Gregory.)

MAJOR BEAUMONT, though sympathizing with the object of the Amendment, could not agree with all the arguments adduced in its support. The question raised was whether the introduction of pebble powder had not rendered it possible to utilize cast-iron guns which before were unserviceable. Pebble powder resembled a push rather than a blow, it was slower in its action than ordinary gunpowder, and accumulated its power, thereby putting less strain on the gun. In fact, it was just the reverse of dynamite, gun-cotton, and violent explosives of that kind. When the system of Mr. Bashley Britten was first proposed, pebble powder was hardly known. With all deference to the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Hick), his (Major Beaumont's) own opinion was that cast-iron was decidedly unreliable, and practically there was no way of proving the real endurance of cast-iron guns except by proving each individual gun. The Lancaster gun, for instance, used at the siege of Sebastopol gave extremely satisfactory results, but such results had never been again obtained. One argument brought forward in the course of this debate was, that if a gun was strong enough, there could be no object in making it stronger. Ceteris paribus, this argument was unanswerable, but in reality it was impossible to make guns strong enough, as a perfect gun ought to be able to go on firing for ever. Although his individual opinion was that cast-iron was not a fit material for the construction of our ordnance, yet, as many hon. Members of that House, along with many members of the Institute of Engineers, differed in opinion from him, he suggested that the Government should allow some of the cast-iron guns in stock to be tested with pebble powder, in order that the question might be set at rest. A few guns might be given up to be experimented upon, and the Government need not commit themselves any further. He trusted such a trial would not be deemed unworthy of consideration by Her Majesty's Government, for although the gun we now had was second to none in Europe, and the opportunities which he had had of seeing what was being done abroad had confirmed him in that opinion, yet he still thought they should not in any way relax their exertions to keep the advantage they now possessed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that he had heard the speech of the hon. Member for East Sussex in favour of Mr. Bashley Britten's claims with great interest, for he well remembered the meritorious efforts of Mr. Britten to introduce rifled ordnance—indeed that gentleman was one of the earliest advocates of rifling, and his system had been tried in India. He therefore deserved well of the country, and if any reward could be given Mr. Bashley Britten for his labours, he (Sir George Balfour) would be glad to see that reward bestowed. Nevertheless, he listened with apprehension to the opening up of the whole question of rifling old smooth-bore guns made of cast iron. He did not desire a renewal of such experiments as had been made during the last 12 years, for if they looked back over them they would find their cost could be counted by millions of money. No doubt the scientific knowledge of the hon. Member for Bolton had been ably applied in support of the Motion of the hon. Member for East Sussex; but this advocacy depended on the accuracy of calculations as to the strain on guns by the use of pebble powder, and on the endurance of cast-iron in sustaining the strain throughout a long firing. The experiment recommended by the last speaker might perhaps be conceded; but he should look upon it with reluctance, because he feared it would derange the existing system, and prevent that uniformity in regard to guns which it was so desirable to have in the service. At present the numbers of rifled cast-iron ordnance were but few in number, whereas the system advocated would introduce many natures, for the conversion of all our cast-iron guns would be effected, thereby introducing not only many calibres but an innumerable number of different kinds of projectiles, than which nothing could be more objectionable. He regarded the introduction of cast-iron ordnance into the service as an extremely doubtful experiment, and if such guns were adopted, they should be placed in a very subordinate position; for under any view these converted guns were second-rate pieces. This he could confidently state—that the service were very unwilling to receive them. The result of the highest class of guns only being introduced would give the greatest satisfaction to all branches of the service, and it was neither wisdom nor economy to rely upon any other but the best description of ordnance.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, there could be no doubt whatever of the great importance of the question introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). The invention or plan of Mr. Bashley Britten had been long and often before the War Department. The system had been carefully examined by eminent persons, and every desire existed to give effect to the system if it were possible to do so. His hon. Friend had relied upon the Report of the Ordnance Committee of 1863, which was no doubt in favour of Mr. Britten's system as compared with eight other systems, but the Report went on to say that the question remained to be answered whether any of the plans were suitable for adoption. The Committee, besides, avowed considerable mistrust of cast-iron guns, unless the restrictions adopted as to charge with respect to howitzers were observed in firing them. While the Committee were considering those various plans, another plan was submitted by Major Palliser, and he held in his hand detailed Reports of experiments made with the Palliser gun and the Britten gun, which he would be ready to lay on the Table of the House if they were moved for. They had, in fact, very little confidence in cast-iron guns. The untrustworthiness of the material was shown by the fact, that after full trial in America it was given up. Cast-iron guns were fairly tested in the United States, but it appeared from the Report made in 1867 by a Committee on Ordnance which sat at Washington, that no more cast-iron rifled guns should be mounted on fortifications or on ship-board, until such improvements were made in them as would render them reliable, for that so far they were unworthy of confidence. The treacherous character of cast-iron, as testified by the Reports from America, was borne out by our own experience in this country, for at Woolwich 14 out of 17 cast-iron mortars had burst, and a great many others, both of the 10-inch and the 13-inch were pronounced unserviceable. The tendency of these Reports went to prove that in most cases, cast-iron guns had burst when subjected to anything like a severe trial, and it was determined in consequence by the War Department, that they should be given up. They were prepared at the same time to give the suggestions of Mr. Bashley Britten the most serious consideration, although on the whole, it was impossible the War Department could embark in a series of experiments which were sure to be expensive and probably useless, unless a very strong necessity compelled them to do so. They had now got a gun which he believed to be the best in the world, and which had the confidence both of the Army and of the Navy; and that being so, he did not think it was desirable, in the interest either of economy or efficiency, to take the course which had been proposed.

LORD ELCHO said, he was at one time favourable to the introduction of the American cast-iron gun, but the experiments which had taken place showed that it was anything but efficient. He objected to handing over 10 or 20 guns to Mr. Bashley Britten to be experimented on, although the suggestion was, he admitted, very taking. The only result would be to unsettle the whole question and to throw difficulties and doubts in the way of the Government; and he for one would not, he confessed, after the evidence which had been just referred to by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance, showing that in the American War great loss of life had been occasioned by the bursting of cast-iron guns, have the moral courage to put cast-iron guns into the hands of our Artillery. Let him take the case of small-arms. With the improved powder, the pressure could be so reduced as to produce—without any great pressure on any part—a very great initial velocity; but would any hon. Member like to use a cast-iron sporting gun instead of the ordinary gun made in coils? He believed not: yet that was what the Secretary for War was now asked to do in the case of big guns. The question of breech-loaders was also very important. It was the fashion to say that big guns should not be breech-loaders: but France and Prussia used breech-loading guns, and a muzzle-loading gun was in these days an anachronism. In a mechanical country like that a good breech-loader ought not to be regarded as hopeless, and if the Government would offer a good prize, as was done in regard to a breech-loading small-arm, he believed that a good breech-loading heavy gun would be forthcoming. He should like to know the number of 35-ton guns at present made, and what trial or test as to endurance they had undergone.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, the War Office regarded the breech-loading system to be inferior for heavy guns in point of power, in point of simplicity, and in point of rapidity of loading. In each of those respects the muzzle-loading gun was superior to the breech-loader. The breech-loading system weakened a gun precisely at that point where it ought to be strengthened. The muzzle-loading plan had been adopted, at all events partially, by most of the nations of Europe and of the East. The present Russian gun was an 11-inch one, throwing 515 lbs.; we had a 12-inch gun, throwing 520 lbs., and one throwing a projectile of 700 lbs. The Navy had been supplied with all the 35-ton guns it required to the number of 13, and with regard to the land guns, 18 in number, it was intended to lengthen them three feet, which would add another ton to their weight, and they would in future be described as 36-ton guns. As to the exposure to which the men were subjected who had to load the muzzle-loading guns, a most ingenious arrangement had been invented by Sir William Armstrong. By that plan the gun was run back, the muzzle depressed, and the gun sponged out and loaded by a hydraulic machine. That was now under consideration. If this invention appeared to be worthy of adoption it would get rid of the difficulty of breech-loading, which question the War Office was disinclined to re-open. Speaking generally, the authorities considered that we had the very best guns in the world, and to re-open the question would lead to experiments of a very costly character which were not considered necessary.

MAJOR BEAUMONT said, that the opinion of artillery officers would be unanimous as to the desirability of having breech-loaders for heavy guns, provided mechanical men could produce one which would burn a sufficient quantity of powder to give the requisite initial velocity to the projectile.

COLONEL BARTELOTT: What is the cost of one of these 35-ton guns?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Each costs £2,156 5s. 0d.

MR. RYLANDS said, millions of money had been wasted in the manufacture of guns which had turned out useless. The Committee therefore must not accept the dictum of the Ordnance authorities, and he was not satisfied that Mr. Bashley Britten's plan for utilizing our old cast iron guns had received proper attention. What was asked was that the Government should allow such a series of experiments as would satisfy the public that the plan for testing these guns, and for effecting thereby a great economy, had been fairly tried with the new powder and under new conditions previously unknown.

MR. CARDWELL said, if it could be shown that these guns could be safely used, the War Office would be the first to adopt any safe method of using them; but he could hold out no hope that the War Office would allow the use of cast-iron guns because some of them might be used without bursting, in defiance of all the experiments made here and in foreign countries showing that cast-iron guns could not be used safely.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL BARTELOTT wished to ask, before the Vote was put, whether the machinery at Enfield had been converted for the manufacture of Martini-Henry rifles; whether those rifles were being issued to the troops; and, if so, what number had been ordered; whether the Martini-Henry adopted, if adopted at all, was the long or short rifle; and whether the bayonet to be used with it was the old-fashioned bayonet or the new-fangled modern sword bayonet?

LORD ELCHO said, he had heard many unfavourable reports of the Martini-Henry rifle, and even general officers had told him that it was a thoroughly unsatisfactory weapon; that the troops did not like it; that it recoiled so much that they were afraid to use it; that the spiral-spring failed; that there was no similarity in the pull between different rifles—in fact that the nation, after long inquiry and a large expenditure, had got a gun which had proved a failure, and with which it would be unwise to persevere. He had gone into the Committee which sat upon the subject as an opponent of the Martini-Henry rifle; but he was bound to say that he left that Committee as a convert to it. As to the recoil, he had tested the Martini-Henry rifle with Mr. Ross, firing it slowly and firing it quickly, and they did not feel the recoil in the least. It had also been tested by several men belonging to the Rifle Brigade, who happened to be on guard at the Arsenal at Woolwich, and they agreed that the recoil was less than that of the first pattern Martini-Henry, which was heavier, and even less than the Snider which they were in the habit of using. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance would be able to assure them that the reports to which he had referred were unfounded.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that with reference to the question of his hon. and gallant Friend opposite the Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) he had to state that during the year ending 31st March last 62,000 Martini-Henry rifles had been turned out at Enfield. The department at Enfield was now capable of producing 1,500 rifles a-week, at ordinary hours of labour, and steps were being taken to increase the power of the factory, so that 3,000 could be produced in a week. They were substituting to a great extent machinery for hand labour, and that would be the means of leading to greater rapidity and accuracy of production. During the year 1873 they proposed to make 40,000 Martini-Henry rifles at Enfield and 38,000 by private manufacturers. He was happy to say that he could give the most favourable report regarding the weapon. Much had been said of the recoil of this rifle, but he held in his hand a large number of reports from officers, and the great majority of them stated that the recoil was not excessive. There were complaints when the weapon was first issued of miss-firing, but the reports stated that the main springs had been strengthened, and that miss-firing had now practically ceased. The Committee which had been appointed to investigate this subject reported that in their opinion the Martini-Henry was superior in range and precision to the Snider and to the Chassepôt. They had not as yet received any specimens of the new Imperial German rifle. The reports of the commanding officers of regiments also spoke most highly of the Martini-Henry rifle. He had written to Earl Ducie on the subject of the arm, and his Lordship stated that the 60 riflemen who had used it in shooting for the last stage of the Queen's Prize had expressed a strong feeling of approval of the Martini-Henry, and a hope that it might soon become the weapon of the Volunteer Force.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) £778,000, Works, Buildings, and Repairs.

COLONEL BARTELOT complained of the neglected state of the barracks at Glasgow.

MR. CARDWELL said, that was one of the properties which having fallen into Chancery had become an eyesore. The contractor failed to do his duty, and that led to suits in Chancery. The litigation, however, had now come to an end, and arrangements were being made for a new contract. It was proposed to place a squadron of cavalry at Glasgow.

MR. WHEELHOUSE wanted to know what measures were being taken for the improvement of the barracks at Leeds?

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT urged upon the Government the desirability of furnishing barrack rooms for officers.

COLONEL NORTH asked why should not officers in the Army be placed in a similar position to officers in the Navy with regard to the furnishing of their rooms, the Government to provide the furniture and the officers to pay a percentage for its use? About the close of the Crimean War he called attention to this subject, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War at the time highly approved his proposal, and so did the Commander-in-Chief, and yet, after the lapse of so many years, nothing had been done.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, the subject had been under consideration, but there were found to be great difficulties in the way. Officers embarked on board ship for three years, took the furniture that was provided for them, and paid a percentage. But in the case of a regiment of the Line, it might get the route to-day and have to march to-morrow, and then it would be necessary to have damages assessed, which, of course, should be done at the expense of the officers, and would give rise to great difficulties.

COLONEL NORTH could not see the slightest difficulty in the matter. When soldiers were leaving, damages were charged to them; why could not the same be done in the case of officers, who were used to being charged, and charged exorbitantly?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that at present the Government supplied a table and two chairs; why not go a little further and let the officers have a bedstead, chest of drawers, and a few other articles? It would be a great saving to the officers and no great expense to the country. He was glad to find from the Vote that the few remarks which he had made last year in reference to works at Bermuda had been productive of a certain amount of good result. It seemed that black labour, which was very costly, had been done away with, that a permanent fort had been abolished, and some of the contractors' charges had been considerably reduced. He hoped what had been done there would be done in other outlying stations, and that without going to large expense for permanent works which would be unnecessary, we should have economy and efficiency at the same time.

MR. WHITWELL suggested a better classification of the various details of the Vote, and remarked that the charge for architects and superintendence was something like 11½ per cent, which was a very large sum.

LORD ELCHO said, that there were some fine old trees at Portsmouth which in the progress of the works there he found, to his horror, it was intended to cut down, in order to get some ground for building stores of some kind. He ventured to enter a protest against the proceeding; steps had been taken in consequence, and the trees had been spared. Engineers should take counsel, so that the appearance of a place should be consulted a little, as well as the gaining of ground. He saw no mention in the Vote of any repairs going on at the Hibernia lines. He should like to know what sum had been expended in repairing that fortification?

SIR HARRY VERNY suggested that the Government should consider the question of supplying officers with mess plates, subject to their paying interest on the outlay.

MR. CARDWELL, in reply to the hon. Members for Oxfordshire and Buckingham, Colonel North and Sir Harry Verney, said, that he would be delighted to furnish all the barracks of the country, not only with plate but furniture, but it would involve a very large outlay, and the length of time which the hon. and gallant Gentlemen the Member for Oxfordshire had been labouring in the cause showed that other Governments besides the present had felt the difficulties in the way. He was aware that the state of the cavalry barracks at Leeds was not satisfactory, but at present there was no money asked for repairing them.

Vote agreed to.

6. Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a sum, not exceeding £133,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Establishments for Military Education, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1873 to the 31st day of March 1874, inclusive."

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL called attention to the state of new Sandhurst, stating that while the old College was self-supporting, the present one cost the country a large sum of money, and was not viewed by the students with the same affection and respect, for the cadets of old Sandhurst looked back to it with something like the feelings of pride and veneration with which Eton and Harrow were regarded by those who had had the privilege of being educated there. But the system pursued at new Sandhurst was very different. Under the present system young officers, after passing through the inhuman and unjust ordeal of a competitive examination, or having taken an University degree, joined their regiment for a year, and were then sent back to Sandhurst at the age of 21 or 22; they were then placed under school discipline, and exposed to a system of irritating espionage; placed under arrest for the most frivolous causes, kept in their rooms and punished for several days. He believed, too, that system had been carried out illegally. Instead of continuous instruction, the year was broken up by their vacations. On Friday and Saturday there were no studies after 1 o'clock, and as there was no society in the neighbourhood, unless the officers were of a very studious turn they could only amuse themselves by drinking brandy and water on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. He had put a Motion on the Paper to call attention to the Sandhurst scandal, but in deference to the wishes of the parents of the young officers, who had done nothing, he was assured, unbecoming the character of gentlemen, he did not press it on the notice of the House. Owing to the system which was carried on, the College was in a state bordering on mutiny; disgust and discontent prevailed among the officers, who hated it most cordially. He did not think that under these circumstances the disestablishment of Sandhurst could be accompanied with the slightest inconvenience, and, therefore, he had no hesitation in moving that the vote be reduced by the sum of £16,989, the sum requisite for its maintenance.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £116,911, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Establishments for Military Education, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1873 to the 31st day of March 1874, inclusive."—(Captain Archdall.)

LORD EUSTACE CECIL observed that two months ago a Question was asked on this subject, to which his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War gave a very meagre response. His object now was to ascertain a little more of the truth of the story than his right hon. Friend had then vouchsafed to give, so that the Committee might see who was in fault. He had not been able to make very minute inquiries into the scandal, but there was no doubt a very serious spirit of insubordination among a certain number of young officers. As he understood the answer of his right hon. Friend, it seemed to throw a little more blame on those officers than they deserved. He, however, did not stand up to defend their conduct; he thought it insubordinate, to say the least of it. He thought it bad taste, and it might be something worse. He believed his old friend Sir Duncan Cameron had done everything in his power; but he was not sure that the same judiciousness in the mode of dealing with the young men had been shown by other authorities on the occasion. As far as he could find out, the history of the scandal at Sandhurst was very much the same as that which occurred at Woolwich some years ago. There had been a system of petty, vexatious annoyance—treating student officers like schoolboys. That system was very much to be deplored, for it tended to make young men break out and commit schoolboy acts, which in their cooler moments they were sorry for. These young men of 18, 19, and 20, it seemed, were not allowed to have soda-water and brandy when they asked for it at breakfast. The cadets, after having previously enjoyed the liberty of the regimental mess, were subject to certain sumptuary laws as to what they should "eat, drink, and avoid," which it was probable that even boys at Eton would have rebelled against. Certainly, it was too much to subject young men who had attended a regimental mess for some months to this new Spartan discipline. Some years ago, when he called attention to the grave faults of the Sandhurst system, a Royal Commission was appointed, and it devised a scheme of re-construction. After an interregnum, some one in the War Office devised this new scheme, which was founded on the German model; but the difference between the German and the English systems was that in Germany a young man served as a soldier in a regiment, and in England he joined a regiment as an officer, and was admitted to all the advantages of the mess. Of course, he would feel much more being sent back to school again than a young man who had undergone discipline in the ranks. That had been very much felt by officers who had been sent to Sandhurst; they had complained very much of the system of treatment there, and they had rebelled against it. He said that much, in order to induce the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to state what he knew, in order that they might judge who was to blame, whether the young men or the system. At the same time, he trusted that, after the explanations of the right hon. Gentleman, the reduction of the Vote would not be persisted in. He wished to ask how far the recommendations of the Commission had been carried out at Woolwich also, because it was unwise on general grounds to allow the labour of any Commission to be thrown away?

MR. CARDWELL said, there were few Commissions that had had more of their suggestions carried out than that on Military Education; but Commissioners seldom looked at the cost their recommendations would involve, in the way the Government were bound to look at it. A good deal of money, however, had been spent usefully in pursuance of the recommendations of the Commission. There had been established a system of garrison instruction, which was serving extremely well. Great improvements had been made in the system of educating privates in the Army; and the last Report of the Director of Military Education contained a surprising account of those improvements. In compliance with the recommendation of the Commission, buildings had also been erected at Shoeburyness and Chatham, and no Member of the Commission, therefore, need be sorry for the labour he had bestowed upon it. The Government had not incurred all the expenditure that was recommended at Woolwich, because in their judgment other claims had precedence. The noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) could hardly expect him to give a recital of what had occurred at Sandhurst; it was the last thing he should like to do. It was fortunate the Vote did not come on two months ago, because nothing could be more agreeable than what had occurred during those two months, and everything was now going on satisfactorily. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Captain Archdall) had spoken of the inhuman ordeal of a competitive examination; but there was no ordeal at Sandhurst which was more inhuman than all were subjected to, or than he was subjected to in that House. Of course, it was impossible to encourage the drinking of brandy and soda-water in a morning before breakfast; but, having heard from that able, intelligent, and excellent officer, Sir Duncan Cameron, what was actually done at Sandhurst, he must say that he found the discipline at Oxford, with all the liberty they had, much more strict than at Sandhurst. Indeed, Sir Duncan Cameron assured him that these young gentlemen were treated exactly as they would be if they were with their regiments. What was intended, and what he believed was valued was, that these officers should have the opportunity of gaining that sort of education that was gained by officers in Germany; and he knew that the distinguished foreign officers who were here in 1871 expressed great approbation of the training which was given at Sandhurst. After these explanations he trusted the Amendment would be withdrawn.

Lord Eustace Cecil

SIR HARRY VERNEY approved of the removal of the Duke of York's Schools into the country, where the boys might be employed in agriculture, with great benefit to their health.

MR. WHITWELL said, he did not intend to support the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Captain Archdall), for reducing the amount of the Vote by the sum appropriated to the support of Sandhurst College, because he thought it was most important that the education of our officers should be secured; but, at the same time, he felt that it was scarcely right that while £3,981 was spent in the government of the College, £2,000 for staff-sergeants and the band, £4,200 for clerks and servants, and £2,500 for the Governor's salary, only £3,800 should be spent on the instruction of the students in military fortifications and tactics. The average salary of the Professors did not exceed £350 a-year.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT wished to know why the office of garrison instructor was allowed to be held by cavalry and infantry officers on half-pay, and by an officer of the engineers on full-pay, but not by artillery officers.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL explained that his view was that these young gentlemen should be sent in the first place to Sandhurst and then to their regiments, and not first to their regiments and then to Sandhurst. The salaries of the Sandhurst Professors were fixed by the Royal Commission.

MR. CARDWELL said, that in spite of recent occurrences at Sandhurst, Sir Duncan Cameron was strongly in favour of the present system.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL intimated that he did not intend to insist on taking the sense of the Committee upon the Amendment.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, having heard a rumour on the subject, wished clearly to understand from the right hon.

Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, whether it was his intention to remove the Duke of York's School from Chelsea into the country, and to remove the Household Troops from Knightsbridge Barracks to the building so left vacant by the removal of the school? He saw no reason for expending a large sum of money upon removing the troops from their present barracks, which were excellently situated in the event of the troops being required on an emergency. He could not agree with the hon. Baronet opposite the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) that it was desirable to remove the Duke of York's School into the country, where they might become good agriculturists. They had better remain where they were now and become good soldiers.

MR. CARDWELL said, he feared he could not give an answer which would be satisfactory to the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington); but this much he might say—the Royal Commission recommended that the Duke of York's School had better be removed into the country, and with that recommendation he was inclined to agree, but as yet he had arrived at no fixed plan or mature view on the subject. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, that the boys ought to be made into soldiers and not into agriculturists, as it was of great importance to us to have our non-commissioned officers educated at this school, and he was happy to state that, so far, 80 per cent of them went direct into the Army. He had no fixed plan for the removal of the Knightsbridge Barracks to the present site of the school, but he might say that instead of such a removal entailing loss to the public, it would result in a considerable gain, in consequence of the great value of the land on which the barracks now stood. The real point, however, was, did a legitimate desire exist for the proposed removal of the barracks? Not only did he desire it, but he should be glad to lend a hand to accomplish that object. He was doubtful, however, whether the site of the Duke of York's School would be sufficiently large for the erection of the barracks on it.

SIR HARRY VERNEY thought that if the boys were brought up in the country, they would make better soldiers than if brought up in town. He was of opinion that it would be an unwise step to sanction the removal of the Knightsbridge Barracks. Having taken part in the suppression of riotous mobs, he had seen the great advantage of being able to march the heavy cavalry out from that situation, from which it could so readily be brought to bear on any part of London.

COLONEL NORTH said, he had also heard with regret the proposal of the War Office to remove those barracks.

LORD ELCHO said, it was generally thought that it would be an improvement if young men were sent to Sandhurst before joining their regiments, instead of afterwards. As a father, he certainly protested against the use of brandy and soda forming a necessary part of the breakfast for these young men. He doubted the policy of abolishing the grade of ensign, as he thought the more steps there were in a regiment the better. It was well that men should have something to look forward to, and a change of rank supplied that prospect. For this reason, he thought it would be well if the rank of ensign had been retained and young men on first joining had become cadets, as in some foreign services.

Question put, and negatived.

(7.) £29,300, Miscellaneous Services.

MR. W. FOWLER, referring to the expenditure connected with the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts, said, he did not wish to revive the disagreeable discussion they had lately had on that subject, but he felt it his duty to protest against the present position of affairs. They had created a new offence, making a thing punishable in one town which was not punishable in another, and he protested, when he was asked to vote the money requisite to carry out the arrangements which followed from that state of things. According to the latest statistics it appeared that out of 41,473 persons who had undergone an examination within a given period, only 3,484 were sent into hospitals. In other words, nearly 38,000 were compelled to submit to that examination, though their sanitary condition was good, to avoid the penalty of being treated as criminals by their refusal. That, he submitted, was a new offence, hitherto unknown to the law. In his opinion, if the system was so beneficial as was said, they ought either to abolish it altogether, or extend it to every town in the Empire.

SIR HARRY VERNEY defended the Acts. It was necessary to prevent the propagation of contagious diseases, alike for the health of the Army and the benefit of the objects of the Act. He, however, wished to see the system in question altered, not by applying it to every town in the kingdom, but by applying it equally to both sexes.

MR. HENLEY pointed out that this head of expenditure amounted altogether to nearly £16,000, and thought the Government, with their very economical views, would soon take on a regular corps of those particular articles and attach them to each regiment, and then their system would be complete. They would not be able to make a lower descent. That was not a very pleasant subject to discuss, but the course the authorities were pursuing would soon lead them to that, if not to something worse.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £200,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Administration of the Army, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1873 to the 31st day of March 1874, inclusive."

MR. ANDERSON moved the reduction of the Vote by £900, £300 of which sum was a proposed increase of the salary of the Military Secretary of the Commander-in-Chief, and £600, the salary of an Assistant Secretary—a totally new office. A few years ago that department had been examined by a Select Committee, and the result was, that it reported that the officers of the Staff referred to were very extravagantly paid. Thereupon the salary of the officer called the Military Secretary was reduced by £740—namely, from £2,240 to £1,500—and that was still, in the opinion of those who were acquainted with the facts, a very handsome salary for the duties performed. Now, however, there was a proposal to add £300, and provision was likewise made for paying £600 to an assistant secretary. He wished to know the reasons for those additions. Then there was an item of £1,200 for a new officer, called Deputy Adjutant General, but he had been informed that that officer was really the head of the Intelligence department; and as on the other hand, there had been struck off £1,000 for the office of Chief Clerk, he did not propose to object to this part of the Vote. As to the other items he had spoken of, he thought them very objectionable, and not only would move their omission, but would like to ask whether the Treasury had approved of them before they were brought before Parliament?

Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR HARRY VERNEY supported the Vote. It was, he said, real economy to have an efficient staff, and the duties of the office in question were of great importance. He therefore hoped the Committee would not agree to the reduction at a time when it was more than ever necessary that the administration of the Army should be kept in a state of the highest efficiency at head-quarters. In the part of the Vote mentioned by the hon. Gentleman—the Intelligence department—he thought the increase was justified, on the ground that improvement was necessary, as evidenced by the fact that we lagged behind all other countries in that respect.

MR. CARDWELL understood the objection to this part of the Vote was not pressed. [Mr. Anderson: Only the £600 and the £300.] The simple justification of the creation of a new position in the Military Secretary's office was that of late the duties of the Military Secretary had been prodigiously increased by the changes which had taken place in the organization of the Army itself. Of late years a complete record had been kept of the services of every officer in the Army. That record was of an extremely confidential character, and it could only be entrusted to an officer of high standing. An assistant had therefore been found to be necessary, while the duties of the Military Secretary himself were of so confidential a character as to make it desirable to increase the salary, and so secure the services of an officer of high standing. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had asked if the Estimate had been approved of by the Treasury. The matter had not yet been finally disposed of by the Treasury, and they might be relied on to keep a watchful eye on any increase of expenditure. He (Mr. Cardwell) had simply done his duty in presenting the Vote to the House.

COLONEL NORTH said, he could bear testimony to the efficiency of the Military Secretary, and to the fact that the business of the office had been largely increased through the recent changes. He would like to ask what the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) considered to be the duties of the Military Secretary?

MR. ANDERSON did not think it was his duty to state in detail what was the business of the Military Secretary—his object was to prevent unnecessary expenditure. He had informed himself, however, of what was his business at the time the Committee reported, and probably knew as much about it as the hon. and gallant Member who interrogated him. There were no public means of ascertaining what he had to do now, but he was told that he had been relieved of many of his duties by the abolition of purchase.

COLONEL NORTH said, the hon. Member had been very much mis-informed, for the duties of the Military Secretary had been largely increased by the abolition of purchase. He hoped the Committee would not reduce the Vote.

MR. ANDERSON objected to the introduction of the personal element. The matter was one connected with a particular office, and not in any way with the officer who happened to hold it. They had been told by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that the Treasury had not approved of the increase. He would like to know whether they had disapproved of it, or whether they had had it under discussion at all, and if so, what decision they came to regarding it?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR had personally a high respect for Colonel Egerton, the Military Secretary, but he objected to these increases being made that had taken place within the last few years in the cost of the military staff of the Horse Guards, and therefore without some better reason than had yet been given, he would vote with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). He did not object to officers being paid good salaries. On the contrary, he thought one of the most objectionable features of the military system was the miserable salaries paid to officers, and the excessively large numbers employed. It was that large military staff now kept up for the small Army we maintained that caused the extravagance so much complained of in our military expenditure. It was time the Committee set about effecting a substantial reduction in the Estimates, instead of permitting the items to be increased, as had been done during the past three years. So far from any increase in the cost of the military staff being called for, he considered that on the amalgamation of that Staff with the War Office a large decrease in numbers and cost, instead of an increase, ought to have been made, and until this reform was effected no real decrease in the military expenditure could be looked for. And if any changes in salaries consequent on changes in duties were needed, the modifications ought to have been carried on by changes in the salaries of officers whose duties were lessened. He must add that he deeply regretted to see this proposed decrease brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he could not agree with the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) that none but military men had a right to criticize these Estimates. If that were so, the best thing to be done was that all the civilian Members should leave the House, and let those belonging to the military profession vote away the public money as they pleased. He did not think that it would become the Committee to divide on the question whether or not the holder of a high military office was to have an addition of £300 a-year made to his salary or not; but, at the same time, he thought that Her Majesty's Government were bound to give a sufficient reason for asking the House for this additional sum. If the right hon. Gentleman said that it was necessary for the efficiency of the public service that the increase in this officer's salary should be made, he should vote for that increase, and should throw the responsibility of the matter on the right hon. Gentleman. He was certainly surprised to hear that the duties of the Military Secretary had been increased, compared with what they were at the time of Lord Northbrook's Committee; for, if he recollected aright, General Foster, who then held the office, was such a glutton for work that he actually performed duties which belonged to the Commander-in-Chief. It was then resolved to confine him to his proper functions, and the salary was accordingly reduced. It was, however, now stated that the Military Secretary had to keep a record of the military services of each officer, as a guide for promotion by selection. Could it be stated that there had not always been preserved such a record? If so it did not matter for what reason it was preserved, although now it might be required to carry out the principle of selection—and could it be for a moment insisted that on this account the salary was to be raised? He protested against the reduction of salaries at a period of panic, when, as was here the case, Parliament was in a year or two afterwards called upon to increase them.

COLONEL NORTH inquired whether it was not the fact that the duties of the Military Secretary had not been greatly increased by the abolition of purchase?

MR. CARDWELL said, that the duties of that officer had been considerably increased.

MR. ANDERSON: Has this matter ever been discussed by the Treasury, and what answer was given?

MR. CARDWELL: It has been under the consideration of the Treasury, and was not approved.

MR. ANDERSON: Was it disapproved?

MR. CARDWELL: It was.

MR. ANDERSON: Yet in the face of that disapproval the right hon. Gentleman brought this increase before the House, and endeavoured to press it through the House, and to compel the Treasury to swallow it, whether they liked it or not. He thought he was quite warranted in taking the sense of the Committee upon it.

MR. CARDWELL observed that inasmuch as the question was not finally and absolutely disposed of, in his opinion, it ought to be brought before the House.

MR. ANDERSON: But it was disapproved?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that he still hoped it might be approved, as he thought the refusal had been upon inadequate information.

LORD ELCHO entered his protest against the theory that when the head of a Department brought an increase before the House as necessary to the efficiency of his Department, he must necessarily be bound by the opinion of the Treasury. No Secretary of State worthy of his position would consent to do so, as he himself must be the best judge of what was required.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR remarked that no estimate ought to be submitted to the House which had not been previously approved by the Treasury. This was a recognized principle which had been in force for many years.

COLONEL NORTH said, that nothing could be more straightforward than the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman had put this matter before the House, and he considered that the House of Commons was the proper tribunal to determine it.

MR. DENISON asked if there was not a new appointment—that of Military Under Secretary—at a salary of £600?

MR. CARDWELL said, that was so. The duties were of a very confidential character, and were, therefore, entrusted to an officer of high rank.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR in reply to the call as to whether the Treasury or the Secretary of State was most fitted to judge of the wants of the Army, admitted that the Treasury, under the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, was the most inefficient Department in the State, and far less competent than the right hon. Gentleman to form an opinion upon the matter; but still it was the rule that no Estimate should be submitted to the House which was not approved of by the Treasury, and that rule ought to be acted upon.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the rule that governed the preparation of the Estimates was that no sum could be entered without the sanction of the Treasury; but they reserved to themselves, in the case of any establishment, the right to review that establishment afterwards.

MR. DICKINSON considered that no satisfactory reason had been assigned for this increase in the salary of the Military Secretary. If the duties were heavy now, they would in a few years hence be considerably reduced.

Mr. CARDWELL observed that the appointment was only for five years.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER held that the right hon. Gentleman was a better judge of the requirements of his Department than even the Treasury, and therefore he would support him. He much regretted the disposition to cut down to the last sixpence the salaries of those who had important duties to perform.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary to the Treasury, and a Lord of the Treasury had a few moments previously all been standing at the Bar. It was observed that the Financial Secretary to the War Office left his seat to speak to them, and the Committee no doubt expected that those right hon. and hon. Gentlemen, being thus informed of the difficulty, would have given the Committee some enlightenment. It must have been remarked, however, that they all disappeared suddenly, and thus the Committee were still left in a state of embarrassment. He was at a loss to understand in what position the Vote came before the Committee, or how they would stand if they passed it.

Mr. CARDWELL admitted that he had been placed in a difficulty. He had recommended an increase in the salary of the Military Secretary, the Treasury had withheld its approval, and the case was not finally closed. If, however, the Treasury persisted in objecting, the increase would not be given.

Mr. MUNTZ said, that the question was, whether the Committee were prepared to Vote that increase of salary, contrary to the disapproval of the Treasury. Instead of coming in to help the Secretary of State for War on this Vote, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had "bolted out" of the House as fast as he could. Under those circumstances, he must support the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson).

Mr. J. S. HARDY hoped that the Committee, on a question upon which it was now fully informed, would not, by striking out the Vote, make itself and the head of the Department the slaves of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Military Secretary, it appeared, had now certain records to keep, and if the Secretary of State for War thought that he ought to have a small increase of salary the Committee ought to vote it, irrespective of the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and if that right hon. Gentleman still objected, it ought not to drive the Secretary of State to commit suicide.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT repudiated the idea that they should pass Votes merely because they were asked for by a head of a Department; but at the same time he would suggest that, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer was now in his seat, the Committee would hear from him why the Treasury disapproved the increase.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON thought the Committee was placed in a position of considerable difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War thought the salary of the Military Secretary should be increased by £300 a-year. The answer of the Treasury was, that they disapproved of the increase, upon which the Secretary at War was not disposed to submit to the decision of the Treasury, and made it a matter of remonstrance. The two right hon. Gentlemen should have taken care to have the matter settled before bringing it before the Committee. For himself, he would place the opinion of the Secretary of State upon such a question far before that of any Gentleman in the Treasury.

Mr. O'REILLY said, that when the salaries of the officers in the War Department were re-arranged, they had been settled in relation to the relative standing of the several officers, and he disapproved of the violation of that principle. The simple fact of increase of duty did not constitute a claim for increase of salary. The House and the War Department ought to pause before recommending an increase of the salaries which had been fixed after an exhaustive departmental inquiry a few years ago.

COLONEL NORTH remarked that the salary of the Military Secretary was reduced, because his work would be reduced; but it seemed that his work had been increased.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, it had not been entirely decided by the Treasury whether the salary of the Military Secretary should be increased by £300 a-year. As an objection had been taken, he thought it was more regular not to ask the Committee to vote the sum ber was withdrawn on the occasion referred to, and therefore it was open to the right hon. Gentleman to bring forward the Motion of which he had given Notice.

MR. W. N. HODGSON remarked that a high authority in the House stated a few days ago that an Amendment moved by any hon. Member must be withdrawn by that hon. Member himself. He had certainly never withdrawn his Amendment, and therefore he trusted it might be considered as still standing for approval.

MR. SPEAKER stated that the hon. Member was understood to have withdrawn his Amendment, and the Amendment having appeared upon the proceedings of the House as being withdrawn, it must be taken to be so.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had understood, on the occasion referred to, that the Amendment spoken of was withdrawn, and that they were to start afresh. Accordingly, in the fulfilment of his promise, he had placed on the Paper the additions which the Government thought fit to make to the Lords' clause. He wished to explain to the House how the matter now stood. The Bill had been sent up to the other House without any provision such as had been inserted there, because the Government thought that no such restriction on the Commissioners was necessary, inasmuch as the rule of Common Law was, that no Judge should sit on a case if he had any interest in the question involved. He believed that rule would have applied to the Commissioners, if the Bill had passed as it left the Lower House; and there was an additional security, because the Lord Chancellor had the power of dismissing any Commissioner if he thought proper. In the other House, however, it was thought necessary to insert this clause, forbidding any Commissioner to hold any stock in railways or canals. Although he was of opinion that the clause was unnecessary, he expressed his willingness to accept it; but Amendments having been proposed by the hon. Members for East Cumberland (Mr. Hodgson) and East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), a conversation ensued, in the course of which some hon. Gentlemen appeared to think that the Commissioners ought to have no interest in any property which could be the subject of railway carriage. Such an enactment would be useless, extravagant, and mischievous. The only analogy he had been able to discover, even for the Lords' clause, was the enactment that justices of the peace should have nothing to do with the business of baking or brewing; but if an attempt were made to apply to those cases the analogy which seemed to strike certain hon. Members of the House the other evening with regard to the Railway and Canal Commissioners, a magistrate must not only not be a baker or a brewer, but he must not eat bread or drink beer. He had, however, placed on the Paper some additions to the Lords' clause, the first of them being as follows:—

"It shall not be lawful for the Commissioners, except by consent of the parties to the proceedings, to exercise any jurisdiction by this Act conferred upon them in any case in which they shall be, directly or indirectly, interested in the matter in question."

The next provision was that—

"The Commissioners shall devote the whole of their time to the performance of their duties under this Act, and shall not accept or hold any office or employment inconsistent with this provision."

He submitted to the House that by adding those words everything would be done which could be fairly required, and that they would have taken every precaution that could be conceived to be necessary.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Clause A. (Commissioners not to be interested in Railway or Canal Stock), to add the words "It shall not be lawful for the Commissioners, except by consent of the parties to the proceedings, to exercise any jurisdiction by this Act conferred upon them in any case in which they shall be, directly or indirectly, interested in the matter in question."

The Commissioners shall devote the whole of their time to the performance of their duties under this Act, and shall not accept or hold any office or employment inconsistent with this provision."—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. GREGORY said, he had not seen the words of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade when he gave Notice to move an Amendment; and he still thought that no Commissioner should be allowed to engage in any business which would be inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. Now, however, that he had seen them, he thought they would, to a great extent, meet the object he had in view, and he was therefore prepared to accept them in lieu of his own.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was most essential that the new Railway Commission should be one which had the entire confidence of the country, and he had been most anxious that the members of it should have the same position and receive the same salaries as the Judges of the land. Unfortunately, the salaries had not been fixed at that amount. The House of Lords had pointed out that the blot of the Bill was, that it left it open to the Commissioners to be holders of railway stock or traders, and that was a blot which it was most essential to remove. The Amendment, of which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade gave Notice the other day, would not have met the object in view; but he was glad to say that the words of that Amendment had since been modified to some extent. He thought that the words now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman might be fairly adopted, and that some such words as the following should be inserted in addition—namely, that he shall not actively carry on or exercise any trade or business. He would move such an addition.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by inserting after the word "employment," the words "or actively carry on or exercise any trade or business."—(Mr. Cross.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DILLWYN agreed with almost all that the hon. Gentleman the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) had just said, except with his conclusion. The Bill was an experiment, and everyone was desirous that it should have a fair trial. But if still more stringent limitations were made, it could not succeed; for the Government would not be able to get a good and efficient class of men to perform the duties, and the whole success of the measure depended upon their being able to get the very best men they could. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL also appealed to the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) not to divide the House upon the Amendment. The great objection to his proposal was twofold. The words were much too wide, and they were also inconsistent with their whole object, for they implied that certain trades were consistent with the provisions of the Bill, by affirming that certain trades were not. Everybody desired that these Commissioners should be independent persons; that they should bring to the consideration of the questions involved impartial minds, and should have the confidence of the public. They would stand in the position of Judges; but the hon. Member was going further in this Amendment than any rule that existed in connection with the Judges. These words would create evils rather than remove them, and he hoped they would not be pressed.

MR. W. N. HODGSON said, there were two or three objections to the words which the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the President of the Board of Trade proposed. Supposing a Commissioner carried on a large timber trade, or a large iron trade, or a trade in any article of which railways were large consumers, would it not be a contravention of the ordinary principle which regulated the appointment of judicial officers? What would be said if any of the Judges occupied such a position? He thought that the words which he had proposed when the subject was under discussion on a former occasion would meet the case; but he had no objection to the terms proposed by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire.

MR. MUNTZ preferred the clause proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fortescue) to any of the Amendments which had been proposed. The words were sufficiently clear. The clause would prevent any Commissioners, except by the consent of the parties exercising any jurisdiction in cases in which they might be personally interested, and further required that they should devote the whole of their time to the performance of their duties. He did not see any reason for further limitation or conditions. The powers granted to the Lord Chancellor, in addition to those of the Commissioners, were a sufficient security to the public. He thought it would be persecution to say that a Commissioner should not carry on any trade or business, directly or indirectly, because he might be a director of a water company, a gas company, or of a bank. Moreover, in point of fact, the Amendment would not allow a Commissioner to keep a horse or cow, or cultivate a farm.

Dr. BALL said, the clause proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade ought to be more clearly drawn. Its terms were that a Commissioner "should not accept or hold any office or employment inconsistent with this provision." "Employment" was not a word much used in legal language, and he should interpret it to mean anything that a man was employed in. His criticism was that the term "employment" was of very extensive import in itself. The business of a carrier was entirely inconsistent with the office, and he thought that every precaution should be taken to prevent any personal interest on the part of the Commissioners clashing with the discharge of their public duties. There was no objection to the three gentlemen who had been appointed, but they ought clearly to define the qualifications as regarded their successors.

Mr. MACFIE thought the Amendment of the Amendment did not go far enough.

Mr. LAING urged the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) not to press his Amendment to a division. As far as he knew, the railway interest would deprecate any exclusion of the commercial element from the Commission.

Mr. DENISON supported the appeal. He should be sorry to see any gentleman deprived of a seat on the tribunal, merely because he might happen to have some commercial interest. He must further say, that as the names of the three Commissioners had been already divulged, an impression might, perhaps, be entertained in some quarters that the objections were aimed personally at one of those gentlemen. Now, he had the fullest confidence in the gentlemen who had been nominated, and believing that the words which the right hon. Gentleman had placed on the Paper would carry out the object in view, he trusted that the Amendment would not be further pressed.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, nothing was farther from his intention.

Mr. COLLINS thought the Government had exercised a wise discretion in the course they had adopted with respect to the emoluments of those who were to constitute the railway tribunal.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN expressed a hope that the Amendment would be withdrawn. He wished at the same time to say a word as to the manner in which the business of the Commission should be conducted with respect to Ireland. There was a strong feeling in Ireland that all important questions relating to that country which might come before the Commission should be decided there, and not here—that in these cases of importance, the Commissioners should go over to Ireland, instead of bringing the witnesses over to England. He trusted the Government might be able to hold out some hope of this being done.

Mr. BOURKE was afraid that the 55th clause would enable an unsuccessful litigant to set aside proceedings taken against him, in the event of his being able to show that any Commissioner had an interest, however indirect, in the matter in dispute.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE admitted, with reference to the remarks of some hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the clause was stringent, but did not think it was too stringent; and he was instructed by the highest authority that it accurately represented the present law on the subject.

Mr. TIPPING said, the first consideration was to keep the area of selection as wide as possible, because otherwise the choice of the Government must be limited to a purely professional class.

Mr. T. E. SMITH warned the House against tying up the office with too many restrictions. He thought they ought rather to trust to the honour and good feeling of those persons whom the Government should think fit to recommend for the office, than to rely on provisions for keeping out the possibility of any personal interest being connected with the administration, when such provisions would be wholly ineffectual.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he should withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment to proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Words added.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 10, line 41, "after 'as,' insert 'general,'" read a second time.

Several agreed to.

One amended, and agreed to.

Page 11, line 3, "leave out 'may also, if they think fit,' and insert 'shall,'" the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, it was no doubt in the recollection of the House, that when the Bill was before them in Committee, it was decided that the Commissioners might at their option allow an appeal on points of law, but that that appeal should be imperative whenever the Commissioners were not unanimous. The House of Lords had made the appeal imperative in all cases. He much regretted that change. Even if the Amendment were to be accepted in substance, it went too far, going beyond the properly judicial purposes of the Bill; and it would cover appeals even from arbitrations—a thing unknown at present. He therefore proposed to modify the Lords' Amendment by accepting the word "shall," but inserting after it "in all proceedings before them under sections 5, 10, 11, and 12" (the properly judicial sections of the Act), "and may, if they think fit, in all other proceedings before them under this Act;" thus making the appeal imperative in regard to questions of law, and optional in regard to other questions.

Amendment proposed,

To insert after the word "shall," the words "in all proceedings before them under sections 5, 10, 11, and 12 of this Act, and may, if they think fit, in all other proceedings before them under this Act."—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RATHBONE hoped the House would not accept the Amendment proposed by the Lords, because it was really calculated to destroy entirely the good effects of the Bill. All the Amendments made by the Lords had been in the interests of the companies and not of the public, and he felt so strongly upon it, that he should divide the House, if necessary.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS also hoped the Government would abide by the Bill as it originally stood in this respect.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL differed from the Amendment made in the House of Lords, and he hoped the Amendment of his right hon. Friend would be agreed to.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that as there was no manifestation of feeling on the part of the House in favour of the Lords' Amendment, he was willing to disagree with it entirely.

Proposed Amendment to Lords Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lords Amendment disagreed to.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, referring to the suggestion made by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) that the Commissioners should hear Irish railway cases in Ireland, expressed his own great confidence that that would be the view taken by the Commissioners, and that they would consult the convenience of the Irish public quite as much as that of any other part of the kingdom. It would be difficult to impose absolute orders on such a body on that subject; but the Bill enabled the Commissioners to make rules and general orders for the proper transaction of their business, which rules and orders would be laid on the Table of the House, and it, moreover, required them to fix on the places at which they would transact it.

MR. BAGWELL thought there ought to be some more definite understanding come to that Irish railway business under the Commission should be disposed of in Ireland, and, with that view, would suggest that words to that purpose should be inserted in the Bill.

Subsequent Amendments agreed to.

Committee appointed, "to draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendment to which this House hath disagreed:"—MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, MR. ARTHUR PEEL, MR. BAXTER, MR. GLYN, MR. ADAM, MR. MONK, and MR. CROSS:—To withdraw immediately; Three to be the quorum.

GENERAL VALUATION (IRELAND)

BILL—[BILL 64.]

(Mr. Baxter, The Marquess of Hartington.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it would be for the convenience of hon. Members that this Bill should be taken at a morning sitting, and he should therefore move that it be placed upon the Orders for To-morrow at 2 o'clock. It had already been arranged that the Canada Loan Guarantee Bill would be the first Order, and he proposed to take the General Valuation (Ireland) Bill next.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will To-morrow, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, and several Irish Members, protested against this arrangement, and urged upon the right hon. Gentleman that the Committee should be postponed to Thursday.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "To-morrow, at Two of the clock," in order to insert the words "upon Thursday,"—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen,)—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words 'To-morrow, at Two of the clock,' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 25: Majority 22.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House will To-morrow, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS— CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR. NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BOUVERIE rose to propose that the Select Committee on Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mail Contract do consist of the following Members:—Mr. Dodson, Mr. Benyon, Mr. Leatham, Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Mr. Waterhouse, Sir Edward Colebrooke, Viscount Sandon, Mr. Holms, and Mr. Goschen.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Dodson be one of the Members of the Select Committee on the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mail Contract."—(Mr. Bouverie.)

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that while he had no intention of criticizing any of the names proposed, he objected to the whole mode of nominating the Committee. In his opinion, a Committee appointed to investigate a delicate matter of that sort should have been nominated by the Committee of Selection.

MR. MONK said, he concurred in the views of the noble Lord, and would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Monk.)

Mr. Gladstone

MR. BOUVERIE said, that there was not a proper body in the House to name Committees of this class. The Committee of Selection were appointed to choose the Members of Private Bills Committees, and he understood that they strongly objected to the function of selecting Public Committees being put upon them. As no objection was taken to the names proposed, he saw no necessity for adjourning the debate.

MR. MONK said, he had no objection to the composition of the Committee.

THE O'CONOR DON, as a Member of the Committee of Selection, said they had the strongest objection to having thrown on them the duty of appointing Committees of this kind, as their duties were properly confined to Private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

GENERAL VALUATION (IRELAND) [EXPENSES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the Expenses of making any Revaluation or Revision, and of all Salaries, Allowances, and other Expenses incurred, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session relating to the Valuation of Rateable Property in Ireland.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

NATIONAL DEBT COMMISSIONERS (ANNUITIES) BILL.

On Motion of MR. BAXTER, Bill to facilitate the payment of certain Annuities for life or years payable by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, ordered to be brought in by MR. BAXTER and MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 201.]

GENERAL POLICE AND IMPROVEMENT (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Bill to amend the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE and MR. ORR EWING.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 200.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 24th June, 1873.

Their Lordships met;—and having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

IRELAND—RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, On what principle the valuation of Railways in Ireland is based, and what is the duty of the Commissioner of Valuation respecting its revision; is he bound to revise such valuation each year or not; whether he can explain the grounds on which the valuation of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway, being £28,213 in 1861, was in 1862 reduced without appeal to £14,809, at which amount it continued till 1871, when without appeal it was raised to £14,995, and subsequently, an objection being lodged against it, was raised in 1872 by the Commissioner, first to £17,032, and then to £26,614, the Line having been leased in 1866 to the Dublin and Wicklow Company at a fixed rent of £36,000; and, whether the Commissioner of Valuation is the same gentleman who seconded the adoption of the report at the half-yearly meeting of this Company in August 1867, and who made a speech at the previous half-yearly meeting, showing its prosperity and good management?

MR. BAXTER: I have to state that Railways in Ireland are valued upon net receipts, less allowance for interest on capital, tenants' profits, &c. The Commissioner of Valuation has been advised that he should not exercise the power of revising the valuation of railways in each year unless moved to do so by a ratepayer or other interested person. The Dublin and Kingstown Railway Company remonstrated against the valuation made in 1860—£28,213. Their remonstrance was considered to be well founded. Further allowances were made in diminution, and the valuation was reduced in 1862 to £14,809. These allowances have been sanctioned by the Chairman of the County and the Recorder of the City of Dublin upon appeal. There was no re-valuation in 1871. The increase was caused by improvements and additions to stations, whereby the valuation of the buildings was increased. The rent of £36,000 was decided, at the appeal above mentioned, not to be the measure of value of this railway. The lease included not only the railway, but rolling stock, &c., valued at £60,000, which are not rateable, and houses, &c., which are separately rated. The Commissioner of Valuation is the person who seconded the adoption of the Report referred to. He was not then Commissioner. Immediately upon appointment to that duty he parted with every share he held in Irish railways, at a very considerable loss to himself. I regret that my hon. Friend has thought it necessary to ask the last Question.

FRANCE—THE NEW COMMERCIAL TREATY.—QUESTION.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he could give any information as to the present position in regard to the pending Treaty of Commerce negotiated with France during the Presidency of M. Thiers; and whether, in presence of the fact that on a recent occasion the Minister of Commerce made a public statement before the French Assembly, in which he directly referred to negotiations with Her Majesty's Government for modifications in that Treaty, he would have any objection to lay before the House any Correspondence which may have been exchanged on this subject?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government had not yet received any official communication from the newly constituted Government of France respecting the Treaty of Commerce negotiated with France during the Presidency of M. Thiers, although they had every reason to believe that the subject was engrossing their serious attention. Instructions had been sent to Her Majesty's Representative at Paris with a view to the due protection of British commercial interests; but up to the present moment there had been no Correspondence on the subject which could be presented to Parliament.

CENTRAL ASIA—AFGHANISTAN.

QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government is in possession of Despatches or Documents showing the policy intended by Lord Mayo to be pursued towards Afghanistan?

MR. GRANT DUFF: If my hon. Friend, Sir, means to ask whether there are any Despatches in the India Office signed by Lord Mayo, and referring to the affairs of Afghanistan, my answer must be in the affirmative; but I should be much surprised to learn that Lord Mayo had any policy with regard to Afghanistan different from that of the Government under which he acted.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL TAYLOR said, it would be in the recollection of the House that at an early hour that morning the Prime Minister stated that although the General Valuation (Ireland) Bill would be placed upon the Orders of the Day at the 2 o'clock Sitting, yet that the Canada Loan Guarantee Bill would be the first Order taken. He, in common with a great many other Members, was surprised, therefore, on reading the Papers delivered to Members that morning, to find that the Canada Loan Bill was set down as the ninth Order, and the Valuation (Ireland) Bill as the first Order. On coming down to the House he found that this Order of Business had been altered, and that the Canada Loan Guarantee Bill, which was put down on the blue Notice Paper as the ninth Order, was placed on the white Notice Paper as the First Order of the Day. This had caused very great inconvenience to many hon. Members, and some explanation respecting the discrepancy was due from the Government to the House.

MR. BAGWELL said, it would also be in the recollection of the House that in the course of the discussion which took place at an early hour that morning, all the Irish Members present expressed a wish that the General Valuation (Ireland) Bill should be postponed to Thursday, in order that the attendance of a respectable number of Irish Members might be secured for its discussion. But the Prime Minister with scant courtesy to his supporters on that—the Liberal—side of the House—

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to ask, Sir, whether the hon. Gentleman is justified in the statement he is making.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is in Order in putting any Question to the Government supplementary to that raised by the right hon. Gentleman (Colonel Taylor); but he is not entitled to raise a debate.

MR. BAGWELL said, as the First Lord of the Treasury objected to the phrase he had used, he would endeavour to put his Question in words more Parliamentary. He would, therefore, ask the Prime Minister whether he thought it was respectful or just towards Ireland to place upon the Paper for the consideration of the House a measure of such importance as the General Valuation (Ireland) Bill at a time when it was probable that not one Irish Member would be present to take part in the discussion, or whether the right hon. Gentleman thought that that course of proceeding was calculated to reconcile to his policy the Irish Members who had for so long a time supported the present Government?

MR. MUNSTER wanted to know why the Prime Minister had paid less consideration to the wishes of the large body of Irish Members on this matter than he had shown in acceding to a request preferred by a single Gentleman on the opposite side of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: These Questions appear to me to have in a great degree the merit of originality, because they appear to be speeches with notes of interrogation at the end of them, and I do not know whether it is possible for me to answer them except in a speech. They refer to matters of opinion, and all I can say is that we have endeavoured to proceed with as much consideration as we could to the general arrangement of Business, which we know entails inconvenience. We deeply regret the inconvenience that may be felt, and that is all I can say upon these questions. With respect to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Colonel Taylor), that refers to matters of fact, and he is entitled to some explanation from us. We have no explanation to render as far as regards our own proceedings; but we have endeavoured to inform ourselves upon the matter. The right hon. Gentleman has said truly that it was stated at an early hour this morning that the Canada Loan Guarantee Bill would stand as the first Order of the Day; and I may add that that was also stated at the commencement of Business yesterday and on Friday last. I have no doubt, therefore, that the House fully expected to see it in that position on the Paper this morning. As far as the Government is concerned, I need not say there was no change of intention on their part, which, indeed, would have involved great disrespect to the House and the greatest want of courtesy to hon. Members. The Secretary of the Treasury, as far as he is concerned in the dissemination of information, is perfectly without reproach, and, as might have been expected, there has been no failure or omission of duty on the part of the officers of the House. It appears that the discrepancy has been a pure error of the printer; and it is only fair, in throwing the responsibility upon the printer, that I should render my testimony to the extraordinary accuracy with which the proceedings of the House, often of a hurried and complicated character, taken during late hours of the night, are produced in the printed Papers next morning, and circulated among Members all over London.

CANADA LOAN GUARANTEE BILL.

(Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. Baxter.)

[BILL 159.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN,
in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, there had been two objections taken to the measure, one of them founded upon the general objection to guarantees, and the other upon an allegation that the present proposal was a bribe to the Canadian Legislature, in order to induce them to consent to the Fishery provisions of the Washington Treaty. It was no part of his duty on that occasion to defend the general principle of Colonial guarantees—in fact, he should be ready to accept entirely the speech upon that topic which was made some years ago by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, in which he stated his objection to these guarantees. But even in that speech the right hon. Gentleman was too wise and too far-seeing not to know that no general rule could be laid down upon such a subject, which would not be liable to exception, and stated accordingly that such guarantees should not be given except for objects of broad general policy. For such objects this Bill was now submitted, and the allegation that the guarantee was in the nature of a bribe was not very complimentary to Her Majesty's Government or to the Government of the Dominion. One of the conditions on which the confederation with British Columbia was arranged was that the Government of the Dominion should be responsible for the construction of a railway which should connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of the Dominion. With a debt of some \$80,000,000 and with a revenue of about \$20,000,000, it was no light thing to incur that responsibility; but the circumstances of the case fully justified the action of the Canadian Legislature, because to the confederation of our North American Colonies and the consequent development of their internal resources and increase of population, the far-seeing statesmen of Canada rightly looked for the future progress of their country and the best means of consolidating it upon such a basis as would certainly lead to its permanent wealth and prosperity. Nor must it be supposed that England was entirely uninterested in this matter. With the exception of the Netherlands, there was no country which in proportion to its population took more of English goods than Canada, and if the natural results of the construction of a great railway like the Pacific Railway should follow, if traffic should be developed and population increased, it was hardly possible to doubt that there would be a corresponding increase in the importation of English goods. He did not recommend the guarantee to the House upon that ground; but it was a point which should not be forgotten when they came to the general consideration of this question. Having undertaken the construction of the railroad, the Dominion had certainly done her part. She had given 50,000,000 acres of land for the main line, 25,000 acres per mile for the branch line to Lake Superior, and 20,000 acres per mile for the branch to Manitoba, and she was about to give a subsidy of \$30,000,000 for which in part she now asked the guarantee of England to enable her to raise the money on better terms. Not that the construction of the railway was made to depend upon the guarantee. It was no such thing. It was merely a question of the saving of interest. With regard to the advantage which the guarantee would be to Canada, Sir Francis Hincks, speaking on the 30th of April, 1872, stated that to float a loan of \$40,000,000 the Dominion would have to pay 6 per cent, whereas with half the amount guaranteed by England she would be able to float her own 5 per cent bonds at par, and the guaranteed half could be raised at 4 per cent, making a saving upon the whole of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or equal to \$600,000 a-year. This country would not depend upon, nor was it asked to guarantee, the success of the railway; and upon this point he asked hon. Gentlemen not to be led away into a discussion on the particular line of railway which had been adopted. He had heard in private conversation many persons advocating one or other particular line and speaking about alternative lines, and maintaining that the line sanctioned by the Government of the Dominion was not likely to succeed; but that was part of the question which it was not the business of that House to discuss. The particular line to be adopted and all the arrangements with reference thereto were emphatically questions for the Government of the Dominion to decide, and with which we had nothing to do. Their business was to see that the English taxpayers were safe. That had been taken care of, because their guarantee was the whole of the revenue of Canada, which was in a most flourishing state. This measure had nothing whatever to do with the Fishery provisions of the Washington Treaty, nor had it indeed anything at all to do with the provisions of that Treaty. The negotiation would have occurred even if there had been no High Commission, and in fact the transaction out of which it came occurred months before the appointment of the High Commission. The House was perfectly aware of the facts connected with the Fenian raid in Canada. In 1870 the Postmaster General of Canada was sent to this country to bring under the notice of Her Majesty's Government various questions connected with the Dominion, and Lord Kimberley, writing to Sir John Young, now Lord Lisgar, on the 27th of July, 1870, with reference to an interview with that gentleman, used these words—

VOL. CCXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

"Mr. Campbell pressed strongly upon me that a representation should be made to the United States Government with reference to the late Fenian incursion into Canada, which has awakened such just feelings of indignation in the Dominion, and he urged the claims of Canada for reparation for the losses which she has sustained by that incursion. Her Majesty's Government have carefully considered what steps it would be advisable to take in this matter, and I have to acquaint you that they are of opinion that, in the first instance, your Ministers should draw up a full and authentic statement of the facts, and of the claims which they found upon them; this statement should be transmitted by you to Her Majesty's Government, in order that it may be laid by them before the Government of the United States."

The argument of Canada was that having no control whatever over the affairs of Ireland she had been, in consequence of certain events which had discontented persons connected with that country, exposed to a raid from the territory of a neighbouring Power, and that under these circumstances some one must be responsible for the losses she had incurred. When these claims had been brought under the notice of the British High Commissioners, the American Government declined to allow them to form part of the reference to arbitration, and Lord Kimberley, writing on the 20th of June, 1871, said it was with regret we acquiesced in their omission from the general settlement of outstanding questions; but it was evident that the British Commissioners were right in thinking that there was no reasonable probability for further pressing the point of coming to an agreement with the American Commissioners in regard to it. There being a prospect of the settlement of all the other differences between the two countries upon terms honourable to both. Her Majesty's Government thought it better to waive the question of the Canadian claims rather than lose the opportunity of settling differences which they had been striving for years to get rid of. There was no doubt some discontent in the Dominion at the course which was taken; but Her Majesty's Government felt it their duty to adhere to their determination; and on the 20th of January, 1872, the Canadian Government drew up a Minute, which was forwarded to this country, in which the proposal of the guarantee was made. Let it be observed that this was not an offer made by Her Majesty's Government to Canada, but, on the contrary, it was the Government of the Dominion who proposed it to us. His idea of a bribe was an offer by some party to another party in order to induce the second party to do something which was desired by the first; but in this case the Government of the Dominion were quite ready to do that which Her Majesty's Government desired without any consideration. But they desired to have this question of the Fenian raids, a question between Canada and ourselves, separate and distinct from other questions, settled at the same time with the Treaty, and they accordingly made this proposal. By a telegram just received he was able to say that Proclamation had appeared in The Canada Gazette to the effect that the Treaty provisions would take effect on July 1st, so that Canada had performed her part, and it only remained for the House to decide upon the proposal before them that we might perform ours. But though this was proposed as a settlement of all questions between Canada and ourselves, it was not an abandonment of these claims on our part, and if we chose to-morrow to advance claims against the United States in respect of the Fenian claims, there was nothing to prevent us from doing so. We did not require to bribe the Canadian Parliament to assent to the provisions of the Treaty--the Fishery provisions of the Treaty were always popular in the districts affected by them, and the opposition came from the inland provinces, who desired to wring from the United States a policy more favourable to themselves in reference to the Reciprocity Treaty. That was a great mistake; for the refusal to renew the Reciprocity Treaty had, like the removal of protective duties in this country, given an immense impulse to trade; and measures had been taken which must materially increase the prosperity of Canada. But with respect to the question of "a bribe," he would quote the words of Sir Francis Hincks in the same speech to which he had already referred. Sir Francis Hincks, speaking as the Finance Minister of Canada, said—

"The idea of asking money as a bribe was never thought of, but there was a claim on some one for Fenian losses, and the Imperial Government recognized the fact that they had incurred a responsibility to Canada on that account. True, the admission was very guarded, and it is very doubtful whether any amount worth consideration could have been obtained. At all events, the Dominion Government had not the slightest doubt that the best mode of settling these claims was by guarantee, and they deemed it expedient to announce their intention of proposing the measures necessary to give effect to the Treaty concurrently with the proposal for a guarantee."

The House would observe that this guarantee was of a twofold character. There was the £2,500,000, the origin of which he had explained, and there was a sum of £1,100,000 proposed to be transferred from the purpose for which it was intended in 1870—the purpose of fortifications—to the more peaceful purpose of the execution of works of internal improvement. It was not to be supposed that Canada abandoned all idea of fortification. She took the responsibility upon herself, and desired, as she had a right to desire, to choose her own time for the erection of fortifications when she should deem them necessary. Upon this matter Her Majesty's Government had had the advantage of consulting the late Sir George Cartier, upon his recent visit to England, in his capacity of Dominion Minister of Militia and Defence. And here he paused for a moment to pay a tribute of respect to one who was a most worthy son of Canada and a valuable servant of the Crown, of great and conspicuous ability—of highly cultured mind and powerful intellect. He reckoned it a privilege to count among his personal friends Sir George Cartier, whose loss would be severely felt by the country which he served. The wise, loyal, and patriotic way in which Sir George Cartier exercised his justly great influence over those of his own origin and religion in Canada would be long remembered; and, although he had passed away from among us, his example would still be felt, and the sentiments which he held, and the opinions which he cherished, would find their place in the hearts of very many of the population of the Dominion. It was Sir George Cartier's opinion that this transfer of the Canadian Fortification Loan should be made; and, indeed, that the true fortification of Canada would be found rather in the development of her internal resources, the improvement of her internal communications and the bringing of population to her shores, than in the erection of half-a-dozen fortresses at double or treble the expense. He felt confident that the sentiments which Sir George Cartier inspired and the opinions on which he acted had not died with him. They were widely diffused throughout the Dominion of Canada, and he felt sure that, though there were few who could emulate the brilliancy of Sir George Cartier's talents, there were many who would follow the example of his loyalty. Sir George Cartier came to this country and brought this subject specially under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. It was never the intention of the Canadian Government to abandon altogether the idea of the fortifications; she made herself responsible for them, and Her Majesty's Government thought, and no doubt the House would also think, that it was right to leave Canada to judge for herself when the fortifications should be made. When Canada desired that this loan should be devoted to other purposes Her Majesty's Government exercised a wise discretion in assenting to it. The true policy of Canada depended not on the erection of a fort here and there, but on developing her resources, and he believed the people of Canada would do more for the defence of that country by making this railway than if they were to construct half-a-dozen fortifications. He wished the House distinctly to understand that in assenting to the second reading of this Bill they were neither approving nor disapproving the policy of the Treaty of Washington, but were merely giving to the people of Canada a cordial expression of that goodwill which the people of Canada richly deserved. He had been sometimes taunted with speaking too warmly on the subject of the Colonies, and attributed too high a value to the connection between this country and her colonies. But he had nothing to retract or qualify, and he could not but speak warmly of those who had so often proved their affection to Great Britain. Throughout these proceedings the Canadian people had followed a wise and patriotic course. They had shown an unswerving loyalty to the British Crown and a devoted attachment to British connection. It was not because he believed the material prosperity of Canada would be affected by the proposed guarantee—not because of the value of the gift, but rather as an earnest of our cordial goodwill and kindly feeling to the people of Canada that he recommended this Bill to the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE—Mr. Speaker: By no effort on my part could I put my case against this Bill in a better position than that in which it stands at this moment, after the defence made by my right hon. Friend. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Sir Charles Adderley) is not in his place. In 1867 the then Conservative Government proposed a guarantee of a railway loan for Canada. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire, in moving the Resolution, spoke as follows:—

"not one word would fall from him approving in the abstract of guarantees of colonial loans. He had always thought, and whenever the subject was under consideration, as it had been too often, he had expressed his decided opinion, that they were a feature of the worst possible relations between this country and the colonies, bad enough for this country, but still worse for the interests of the colonies. He sincerely hoped that this colonial guarantee would be the last proposed to Parliament, or if proposed, the last that Parliament would be disposed to grant."—[3 Hansard, clxxxvi. 736.]

The right hon. Gentleman went on to give the most binding pledges on the part of Canada as to the application of the money—pledges of which we since have seen the value. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who opposed the guarantee, said that the chief argument in its support was that we had—

"in some degree debauched the minds of the colonists by being over-ready with our men in defending them, and over-ready with our money in the way of military expenditure. This is all exceedingly true; but how does this prove that we ought to guarantee them £3,000,000 more. It seems to me that the argument goes exactly the contrary way. If we are to teach our colonies self-reliance, and if they are really to undertake their own defence, we should not commence by furnishing them with British credit."—[Ibid. 759.]

After this strong speech the right hon. Gentleman divided the House against the guarantee, but without success. In 1869 an hon. Member rose in this House, and showed in the most conclusive way that in spite of the strong provisions by which the application of the loan had been guarded, the money had been misapplied. Instead of being employed upon the railway, a portion of it had actually been spent in redeeming the debts of the Dominion. The most that the Prime Minister could find to say in defence of the conduct of the Canadian Government was that "the Act of Parliament was not a clear and satisfactory Act of Parliament." A second debate took place upon a similar subject in 1869, on the second reading of the Canada (Rupert's Land) Loan Bill. This Bill was defended by the Government upon the ground that it grew out of negotiations which had begun in 1865. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) and myself, in opposing that Bill, said that we did not intend to divide the House provided that we obtained a distinct pledge for the future. We pointed out that the Premier had expressed strong objections to the principle of guaranteeing loans to colonies, and the Premier told the House, in reply, that—

"He did not recede from the expressions which had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester. He was ready to repeat them . . . but, the Government wished to wind up the old system and see the North American colonies make a new start in colonial life; and we could not have extricated ourselves from the vicious system to which he had referred without paying for it. Neither in public nor in private life could one escape the consequences of former errors without some cost. To put an end to the old system once and for all, the Government made arrangements with Canada which bound them to ask Parliament to assist the North American Provinces with the Imperial credit. . . . That was not to be a beginning, but an end."—[3 Hansard, cxviii. 1329-30.]

In 1870 there was another debate upon a Canadian guarantee—the fortification loan—which again was only proposed as part of the arrangement made in 1865, and, in the debate, when a quotation was made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1867 against colonial guarantees, the Premier replied that he entirely approved of those views, but that he regarded the fortification loan as part of an old case. So much for the modern history of colonial guarantees, from which it appears that both front benches are deeply pledged to propose no more. Now, Sir, let us look for a moment at what may be said in the abstract of colonial guarantees. We must look at them as though we might some day be called upon to pay the money. We should look at them as reducing our own credit, while they raise that of the colonies concerned. We should look at them as an individual would at a bill that he was asked to back. Each colony can borrow upon those terms to which its own credit entitles it, and when we make use of our credit to assist a colony to borrow on easier terms than its own credit can command, we should remember that we directly encourage extravagance in the colony itself, and, also, that if we are to lend the colonies our credit, they should, on the other hand, take upon them a portion of the interest of our debt. Lord Granville was stating the opinion of the present Government on these guarantees, when, on the 10th of May, 1870, he wrote that the Government did but repeat

"the settled judgment of Parliament in stating their opinion that except for the most special reasons the practice of guaranteeing loans to self-governing colonies is generally injurious to them, and also to the parent State."

From this survey of the history, and examination of the merits of colonial guarantees, we may, I think, assume that, so strong are the arguments against them, that, this new Canadian loan of £3,600,000 will probably be defended, in part at least, as a payment to Canada for services rendered by Canada to us. Let us turn to the Correspondence. In it we find a number of subjects muddled together, which have no conceivable connection. The Canadians state their grievances in reference to the withdrawal of the troops, the Fenian Raids, the trespasses on their Fishing grounds, and the Pacific railway. As for the troops, their withdrawal was contemplated, and disallowed, as it were, in the discussions on those previous loans to which I have made allusion. There remain three other points. As to the Fisheries and the Fenian Claims, Canada made complaints against America, which we took upon ourselves to refer to a Commission. There results a Treaty which deals with the Fisheries case. In his despatch of 17th June, 1871, Lord Kimberley shows that the Treaty is a fair one towards Canada, and cuts away from under the feet of the Government one argument which they might have used in support of the guarantee—namely, that it was a payment made to Canada for concessions as to the Fisheries, without other consideration, and for the benefit of England. There is no need that I should go into the arguments by which Lord Kimberley showed that Canada was no loser by the Treaty. They may be right, or they may be wrong, but no one can deny that they are in the despatch—that they bind the Government, and that they force us to believe that the Government does not look upon this guarantee as a payment for concessions on this point. In another despatch Lord Kimberley repeats that the Government remain of the opinion, “that, looked at as a whole, the Treaty is beneficial to the interest of the Dominion.” What was the Canadian reply? why, simply this—that they would not accept the Treaty unless we gave them £4,000,000. Lord Kimberley’s despatches are all short; but Lord Lisgar’s despatch of the 22nd of January of last year is a model of brevity—

“He has the honour to enclose a minute of the Canadian Privy Council, which conveys the reply to Lord Kimberley’s despatch, and urges the request of an Imperial guarantee to a Canadian loan, not to exceed £4,000,000. This proposal the Council recommend as in their opinion the best mode of adjusting all demands on the score of the Fenian Claims, and of surmounting the difficulties in the way of obtaining the consent of the Canadian Parliament to the Treaty.”

What was the answer of the Government? Why, that they would not give £4,000,000, but £2,500,000, or, if the fortification guarantee was surrendered, then £3,600,000, and this on the understanding that Canada abandoned all claims on account of the Fenian Raids. Not a word about the Fisheries—the application for the first time was put wholly upon the Fenian Raids. That is to say, that if Canada had any legitimate claim upon the United States, arising out of the Fenian Raids, we prefer to make it good ourselves rather than ask the United States for the money. Why? Because, if we did not pay, after refusing to ask America, the Canadians would reject the Treaty. That is to say, we are buying our Treaty from Canada, buying it for whatever the peace and quiet we get from it are worth. Now, Sir, it has been maintained that this loan is a loan for the purpose of aiding the general development of Canada, and not a bribe. How can that view be maintained in face of the Canadian despatch of 15th April, 1872, in which Canada states its case as follows:—

“It appears that, on their part, Her Majesty’s Government will engage, that, when the Treaty shall have taken effect, by the issue of a proclamation they will propose to Parliament to guarantee a Canadian loan, on the understanding that Canada abandons all claims upon England on account of the Fenian Raids.”

I really am at a loss to conceive how it can be said, after the receipt of this despatch, that this guarantee is not the payment of hush money. I refuse to go into detail as to the manner in which the money, when obtained, is to be expended. It does not matter what they do with it. I am told that they intend to spend it on a productive railroad through a howling wilderness, and that much jobbery is connected with the scheme, but my hon. Friend the Member for Wenlock (Mr. Brown) will give the House information upon these points. All that we have to ask ourselves is whether they ought to have the money. The naked fact is this—that you think the Fenian claims fair claims, else you would not venture to ask at all for this money—that these claims, which you think fair claims, you have refused to press, and that you give Canada hush-money to say no more about them. How far are you going to carry this principle? It is because I do not know to what extent the precedent is to be applied that I move the rejection of the Bill.

Mr. BROWN seconded the Amendment, for reasons stated by the hon. Member for Chelsea, but in addition to those reasons he would point out that this Bill guaranteed, not only the principal, but the interest. It was most improbable that the line on account of which this guarantee was to be given could ever command a remunerative through traffic. There would be three competing lines, one of which was already completed, while the other two were in progress. The land grants in connection with this line were worthless, because the country was without population, and must remain without it. Dividing the line into three principal sections, in all, except the Vancouver section, the line passed through a wild country, where the climate was of a most severe and even frightful character. He spoke from experience of the Red River district—from 300 to 400 miles south of the tract of the proposed line—and even that district would never attract emigrants in any large numbers, because of the severity of its winters and the fearful storms with which it was visited. It had been supposed that there might be a through traffic derived from the port of Quebec; but Quebec was for many months of the year blocked up with ice, and a line there could not successfully compete with American lines, which could run winter and summer. No doubt on the western portion of the line the country was a very much better one; but emigration to that country must come from the seaboard, and could not be developed along such a long line of country by a single railway. In addition to this there were great engineering difficulties to overcome, which must cost much money; and he hoped that the Government would withhold their hands from this guarantee until they saw a chance of it becoming a commercial success.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought that the Canadian Parliament might be trusted to decide the question whether this line of railway was the best one that could be proposed. He had heard very different descriptions of the country from that just given, and he would remind the House of the evidence given on this subject before the Committee of 1857. He ventured to say that the construction of the line would involve this country in no risk whatever. All we were asked to do was to guarantee the money simply because we could borrow cheaper than Canada could, and the construction of such a line would be most important to the prosperity of the district and the development of its resources. The question ought not to be looked at apart from the great attachment which Canada had shown to this country. Because this was a loan which involved no risk to the people of this country, and because, even if it did involve a risk, it was the interest of the Empire that some sacrifice should be made in order to preserve our relations with our colonies, he would cordially support the second reading of the Bill.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN lent the Bill a reluctant support, solely on the ground that it repealed the Canada Defence Loans Act, which authorized a scheme burdensome to Canada, irritating to the United States, compromising to this country, and altogether futile as a plan for the defence of Canada.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill. He believed that nothing could be more important to Canada than the proposed line of communication, of which nature already, by means of water, furnished one-half. No doubt for 500 miles, from Lake Superior to Fort Garry, there was a bad kind of country; but beyond that the country was of a most favourable kind. Further, the political advantages of the railway could not be over-stated.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was glad to see that the House generally appeared to be favourable to the measure; but he felt, at the same time, that the speeches of the hon. Members who moved and seconded the Amendment (Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Brown) ought not to pass without a word from him, signifying how entirely the Government sustained this proposal which had been made by his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) on the part of the Dominion of Canada. The question between those who opposed the measure and the Government was capable of being reduced to a very narrow issue. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) described the measure as a scheme for our guaranteeing on behalf of the Dominion of Canada a loan of £3,600,000; but, in so doing, the hon. Baronet was inaccurate, inasmuch as £1,100,000 of that sum represented the amount we had already guaranteed for a loan of money to be expended on military works for the defence of Canada; and the present proposal, as far as that sum was concerned, was merely to appropriate it to the construction of works of peace and internal development, instead of military works. As to the expediency of this part of the proposal, he thought there would not be much dispute. The main question in dispute, therefore, was as to the new guarantee of £2,500,000, and he wished to state what the views of the Government with regard to the nature and character of this guarantee were. In the first place, the Government did not think that a vote of the House in favour of the Bill could be taken as implying or conveying any sort of approval on its part of the policy which the Government had pursued with regard to the claims of Canada on America with reference to the Fenian Raids. If the House were to pass this Bill, it would still be open to it to challenge the proceedings of the Government with regard to those claims in any way it pleased. The House might challenge the conduct of the Government in that matter on two grounds—first, it might ask were the Government right in removing the Canadian claims to compensation in respect of the Fenian Raids from the scope of the negotiations at Washington—on which subject up to the present moment the House had expressed no opinion whatever—and, secondly, were the Government right in not having up to the present moment urged upon the United States any pecuniary claim on behalf of Canada in respect of the Fenian Raids, independently of the Treaty of Washington? Those questions it was perfectly open to the House to discuss; but they were in no way connected with or involved in the present proposal. The aim of the present proposal was to place Canada outside entirely any question as to Fenian Raids. Neither had the House anything to do with the former guarantees at the present time. All arguments ad homines founded on the speeches which had been made on former occasions passed innocently over the heads of the Government because they referred to distinctly different matters. The guarantees of 1867, 1869, and 1870, to which the hon. Baronet who moved the Amendment referred, were the price which we had had to pay for extricating ourselves from a false and mischievous colonial policy, and those guarantees had most vitally and essentially aided us in getting rid of that policy. This guarantee had nothing to do with the very important question which had been argued by his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) and his hon. Friend the Member for Wenlock (Mr. Brown), as to the goodness or the badness of this railway scheme. What they had to look to was the credit of Canada, and all that the nation guaranteed was the credit of Canada. In Canada, where there was an object in binding men together in remote points on the surface of the earth, there was something to be considered beyond the dividend; but the English nation had nothing at all to do with the railway. It was not for the House to question the judgment of the Government of Canada with respect to a great internal undertaking of this kind. He must say, however, parenthetically, that his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham had not taken a true view of that matter. If the Government and people of Canada were disposed to undertake some risk for the purpose of constructing a railway which they thought was a great political and national object, they should rather gain credit and applause at our hands than adverse criticism. It had commonly been said that this guarantee was a bribe to Canada, or that it was "hush money" to Canada, or a payment to Canada for services rendered. In the view of the Government we had no right to dogmatize on the matter, or to dictate to the Parliament or the Government of Canada in what light they should view it. But he submitted that it was no bribe, no "hush money," and no payment for services rendered. It was not a reward to Canada for her acknowledgment of the Washington Treaty. The Treaty of Washington was recommended by Her Majesty's Government to Canada upon its own merits. They believed it would be most valuable to Canada on its own merits. Her Majesty's Government had never hinted that there was any connection between this guarantee and the Washington Treaty further than this—that Her Majesty's Government were not willing to enter into any arrangement except a complete one; and, consequently, it was their opinion that the whole matter as between Canada and the United States should be disposed of.

Mr. Gladstone

Now, what was this guarantee which Her Majesty's Government proposed to Parliament? It was the acknowledgment and the liquidation of a just debt. That was a debt which Her Majesty's Government proposed to liquidate in the form of money; but the Government of Canada represented to them that if the liquidation were put in the form of a guarantee it would be more acceptable and more beneficial to Canada. They had acknowledged the debt, and they would have to pay it; and the question was, whether the House of Commons would adopt and affirm that portion of the proceedings of the Government? Was the debt a just one? In the view of the Government it was clear that Canada suffered pecuniary losses from the Fenian Raids. Did she so suffer in consequence of anything she did or omitted to do? On the contrary, she suffered exclusively and entirely on account of her connection with England, and we had acknowledged this as constituting a just claim against us. Therefore, this question had nothing whatever to do with colonial policy. He therefore hoped that the House would consider the proposal of the Government to be a right one, and as such he hoped the Bill would meet with approval.

MR. MACFIE said, they had been told that Canada ought to judge for herself upon the subject of defence; but, in his opinion, this was decidedly an Imperial question. He hoped the report of this debate, when it reached Canada and our other colonies, would show that the mother country had a regard for all her colonies, and would inspire a wish in the colonies for the existence of a confederation in which the colonies would pay their fair share of the burdens which belonged not merely to the mother country, but to the colonies also.

The House divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 15: Majority 102.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

BILL.—[BILL 64.]

(Mr. Baxter, the Marquess of Hartington.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Baxter.)

MR. KAVANAGH moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, his object being to secure for this Bill the mature consideration which its importance deserved, and to save it from being hustled through the House on a day when it was known long before that many Members would not be present to discuss it. The Bill raised a number of most important points, and ought to be well considered in its details, which could only be done by a Select Committee. The Chief Secretary for Ireland proposed to insert in the Bill one of the most extraordinary clauses ever seen. The real meaning of that clause was that this Valuation Bill should increase the property of landlords for the sake of taxation, while leaving tenants altogether untouched in that way. That was very like making fish of one and fowl of another. The proposal of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) was not a practicable one, and, tried by the light of right and wrong, it was iniquitous.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, in seconding the Amendment, said, he thought he never read a Bill which better deserved to be referred to a Select Committee. If it were passed in its present shape it would give rise to much litigation, and the Judges themselves would be puzzled to interpret it. He held in his hand several Acts of Parliament which this Bill would affect. Repealing some 48 clauses and retaining 17. Even the smallest bit of patronage was not to be left under the Bill to those who were responsible for the peace and tranquillity of Ireland; but the whole was to be centred in two or three Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury, one of whom, no doubt, would be the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in whom the people of Ireland placed the most implicit confidence. [A laugh.] Was this, he asked, a day on which such a Bill as this ought to be brought forward—a day on which the great body of the Members of the House of Commons were taking a holiday? The object of the Government was to get the Bill passed in a thinly-attended House; and it reminded him that the 17 Vict. which transferred powers always previously exercised by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, must have been smuggled through the House at a time of the night when most of the Members had left and were in their beds. This Bill involved a departure from the system of valuation which had been in operation since 1826, and he must enter his emphatic protest against proceeding with so important a measure at this advanced stage of the Session. Under the clause of the noble Lord referred to by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Kavanagh) the tenant would have to pay his proportion of any addition that might be made to the taxation of the country, and the clause was naked justice, without it the tenant would lose a large portion of those rights conferred on him by the Land Act. The Bill raised important questions, similar to those arising on the Bill which the President of the Local Government Board had introduced with respect to England. It was doubtful whether the English Bill could be passed this year; and instead of attempting to legislate for Ireland at this period of the Session it would be better to wait, and meanwhile have this measure properly considered by a Select Committee. There had been three or four Select Committees appointed lately, on no one of which had an Irish Member been appointed; and, for his part, he should have been glad if he had the opportunity of even being a listener on one of those Committees. There were many points which required consideration in legislating for Ireland upon this subject. According to the present law no re-valuation could be made without the assent of the Grand Jury of the county, but that provision was left out of this Bill, and it was now proposed that a re-valuation might be made at the end of 14 years at the will of the Commissioners of the Treasury. He objected to giving to the Commissioners of the Treasury a power of this kind, which might upset the relations between landlord and tenant. He had placed Amendments on the Paper with the object of restoring this Bill as far as possible to the footing of the Acts which it was proposed to repeal; but he hoped the Government would not persevere with the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Kavanagh),—instead thereof.

Mr. BRUEN inquired for what reason this Bill had been brought in. A hint which had fallen from the Secretary of the Treasury suggested that a grievance existed in the North of Ireland; but, for his part, he believed no other reason was to be assigned for its introduction than the necessity of an increased flow of money into the Treasury, caused by the policy of the Government which had stinted that flow lately. Not a single Grand Jury had asked for a measure of this kind. He had opposed the second reading of the Bill, and he now cordially supported the Amendment of his hon. Colleague (Mr. Kavanagh). It was impossible to deal with the details of this measure in a Committee of the Whole House. Not only could the details of the Bill be best considered in a Select Committee, but it would be a waste of time to discuss them in the House, particularly as it was unlikely the Bill could pass this Session, and many Irish Members must soon absent themselves from Parliament in order to discharge other duties. He hoped that the Government would consider the question, but not as a party one.

Mr. MUNTZ said, he could not understand why there need be separate legislation for Ireland on this subject until he discovered in this Bill a clause the introduction of which into the English Bill, the Government, with their dead-weight supporters, stoutly resisted; and then he inferred the reason for dealing separately with Ireland was that, if anything went wrong there, there would be a row. He asked why the Government had left stock-in-trade out of this Bill, and, though he opposed the reference of the English Bill to a Select Committee, he found so little knowledge of the subject displayed in Committee of the Whole House that he would vote for referring this Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. BAXTER said, that one reason for dealing separately with Ireland was that it had possessed for a long time a system of valuation superior to that of England; and, as its system of valuing machinery worked extremely well, he had, at the unanimous request of the Irish Members, consented to omit the stock-in-trade clause. The Government had no intention to deal with this as a party question. He did not see why a Committee of the Whole House should not dispose satisfactorily of the Amendments of which Notice had been given. He failed to gather from the speech of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh) reasons for sending this Bill to a Select Committee; because all those hon. Members who had given Notice of Amendments on the Bill were in their places, and therefore there was no reason why the subjects contained in the Bill on which there was a difference of opinion should not be discussed at once. A great objection to sending the Bill before a Select Committee was that all the points in it that might be settled upstairs would have to be re-discussed in that House when the Bill came down again. Only those measures which involved dry and technical details which could not be conveniently discussed in that House ought to be referred to a Select Committee, and therefore he hoped that the House would consent to go into Committee upon the Bill.

MR. C. E. LEWIS said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter) had done his best on the part of the Government to meet the conflicting wishes of various Irish Members. It was difficult to discover what subjects should be referred to a Select Committee; but they had found recently that when the mistakes or the peccadilloes of a Government Department were brought before the House the Government thought these were proper subjects to go to a Select Committee. When the question whether a contract had been imprudently made by a Minister, or whether a great Government Board had acted justly, was brought before the House, some right hon. Gentleman behind the Treasury bench rose and proposed that it should be referred to a Select Committee. He (Mr. Lewis) thought that these were subjects eminently fit for discussion and decision in the House. This Bill, however, involved a number of questions of dry and technical detail, and these, he contended, were matters which could be best discussed by a Select Committee. He trusted that on this occasion the Members for Ireland would be found voting together, and that the matter would be referred to a Select Committee.

THE O'CONOR DON joined with the hon. Member who spoke last, in expressing his obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury for the desire he had manifested on all previous occasions, to convenience the Irish Members, but he regretted that the Bill had been brought forward that day, when so many were unavoidably absent. He was perfectly convinced that English Members did not understand the bearings of this Bill. For the last few weeks the House had been engaged, day after day, in most careful investigations and interesting discussions as to the principles on which certain classes of property should be rated in England. The principles on which mines, woods, game, fisheries, and other classes of property should be valued for rating purposes had all been most carefully considered and exhaustively discussed, and he fancied that if any hon. Member had got up on the Treasury bench and suggested that all this was superfluous, and that the House ought to pass a simple clause leaving the whole of this matter to the discretion of a Treasury official, such a suggestion would be scouted with the utmost contempt. Yet this was what was done in Ireland. This was what was proposed to be continued under this Bill. There was not one single clause in this Bill regulating the principle on which mines, woods, fisheries, or railways were to be valued. All was left to the discretion of the Commissioner of valuation, who was a Government officer under the Treasury. Such a proposal as this would not be listened to for a moment, if applied to England. His objections of the proposal were not mere theoretical objections. He wished to point out how this system had worked in the past. At the commencement of the sitting that day he had asked a question with respect to the valuation of one railway in Ireland, and what were the facts elicited? That railway had been valued in 1861 at £28,000. The next year it was reduced, without any appeal, to less than half, to little over £14,000, and at that low figure it remained till 1872, although in 1865 it had been leased to another company at an annual rent, free of all charges, of £36,000. In 1871, an individual ratepayer complained and gave notice of appeal, and then the Commissioner of valuation raised the valuation from £14,000 first to £17,000, and the ratepayer still objecting, subsequently in the same year, and, of course, on the same data to £27,000. His right hon. Friend admitted all these facts, and he further admitted that the present Commissioner of valuation was a leading shareholder in that company. It was true that in 1862, when the valuation was reduced, he was not nominally Commissioner, but he was practically so, as he was the chief superintendent under Sir Richard Griffith, who had so many other things to attend to that practically the valuation service was conducted by the then General Superintendent, now the Commissioner. He quoted this to show the abuses which had arisen in Ireland, and which were possible under this Bill, and he regretted as much as his right hon. Friend the necessity for referring to them, but he felt that it was monstrous to entrust such powers to any Government official, and that if the measure were thoroughly understood in England it would not be tolerated for a moment. He had many other objections to this Bill, which he had stated on other occasions, and he believed that many of its details would be best settled in a Select Committee. He did not wish to pretend to the House that he was a Friend to the Bill—he would gladly see it beaten; but, at the same time, he believed that reference to a Select Committee would not retard, but rather hasten its progress, whilst he hoped it would very materially aid in improving its details. He, therefore, cordially supported the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlow.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE reminded the House that a Select Committee had already sat the entire Session and half of another Session upon the question connected with this Bill. It appeared to him that it would be a better course to postpone legislation altogether upon this subject until another Session than to refer it now to a Select Committee, which at that period of the year would be an indirect mode of shelving the matter. He did not wish to press on a measure of this kind; but considering the steadily increasing scale of prices, he was of opinion that the longer a valuation was delayed the higher it would be. There were many points in the Bill which a Select Committee could not decide, and which must be referred back to that House. He would remind the House that under the provisions of the Bill the new Jury Act would become operative, as it would be the very same class of persons who would be summoned to serve who were summoned at present, as the man whose holding was now valued at £20 would have it then valued at £30. The Government would, he believed, have very little difficulty with the Bill were it not for one clause of a very extraordinary character, which had been introduced by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and which was to the effect that however much the valuation of property might be increased in Ireland it should, so far as the Irish Land Act was concerned, remain perfectly stationary. On looking at the Act, however, and referring to the discussions upon it in that House, he was prepared to maintain that the Government were under no obligation not to alter the valuation of property in Ireland in reference to it, while he was of opinion that there might be a valuation in the interests of the whole country as soon as possible.

MR. M'LAREN said, he could not understand why hon. Gentlemen who represented Ireland should make any objection to the system of rating and taxation which prevailed in that country. See the difference between the system of taxing which prevailed in Scotland and Ireland. Opposition to the Bill had been made on the plea that it would have the effect of increasing the valuation of property in Ireland. There was a valuation in Scotland every year, and the effect had been to increase the valuation of property every 12 months. He wished to know why Ireland should be exempted from such a natural consequence? In Scotland a blank form was sent round to every proprietor of land and tenant occupier of land at a certain period in every year, and if any person to whom these forms were addressed were found to make false Returns, they laid themselves open to the infliction of very serious penalties. And then, again, see the difference between what was proposed in the Bill before the House and the law of Scotland with regard to drainage works. In Scotland, as soon as it was discovered that money raised for drainage purposes realized 5 or 6 per cent, such money was immediately subjected to income tax. By the Bill before the House, all such property would be exempted from income tax for a certain number of years. Why should this difference be made between Scotland and Ireland? And further, see the difference made between Scotland and Ireland with regard to the payment of income tax on account of landed property. In Ireland, if a gentleman had £1,000 a-year from landed property, he was rated at only £800. If a gentleman had landed property in Scotland realizing £1,000 a-year, he had to pay income tax on the whole £1,000. Why should such differences as these exist in the United Kingdom? Now that the Government had agreed to give up the privilege it possessed of having Government buildings free from taxation, it was nearly time that these exemptions which Ireland possessed with regard to taxation should be also done away with. The fact was that all such exemptions should be abolished, and the whole United Kingdom placed on an equality with regard to the payment of taxes. Under the existing system a practical injustice was done to one part of the United Kingdom, to the advantage of another. As a step in the right direction, he would give his support to the Bill now before the House.

COLONEL TAYLOR said, he thought the Bill in its original shape a good one, and he had no wish to delay its passing; but he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh), in order to give the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland an opportunity of reconsidering the very monstrous proposition to which reference had just been made.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the Bill required that fair and legitimate consideration which could only be given to it in a Select Committee, and he hoped that the Government would accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlow.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was aware that a great deal of the opposition offered to the Bill at that stage was owing, as they had been told, to a clause which he had placed on the Paper; but he could not admit that that clause deserved to be described, as it had been, as monstrous and unjust. If the House had gone into Committee, he thought he should have been able to show that the clause was a just one. It was perfectly well known when the Irish Land Act was passed that the valuation of Ireland, although very unequal as between one part of the country and another, was in a very great portion of Ireland very much below the letting value. The operation of the present Bill without the clause of which he had given Notice, would be to remove a very large class of tenants from the position in which they were deliberately placed by the House three years ago; and as the Government and the House had been most unwilling to disturb the settlement arrived at by the Land Act in favour either of the landlord or of the tenant until they had seen its fair working, his clause would correct what in practice was a serious alteration of the Land Act. The Government, however, could not conceal from themselves the importance of the significant opposition coming from Gentlemen opposite, who, by reinforcing the original opponents of the measure sitting on his side, might prevent any reasonable chance of its passing through a Committee of the Whole House this Session. The Government had not thought the Bill one that could with any great advantage be referred to a Select Committee; but it must be admitted that the ingenuity of hon. Members that afternoon had shown that any conceivable number of points might be raised for discussion in Committee. Under those circumstances the Government would propose to adjourn the present debate for a couple of days or so, in the course of which they would endeavour to ascertain whether it would be possible to appoint a Select Committee which would go through the Bill this Session. If so, they would accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh). If not, they would not attempt to make any further progress with the measure this Session.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN, in reference to the noble Lord's remark about the ingenuity of the opposition offered to the Bill, said, there was every disposition on his—the Opposition—side of the House to do every justice to the merits of the measure, and go through its details with a view to its passing this Session.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL. [BILL 21.]

(Sir David Wedderburn, Mr. Carter, Mr. Fordyce, Mr. Craufurd.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the subject was one which had already on more than one occasion taxed powers of a higher order than he possessed, and this being so, he should endeavour to condense as much as possible what he had to say. He would first explain how it was that the Bill had come into his hands. It had for many years been under the able management of his hon. Friend Mr. Carnegie, the late Member for Forfarshire. When that hon. Gentleman had ceased to be a Member of that House, acting upon his advice, he (Sir David Wedderburn) asked the Lord Advocate whether there was any prospect of Government introducing a Bill this Session on the subject? His Lordships' sentiments on this topic were well-known, as he had expressed himself freely on it, both in that House and elsewhere, but he stated that he did not see any prospect of being able to introduce a Bill on the subject this Session. He (Sir David Wedderburn) therefore ventured to lay on the Table the same Bill that had already been twice considered during this Parliament, and which on one occasion had been carried on the second reading by a majority of 36. Although he had introduced it on the first day of the Session, he had been unable to obtain an earlier opportunity than the present for getting the second reading put first on the Orders of the Day. He was aware that a private Member had no chance of carrying such a Bill at that period if it were seriously opposed; but as no Notice of opposition had been given, he was not without hope that hon. Gentlemen opposite might consider this a desirable opportunity of settling a troublesome question that had proved very injurious to the interests of Scotland. In order to facilitate the passing of the Bill, although it appeared to him it applied to the urban part of the question as well as to agriculture, he should not be indisposed to assent to a proposal in Committee omitting urban hypothec from the Bill. If they limited the question in this way to agriculture, he thought it would be found that the farmers of Scotland were practically unanimous in favour of the abolition of the existing law. It was said that if the law of hypothec were abolished, the tenants would suffer, and that landlords would not be affected; but he thought that on such a question they might trust to the opinions of the tenant-farmers of Scotland, who were the best judges of their own interests. The result of recent political occurrences in Scotland had shown what those opinions were, and the hon. Member for Wigtownshire (Mr. Vans Agnew) could inform the House what were the views of the farmers on this subject in that part of the country. In Berwickshire, where a contest was now going on, the Liberal candidate at once inserted in his address a paragraph giving his support to the movement for the abolition of hypothec, while the Conservative, at first said he considered it merely a tenant's question, and that he should act in accordance with what he found to be the real wishes of the farmers, and after having made his canvass, the same candidate had expressed his willingness to go in for the abolition of the law as applicable to agricultural subjects. He regretted that that election had not terminated, as whichever candidate were returned he (Sir David Wedderburn) should in that case have had one supporter the more. The Commissioners of Supply in Scotland, who were a Conservative body, had petitioned against the Bill, and in dealing with the objections they had urged, he probably could not do better than refer to the Petition of the Aberdeen Commissioners, as that county was proverbial in Scotland for its shrewdness and intelligence. They said in their Petition that they disapproved of the provisions of the Bill; that the law of hypothec was only one branch of the general law of retention in Scotland; and that it would be most unjust to do away with one part of a general law against one class of persons and retain it in force against the other classes. It seemed to him that there was a marked difference between retention, which was in the nature of a pledge, and the law of hypothec—a pledge being a case in which the property of a debtor was transferred into the custody of a creditor for security; while in the case of hypothec, it was a species of security which the debtor held himself, but which, under certain circumstances, could be seized by the landlord. It appeared, therefore, that as far as hypothec was concerned, the landlord was placed in an exceptional position; and this being so, he thought that the burden of proof should be on those who sought to retain the law. It was often said in Scotland that if they abolished hypothec they would have to adopt the English law of distress. He did not admit that, but at the same time he would show how marked was the distinction between the two laws. In the case of distress, the landlord must himself take direct action. Blackstone said the law allowed a man to be his own avenger, by enabling him to distrain upon cattle or other goods for the payment of rent. Under the old common law, a landlord could only take possession of certain goods belonging to his tenant as security; but by a subsequent Act of Parliament the right to sell had also been given. In the case of hypothec the whole produce of the farm was hypothecated, even in the possession of the tenant, for the rent of a single year, of which it was the crop, and there was no necessity for a landlord taking action on his own behalf, as he could retain the corn or other produce of the soil against all other creditors, and could recover against all who had intermeddled therewith as far as the current year's rent was concerned. This privilege not only belonged to the landlord, but also to any one to whom he might assign the rents. Previous to the Act of 1867, grain or other farm produce that had been sold in public market and paid for and taken possession of, was free from the landlord's right if sold in bulk, but if sold by the sample it was not free. The Act of 1867 had modified this state of things, and now any grain that had been bond fide sold at its true market value, paid for, and removed, was protected from the landlord's hypothec. The right to sequestrate failed also when proceedings were not taken within three months of the rent falling due. Still the property sequestrated remained at the risk of the tenant, and the remainder of the crop might be subsequently sequestrated even in the hands of a purchaser, if the amount did not liquidate the rent due. From this it appeared that hypothec was a much more extensive right than distress, and it seemed hardly fair to argue in favour of retaining hypothec on the ground that distress had not proved equally oppressive in England. It was stated in the Petition from Aberdeen that the effect of the abolition of hypothec on the country farmers would be more serious than on the tradesmen of the towns.

"In Scotland it was the practice to let farms on lease, and the tenant's first grain crop was not reaped until the following year. One half-year's rent was payable at Martinmas, and the other at Whitsunside. If the landlord's hypothec were abolished, he would, in self-defence, require the payment of two year's rent at the time of the bargain, and he might make it a condition, if the farm were let on a 19 years' lease, that if any rent was not paid before four months from Whitsunside, the lease should be void. In this way the landlords might secure their rents; but the tenant would have to pay two years' full rent before he could reach a crop at all."

The present Bill made no proposal as to interference with leases or the terms upon which the landlords and tenants might agree as to leases; but if the landlords insisted on pre-payment of their rents, they would still be in the same position as other persons who obtained pre-payment, and would have to give discount, or fix a lower figure than at present for their rents. There were two sides to every bargain, and the farmers of Scotland were perfectly competent to make their own bargains with their landlords, if they could do so on equal terms. They only objected to the landlords being placed at a great advantage with regard to the other creditors. If hypothec were abolished, the landlords would only be in the same position as the other creditors, except that they would be perfectly safe as regarded their principal, and would only risk their rent, which might be regarded as interest on the property let to the tenant. It could not be doubted that hypothec gave to the farmers increased credit with their landlords; but the effect of this had been very mischievous in cases where persons possessing neither skill nor capital had offered high rents, and successfully competed for the occupation of farms. If, however, a tenant's credit with his landlord were increased by the law of hypothec, it was diminished with the rest of the world. The creditor's uncertainty as to whether he would be the individual victim was one of the great objections to the law, and rendered it unpopular with all classes not directly interested in its retention. He found it stated in the Petition of the Commissioners of Supply of Mid Lothian—"that the extent of the law of hypothec was perfectly well known; that if any one suffered from it, giving credit without security or proper inquiry, he had himself only to blame." If these words were slightly altered it would be an argument in favour of the Bill, because if the landlord were in the same position as the other creditors, it might be equally said of him "that if he suffered from giving credit without security or proper inquiry, he had only himself to blame." In that House it had been asserted, and as a general rule with truth, that Scotch questions were left to the decision of Scotch Representatives. This, however, had not been the case in the matter of hypothec. The present Bill had been twice before the House. In 1869 the "Ayes" for the second reading were 129, and the "Noes" 93, and in the majority there were 27 Scotch Representatives, and in the minority 22. In 1871 the "Ayes" upon the voting for the second reading on the same Bill were 107, and the "Noes" 188, and among the "Ayes" were 30 Scotch Representatives, and among the "Noes" 23, and of the latter number he had every hope that some would vote with him to-day for the second reading of the Bill. If the Bill were left to the decision of the Scotch Representatives to-day, he should not have any doubt as to its being carried. In conclusion, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Sir David Wedderburn

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR, on seconding the Motion, said, he did so because he thought the Bill was founded upon claims of justice, and in proof of that he referred to the assertion which had been made by the Lord Advocate, to whom the House looked as their guide and adviser in matters of Scotch law, to the effect that the law of hypothec was an evil law altogether, giving to one class an unfair and unjust preference over all others. He thought that the sooner the law of hypothec was abolished the more beneficial would it be for the agricultural interests of Scotland. He admitted that the principle of hypothec was adopted as the common law in many Asiatic States, and he regretted to say what had been its effects in Persia. There they had a country 20 times the area of Ireland, but with a smaller population than that country, and the agriculture of the country yearly on the decrease. Again, in that part of India, where he had resided for many years, the law was at one time in full operation in all its fierceness; but since the changes introduced there of late years by Lord Harris, who had gone there from this country, and by which the despotism of the law of hypothec was greatly lessened, there had been remarkable progress made in agriculture, tending to the improvement of the land which had been greatly depreciated by the operation of the system formerly in use. Here the abolition of hypothec would place the relations between tenants and landlords on a far more satisfactory footing than at present. There was no doubt that rentals in Scotland had increased, and that increase had not been caused by the law of hypothec, but he believed it had taken place in spite of that law, and if that law had not existed, the increase, he believed, would have been much greater. The rentals of all Scotland had nearly doubled within the last sixty years, and the increase was still going on. Since 1855, when the first valuation took place under the Valuation Act, the increase of rental in Kincardineshire had amounted to 35 per cent, and it was now going on at the rate of about 2 per cent per annum, and the farmers might justly on this account claim some consideration from the landlords. At all events, the continuance of this law had been mainly supported by the landlords, and the last Bill which came down from the other House, and was passed into law, still retained much of the evil of the old practice of hypothec. It was not wise for the landlords to resist the universal cry raised by the farmers, who were desirous of having the law repealed, and it was very undesirable that the latter should be induced by a sense of injustice to band themselves into the sort of trade union, that had been resorted to by the working classes in order to obtain justice for themselves, by unseating hon. Members of that House who were opposed to its abolition. He admitted that to some extent the evils of the law of hypothec had been mitigated by the Act of 1867; but at the same time he pointed out, that that Act gave to the landlords a right they had not before, and which, he submitted, it was unwise to have conferred. Indeed, the fact of the landlord legislators having inserted such powers in a Bill, was open to serious comment. The law of hypothec came from very ancient times, when nothing was done for the improvement of the land; but the system of cultivation had now been entirely changed, and the farmer was required, not only as formerly, to devote his own labour to the cultivation of the soil, but to risk in his business an amount of capital equal to from seven to even ten times the rental of the land. This increased capital was required for manure, bricks, tiles, and various appliances which were not needed at the time hypothec was established; and the Act of 1867 gave to the landlord rights over the improvements which the tenants effected, that the ancient law or practice did not bestow, for it gave them the right to all the improvements the farmers made in the soil by means of manure, even though that manure had not been paid for. It was said that the Legislature desired by means of hypothec to encourage the poor man; but although the object was a laudable one, it ought not be effected at the expense of another class. From a Return issued in 1869, it appeared that under the Act of 1867, the number of sequestrations against persons occupying farms with a less rental than £100 a-year was 548, and the number holding farms of above that rent was only 196. That showed that it was not the landlords' interest to let their farms to men without capital; and on this ground he claimed the support of the House to the Bill, which he hoped would become law during the present Session.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir David Wedderburn.)

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE, in moving the rejection of the Bill, said, he was very sensible of the responsibility of any Scotch Member representing a county constituency in giving an opinion against a measure which was supported by a considerable amount of popular favour; but having formerly expressed an opinion that the Bill was not just in principle, and would if it should be carried out, be most injurious in its consequences, he could not shrink from opposing it, notwithstanding the demonstrations of popular favour it had met with in some parts of Scotland. In recording his vote against the Bill, he must give the reasons why he did so, and he was encouraged in doing so by the statement of his hon. Friend the Member for South Ayr (Sir David Wedderburn), who had introduced the Bill. No doubt, the Bill had met in this House with a considerable amount of support from hon. Members; but how had that support been gained? By bidding to hon. Members who represented burgh constituencies, and offering to exclude towns from the operation of the Bill. He deprecated that course, and insisted that that was a question which affected town as well as country, and if the House went into Committee, he did not think that hon. Members would listen to a proposal that landlords should have a preference in one case, and not in the other. He thought that tenant-farmers were under a great delusion in this matter. They entered upon their farms after an active competition, and knowing that they were subject to the law of hypothec. If the urban population who were under the same law did not raise a cry against it, they only showed that they were men of sense, and knew very well that the law was not injurious to their interest. The law of hypothec, he contended, was in favour of the smaller tenants, by giving to landlords a right to which they were entitled by the law not only of Europe, but of other parts of the world. Those were presumptions in favour of the law, and though they could not overbear the considerations which might be urged against it, were at least sufficient to answer the argument that those who opposed the Bill were claiming exceptional privileges which were unjust to the tenant-farmers. It was said that the law allowed men of straw to enter upon the holding of farms. Another and still stranger allegation was, that it was unjust to allow a landlord to swallow up everything, and leave in the lurch the creditor who had supplied the farmer with seeds or manures. All these were very fair subjects for consideration; but there was an immense amount of exaggeration about the statement of them. With regard to the last objection, some important evidence was given before the Commission which inquired into this subject. One of the largest manure merchants in Scotland gave evidence as to his losses. He stated that his dealings with tenant-farmers amounted to £190,000 a-year. His losses in two years amounted to £2,400, and on that account he received dividends amounting to £450. But was that loss, which was a very small percentage, due to the law of hypothec? If hypothec were abolished, could it be said that creditors would not incur losses? On the contrary, he thought it fair to presume that their condition would be a more uncertain one, and that the risk which they would have to run would be greater than at present. Traders would endeavour to recoup themselves by raising the price of their articles to customers. That, in fact, was the measure of the amount of risk and injury which tenant-farmers suffered owing to this law. Evidence of the same kind was given by a Glasgow manure merchant, who said he did not think in the main this law affected the trade injuriously. The smallness of the losses showed the soundness of the trade that was carried on between the farmers of

General Sir George Balfour

Scotland and the dealers in seeds and manures. That trade was conducted on safe and cautious principles, and he did not think that the farmers would gain any very great advantage from the new system which would be introduced on the abolition of the law. Then as to the introduction of men of straw, he could only say that they did not enter into competition for farms in his neighbourhood. If a landlord was satisfied that the proposed tenant was a man of character, could keep the farm well stocked, and had the means to carry it on, he would inquire no further. Moreover, in consequence of the law, it was a practice in many parts of Scotland to give credit to a tenant for a year and a-half, and if that credit were abolished, would the farmer gain any advantage from the abolition of the law, even though he gained additional credit from the seed and manure merchants? He thought he would not, and he submitted that the House should consider whether the present law acted so injuriously as to call for its repeal. It had existed for centuries, and he contended that it had done no harm. But considering the effect of this law, he thought the House ought to reflect on how dangerous any change in the law would be to small occupiers. The whole of Scotland was not like Mid Lothian, and was not occupied by farmers of large capital and wide credit. Indeed, the agricultural Returns showed that the small farmers were much larger in number than was generally supposed, and if the protection which landlords now enjoyed were abolished, they might be led to destroy these small farms. If the Members of the Government had been present in the House, he would have asked them to consider this question as affecting the conditions to be made between landlords and tenants. The tendency of the Bill would be to induce more stringent conditions than at present, and that, he contended, would not be beneficial to the farmers. As regarded urban occupancy, he thought the abolition of hypothec would lead landlords to require a closer payment of rent, and that would be much deprecated by the labouring classes. The real question in this matter, was, what engagements should be made between proprietors and tenants in Scotland, and the abolition of the law of hypothec would, he contended, put an end to the present system of tenancy, which had effected such a great improvement in the agriculture of Scotland. He asked the House to bear in mind that any person who parted with his property for a term of years looked to the improvement of that land; and if when a change of ownership took place, the new proprietor was not protected by law, he must take measures with regard to compelling a tenant to quit his farm in the event of his failing to pay his rent, and those measures would operate more hardly on the tenant than the existing law. How far was the principle of the Bill to go? Was it to be confined to the abolition of the law, or go further and declare it to be against public policy for any landlord to insist upon conditions in leases which he granted. He contended that such conditions would be more injurious to the tenants than the present law. He thought the House ought to know, before the Bill went into Committee, to what extent the provisions of the Bill were to go, and what alterations his hon. Friend would agree to, for they could not deny the right of persons to enter into agreements without striking a blow at the system of limited liability. Having stated these views, he would admit fully some of the evils which attached to the law of hypothec. Doubtless cases of hardship did occur, and in some the landlord's claim swallowed up everything, and deprived of their money those who had trusted the tenant with seeds and manures. He did not, however, consider that the claim of the landlord and the claims of the creditors had any analogy, for the risk run by a man who let his land to a tenant could not compare with that of a man who, as a rule, dealt in ready-money transactions. There was in Scotland a preference given to farm servants after the landlord, and he was prepared to consider the cases of the seed and manure merchants, but he would not give a dangerous latitude to persons who advanced money on note of hand. He entertained a strong opinion as to the injustice and impolicy of this measure, to which he should unhesitatingly give his opposition. Scotch proprietors stood on high ground in the matter, for they had taken the lead in agricultural improvement, and had shown their liberality both as to the length of their leases and the covenants which they contained, and accordingly, for that reason, he should move the rejection of the Bill.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, that though he had not intended to second the Amendment of the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) he would be happy to do so. The House had had the advantage of hearing the hon. Baronet's speech and had also heard the speech of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir George Balfour) which was a speech of a theoretical kind. He was astonished to hear from the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardine (Sir George Balfour), that the time had arrived when the landlords of Scotland should set their houses in order. He was not aware what circumstances had led the prophetic eye of the hon. and gallant Gentleman to foresee that necessity, for he was not aware that the houses of Scotch landlords were out of order, or that they were likely to allow them to be so. He was further astonished at the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who seemed to think that if concessions were made on the subject, and the law of hypothec abolished, his (Sir George Balfour's) own seat and the seats of those who act with him politically, would be less safe than now. For his own part, conjectures of that kind had not the smallest interest for him, and seemed of small importance compared with the importance of the question in hand. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had favoured the House with his experience with regard to the working of the law of hypothec or similar measures in India, and had stated that the result of the existence of the law of hypothec in that country was the deterioration of the land. All he (Mr. Dalrymple) could say in reply was, that the idea of the deterioration of the land in Scotland was a new one to him, and if it had begun, under the law of hypothec, it must have begun very recently. He had not had the advantage of hearing the speech of his hon. Friend (Sir David Wedderburn), but he was sure that his hon. Friend did not introduce any of the usual commonplaces as to hypothec being a remnant of the feudal system and so forth. The truth was that the law of hypothec was part of the old Roman law, and had some claim to respect. Monstrous absurdities were talked about its working. He did not know that the law could be defended in principle; but as to its working there could be no doubt that it was on the whole, good. Under the law it became possible for a small farmer to take a larger farm, and for the landlord to give time to those who might be behind-hand in the payment of their rents. But further, while the law was in force, other creditors had a better chance of getting payment of what was due to them than they would have if this law were abolished because the landlord could afford to wait for his money. He (Mr. Dalrymple) spoke of what he knew in all such instances. Those who looked at the matter calmly knew that what he said was true. At times of excitement, during an election contest, and the like, statements were made which, if they were to be believed, would seem to show that the advantages of the law to landlords was enormous, and that as regarded tenants it was oppressive and tyrannical. One would imagine that it was the custom, when a man was behind with his rent to turn him out on the hill-side destitute of goods or property; whereas the truth, he believed, was that the law was rarely enforced. It had been truly said that it was a tenants' and not a landlords' question. He sometimes doubted if farmers realized how they would be situated if the law were abolished. He might tell the House of a story which he heard in a county represented by his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Agnew). A tenant who had been very active against hypothec, applied to the factor or agent, and asked if he might delay, say till August, his rent which was due in May. The factor said he would ask the laird. On application to the laird, the factor received answer—"By all means: But, let me see, was not he very strong against hypothec?" The factor said that he was; whereupon the laird said—"Give him what he asks, but tell him if it were not for the law of hypothec I could not oblige him." The farmer on hearing that afterwards said that it had never occurred to him to look at the matter in that light. He (Mr. Dalrymple) had always regarded the law as being in the interest of farmers, and especially of small farmers, and he continued of the same opinion. All he could say was, that he had inquired of the class said to be aggrieved, and had done so in more parts of the country than one, and he could not discover any foundation whatever for such assertions as had been made. Instances of harsh treatment might no doubt be discovered, but he believed they could be easily counted on the fingers of one hand. The hon. and gallant Member (Sir George Balfour) said that there was a universal demand for a repeal of the law on the part of the tenant-farmers of Scotland. All he could say was that the inquiries he had made in two or three counties led him to an entirely opposite conclusion. With one exception, during the last autumn, when he had made many inquiries, he had not heard a tenant-farmer say that he wished to see the law abolished. On the other hand, he had heard many of them say that since the alteration of the law in recent years, possible hardships were few in number, and that the law as it now stood ought to be fairly tried. He had received no expression of feeling against the law; and as he held that urban and rural hypothec must be considered on equal terms, he suspected that those whom he represented who belonged to towns, would be adverse to the change proposed. He was glad the hon. Baronet opposite the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had moved the rejection of the Bill, and he should certainly vote with him. Until he heard stronger reasons for the abolition of the law of hypothec than had yet been advanced, he should do his utmost to retain it in the interest of the smaller tenant-farmers. If, on any future occasion, he should receive a representation adverse to that law, from those whom he represented, and whose opinions were founded on knowledge and conviction, he should refrain from opposing the measure.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Edward Colebrooke.)

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was surprised at the opinions that had been expressed by the hon. Baronet behind him (Sir Edward Colebrooke), and by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. C. Dalrymple), which virtually amounted to this—that a law which was founded on an unjust principle acted well in practice. He was glad that the hon. Baronet who introduced the Bill (Sir David Wedderburn) was prepared to withdraw that portion of it which referred to the urban hypothec. There was no difference in principle between urban and agricultural hypothec, but in point of fact there was no great demand for the abolition of urban hypothec. In that respect it differed very widely from agricultural hypothec. Houses and land were besides very differently circumstanced. If the landlords of houses endeavoured to impose unjust conditions on their tenants, the demand for other houses would at once be made and would be speedily supplied. In the case of houses, therefore, there was a limit placed to the exaction of arbitrary conditions on the part of the landlord, which could not be resorted to in the case of land. Again, the law of hypothec did not affect the credit of the tenant of a house as it did the credit of the tenant of a farm. There was further a feeling on the part of those who dealt with the farmer that the landlord had a preference to which he was not entitled, and that that was an injustice which ought to be abolished, and the farmer suffered on account of that feeling existing. The hon. Baronet who moved the rejection of the Bill (Sir Edward Colebrooke), said that if the law of hypothec were abolished the landlords would impose harder terms upon their tenants. He did not believe that such would be the case. In fact, he did not say that the landlords, generally speaking, exercised the powers given them under the existing law; but there were estates with which he was acquainted upon which the law was used to its fullest extent, and it was practically impossible for the landlords to exact more stringent conditions than existed. He could refer to leases in which the conditions laid down were of the most preposterous character, and such, indeed, as no independent tenant would submit to. Not only did the small tenants not ask for a continuance of the law of hypothec, as had been alleged, but they demanded its total abolition. The county of Aberdeen was par excellence the county of small farmers, and they had pronounced in the most unmistakable manner against the law, and in favour of the Bill, and his own constituency, the county of Forfar, acted in a similar manner. Perhaps the hon. Baronet behind him knew the affairs of the tenant-farmers better than they knew them themselves; but if the small farmers of Aberdeenshire knew their own affairs—and they occasionally got credit for doing so—and were the best judges of their own position, then in their own interests they demanded the abolition of this law. Was it likely that the landlords of Scotland would not, as had been stated, give a farm, if this law were abolished, to tenant-farmers, whom they knew to be intelligent, and industrious, and honest, because they had not capital? Why, altogether apart from the philanthropic motive—and would it be philanthropy to give an industrious, honest, and deserving man a farm at fair rent—they would do so for their own sakes. The question ought to be considered on its true basis. There were, doubtless, some small farmers who had risen to higher positions, but they were of that exceptional class who would have risen whether the law of hypothec existed or not. It was a delusion to suppose that the law was of advantage to the small farmers. It was not. It was disadvantageous to the large farmers, but still more so to the small; for it increased the number of competitors, and thereby led to increased rents. But it was said, that if hypothec were abolished the landlords would exact a preference by conditions in leases. That was a matter of law. He did not think that the tenants could conspire with landlords, as suggested, against the public interest. That part of the question, he thought, he might leave to the right hon. and learned Lord on the Treasury bench to deal with. It was not the fact, practically, that a tenant now got a year's credit for his rent. He had to purchase the crop of the outgoing tenant, and the landlord got his money as soon as he would, if he kept the land in his own possession. He had said that the few tenant-farmers who had risen to a higher position had not done so on account of the law of hypothec, but even if that were the case, the interest of a whole class should not be sacrificed for a few individuals. The abolition of the law, moreover, would not have an injurious effect upon the landlords. On well and liberally managed estates rents were now always paid with punctuality, and there no difference would arise; but there certainly would be a great and serious difference on rack-rented estates. The landlord on such estates would have to see that the tenants means were sufficient, although a farmer was entitled to some credit, as well as a person engaged in any other branch of business or industry—and skill, intelligence, and industry should not be overlooked. For his part, he believed that the Bill would work for the advantage of the landlord. On rack-rented estates the elasticity was taken out of the tenant—he had not the spirit or the inducement to improve the farm or develop its resources, and at the end of the tenancy the landlord got the farm in no better condition than when the lease commenced. It was a mistake to suppose that the leases lasted for 19 years. They contained most stringent conditions, and the landlords could put an end to them on the breach of any one of them. The hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. Dalrymple) said, that the law of hypothec was resorted to in very few cases; but it appeared from a Return before the House that it was resorted to in two years in over 500 cases. He hoped that they would on that occasion receive the cordial support of the Lord Advocate. The right hon. and learned Lord had been one of the Commissioners who inquired into the subject, and had signed the Report in favour of abolition, and in the county election which had been referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Ayr (Sir David Wedderburn), the right hon. and learned Lord had expressed himself in the most decided terms against the law. The farmers of Scotland were entitled to the most favourable consideration at the hands of the Liberal Government. They had supported Her Majesty's Government on all the questions of the day, and in the passing of all the great measures of the present Parliament, and were entitled to the relief which they now sought at their hands. He was surprised to hear the sentiments which had been uttered by some hon. Members behind the Treasury bench. It struck him that the "liberality" of some hon. Members was confined to being Liberal about other people's interests; but that in matters affecting themselves, they were as Conservative as any hon. Member on the other side of the House. He hoped that the Bill would pass, and without the clause exempting its operation from existing agreements, and that a Liberal Government and its supporters would not favour an opposition which would uphold and increase the protection of the landlord class. The law of hypothec was unjust and indefensible in the public interest, and he hoped it would be abolished during the present Session.

Mr. ELLICE said, he could not agree with his hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. J. W. Barclay), as to what he had stated as to landlord protection. He (Mr. Ellice) did not oppose the Bill, because he wanted landlord protection; on the contrary, he thought landlords ought to be considered like other people, and in no other way. He objected to disturb a law which had existed for generations, and under which agriculture had prospered in Scotland more than in any other country in the world. He was surprised that his hon. Friend was in favour of disturbing and interfering with existing agreements, and he did not think the House would even endorse that view or tolerate such a proceeding. He expected to have heard arguments in favour of the abolition of the law of hypothec rather than vague and general assertions such as they were accustomed to hear at election time. He had listened to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for South Ayr (Sir David Wedderburn), and he had failed to discover any one instance in which where the law of hypothec was at all analogous to the law of distress in England, it told injuriously upon the interest of an ordinary creditor, or placed the latter in a less advantageous situation than he would occupy in regard to any other corn or commercial transaction. Allusion had been made to the competitions for farms which the law of hypothec in Scotland gave rise to. Undoubtedly, that was a great complaint, and he had no doubt himself that was the sole cause that had led to the outcry for the abolition of the law of hypothec, for the existence of that law had enabled the humbler man to compete on more equal terms with the rich man. Undoubtedly, if that law were abolished, which now protected the man of small capital, the man of larger capital would then be able to command the situation, and that absorption of small farms would take place which he begged leave to say had been carried already to an extent that was unfortunate for the interests of the country. His hon.

Friend the Member for South Ayr held out a prospect of rents being reduced. He did not believe that any alteration of the law of hypothec, or, indeed any law which that House could pass, would affect the question of rents. Farms would always command their value, and in Scotland especially, people would be found who would give more money for a farm than they thought would allow them to make a profit upon it. Therefore, he thought it was wholly illusory to say that the abolition of the law of hypothec would have any effect upon rents in Scotland. No doubt, it was that illusory hope that had been the means of nurturing the cry for abolition. He believed that the large majority of the Scotch Members were in favour of the Bill, and therefore those of them who took a different course were at least bound to state their reasons for so doing. The law of hypothec was objected to as injurious—first of all to tenants, and secondly, to creditors. He took a totally different view of the case, and he upheld what was understood to be the right of hypothec. He did not say he upheld that particular law as advantageous to the tenant, and as not unjust to the ordinary creditor; he said it was advantageous to the farmer. Let hon. Gentlemen consider this—if a farmer offered to take a farm, the very first thing he was asked was as to his security and ability to pay the rent. He thought that no landlord would take a tenant, and no man would lend money to a customer, without inquiring as to the sufficiency and the security of that person. Well, now, he believed that in the absence of hypothec there were only three ways in which security could be found—a man must either pre-pay his rent, or he must lodge securities equal to the rent, or he must find some person to be his cautioner in the bank. Now, it was well known in Scotland, that there was not one man in 20 of the farming tenants who had more capital than he could spare. On the contrary, they all knew that the improving system had been largely conducted upon credit—that was to say, a tenant had a certain capital of his own, but he had to borrow upon the credit of that capital, probably a considerable sum, as accommodation. Therefore, the first two alternatives in the way of finding security were not open to 19 out of 20 tenants in Scotland. The only other alternative left was to find some friend or banker who would consent to become caution. They all knew that any person who was referred to in that way, would in his turn, ask for his security, and probably, he would ask for some profit on the transaction; in fact, in the case of all these three alternatives they subjected the tenants to disadvantages and inconveniences to which they were not at present exposed, because instead of their having to prepay the rent, or to find security for the rent in the manner he had suggested, the law stepped in, and found that security ready-made in the prior claim which it gave the landlord over the stock on the farm. Therefore he maintained in respect of hypothec, that whether the tenant was a wealthy man or not, he could be subjected to no possible disadvantage, with the single exception of that one to which he had before alluded—namely, that hypothec let in a larger number of persons to compete for farms than might otherwise be the case, but that was the only disadvantage which a tenant could labour under. As regarded the ordinary creditor, it was complained that the landlord stepped in to his prejudice. But would any hon. Member tell him that ordinary creditors at the present moment in England did not suffer from the same inconvenience? Was there a single case of bankruptcy in that metropolis in which they did not in the first column see “secured creditors” and “ordinary creditors?” The fact was that the thing was as common as possible. A man who was the ordinary creditor was postponed to the creditors who had taken security, or probably exhausted all the securities of the bankrupt. As regarded mortgage, he wanted to know whether the promoters of the Bill were prepared to interfere with the right of mortgage? A man rented his land, or rather lent his land for a consideration, in the same way as another lent money upon the land. He depended in the one case on his hypothec to obtain interest on what he lent, and in the other case the mortgagee expected, and had a right in respect of his mortgage, to get back his capital with interest previous to the satisfaction of the claims of all other creditors. It seemed to him that the cases were very analogous. Now a question had been put about the conditions in a lease.

Mr. Ellice

Well, was it proposed by the Bill to prevent conditions being made in a lease, or was it proposed to allow conditions to be made in a lease under the Bill, by which a tenant could hypothecate or pledge the stock on his farm? If that were done, it appeared to him that it came to very much the same thing, and that they accomplished only in a most round-about way what was now accomplished without any difficulty through the operation of hypothec, and without exposing the tenant to many disadvantages and much inconvenience to which he might otherwise be subject. He would call the attention of his hon. Friends the Members for Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and other large towns in Scotland to the effect that the abolition of this law might have upon the artizan and the labouring classes in these towns. At the present moment hypothec seemed to him to be a law which immensely added to the capital of a labouring man—the little furniture he possessed. It was the only security that he could give. A landlord gave him a lodging upon the security of the furniture which he had put into it. During the time that man was earning money enough to pay his credit at the end of the week or month. They were going by that Bill to take that security away. What would be the result? That they would put greater difficulties than ever in the way of these poor people obtaining lodgings, who had quite enough already to contend with. They would have to pay a higher rent because the landlord would be sure to put a larger rent on in order to cover his risk if the law of hypothec were abolished, and the consequence would be, that the abolition of the law would be not only disadvantageous, but also of the greatest possible injury to the labouring and artizan classes in Scotland. He spoke not on his own authority, but on that of other people acquainted with the subject, and he invited the Representatives of the large towns in Scotland to say whether the facts which he had stated were correct or not. Upon those grounds, he was opposed to disturbing a system and a law which had lasted so long, and against which, so far as he could see, no practical evil resulted or could be alleged. He thought the present system was beneficial to the farmer; at all events, it subjected him to no disadvantage to which he would not be equally exposed if the law were abolished. There was, of course, hardly any law in that country which was not susceptible of improvement, and he was not opposed to any alteration which it might be considered desirable to make in the law of hypothec. He would therefore suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for South Ayr, that he should withdraw his Bill for the present, and that in the next Session a Committee of that House should be appointed to inquire not only into the law of hypothec as it related to Scotland, but into the law of dstraint in England, because he protested against one country being dealt with in the matter in a different spirit from that in which the other was dealt with, and to see what alterations in those laws were necessary in order to place the legislation of both countries on the same footing. In conclusion, he would simply say that in opposing the Bill he was not influenced by any class interest. He had taken up the line he had after a careful consideration of the whole subject, and in what he believed to be the interest of the tenant-farmers of Scotland generally, and in the cause of agricultural improvement in that country.

MR. STAPLETON said, that a former Lord Advocate—Mr. Moncreiff—had distinctly expressed the opinion that the first thing to do was to assimilate the law of Scotland in this respect to the law of England; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman even went further, and promised to bring in a Bill to that effect; but in the meanwhile, he was removed from that House to undertake superior duties elsewhere. It was his (Mr. Stapleton's) opinion that the whole question would have been advantageously settled if that right hon. and learned Gentleman had continued in office. He was inclined to think that the law of England would work satisfactorily in Scotland, although the circumstances of the two countries might be somewhat different.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not suppose the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Bill had any very sanguine hope of its being passed into law during the present Session. He rather thought his object in introducing the Bill was to have the subject, which was one of great importance, discussed, and to obtain the opinion of this House upon it. The principle of the Bill was, that landlords should have for the recovery of the rents due to them the like legal remedies, and no other, which by the law of Scotland were given to other creditors as regarded personal obligations. He had no such unbecoming confidence in his opinions, and far too sincere a respect for the judgment of others who differed from him, to permit him to imagine for one moment that the question had not two sides to it, and that there were not questions of weight and consideration on both sides. Therefore, the opinion announced by his hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) who moved the Amendment, did not take him by surprise, because his hon. Friend and he had had occasion to consider the question together as Members of the Royal Commission to which reference had been made, and he knew that they then arrived at different conclusions upon the question which the Commission had to consider. Some Members of the Commission desired to maintain the law with small modifications, others suggested greater ones, and some with whom he concurred, were in favour of a total abolition of the law. In fact his own opinion, formed after the best and most careful consideration he was able to give the subject, was altogether against the law of hypothec. Though that was not the opinion of the majority of the Commissioners, he was in favour of putting the landlord upon the same footing for the recovery of his rent as other creditors were for the recovery of their debts. It was the opinion not only of some hon. Members in that House, but of certain persons out-of-doors, that it was not a landlords' question, and that it was a tenants' question. It was impossible for him to hear that without marvelling that the landlords, who were said to have little interest in the question—almost none at all in fact—had been almost alone in Scotland in the desire for the retention of this law, and the tenant-farmers, who were said to have the greatest interest in the matter, were almost unanimous in their urgent desire for its repeal. He could not believe that the tenant-farmers of Scotland did not understand their own interests. He could not believe that they were under a delusion as to the effect of the operation of the law, because they were an intelligent class of men. What they believed was, that that law was detrimental in its operation to their legitimate interests. It had been said, in defence of the law, that it produced liberal contracts between landlords and tenants, but it was impossible to give security to one particular creditor except at the expense of the other creditors. Now, did the nature of the debt afford any good reason for giving a preference to the landlord. His hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire had pointed out that there were preferential creditors under the law of England, and he instanced farm servants. His hon. Friend might also have included domestic servants; and the reason for giving them a preference no doubt was that it would be cruel to allow such small creditors to go without payment of their wages. For a similar reason the law gave a preference to those who advanced money to pay a man's death-bed and funeral expenses. But such reasons were hardly applicable to the case of landlords. The only other preferential creditor was the Crown, and certainly the preference given to the Crown rested upon other considerations than were applicable to landlords. In his opinion, there was nothing in the nature of the landlord's claim for rent to justify giving him a preference over all other creditors. He did not speak disrespectfully when he said a tenant-farmer was simply a trader, whose trade consisted in hiring land for the purpose of raising crops out of it by the application of skill, labour, and capital. He had occasion for credit in the conduct of his business, and one of his creditors was the landlord who let him the land upon which he desired to carry on his trade. He had also occasion for credit in other directions. He had to employ labourers. He had to purchase manure and seeds. His stock-in-trade, in the case of an arable farm, consisted of the crops which he had raised out of the land; and in the case of the grazing farm, the stock-in-trade was the cattle and sheep, which he might have purchased on credit. Now, the common law of the land was, that when a trader failed so that he was unable to pay his debts, his stock-in-trade or assets should be equally divided, without favour or preference, amongst his creditors. But in the case of hypothec, the law interfered in favour of one creditor above the others. Why was that. They were told that landlords would not let their farms without security unless the law stepped in for their protection; and they were also told that to abolish the law would have a most prejudicial effect upon the smaller class of tenants, even to the extent of extinguishing them altogether. But he considered persons who let land for hire were in exactly the same position as persons who let houses and shops, and they ought to take their security according to the person they considered they were dealing with. Why should landlords be put upon a different footing from others if they had perfect confidence in the honesty, industry, and skill of the tenant? If those conditions were fulfilled, they might give credit without any security at all, and if they demanded security or pre-payment, they ought only to have it upon the usual terms. Landlords, like other persons, should have to consider their own legitimate interests as other creditors considered theirs. The argument that the law was in favour of the smaller tenants seemed to him to be quite unsound. From the evidence taken before the Royal Commission, it appeared that there were no tenants who paid higher rents than the smaller tenants, and they were enabled to do so in consequence of their persevering industry, and the continual labour of their families applied to the land. It was also proved incontrovertibly before the Commission that there were no persons who paid their rents more surely or regularly. Those were good reasons why landlords should let farms to the smaller tenants, whether the law of hypothec existed or not. But if the existence of that law induced landlords to let their lands to persons whom they would otherwise not accept as tenants, and that was done at the expense of other creditors, its effect was most prejudicial, because it was interfering with a natural law which said that persons should give credit upon their own discretion and at their own proper risk. The baneful effect of the law was, that the tenant-farmer's stock was pledged to one creditor, while the tenant-farmer could not himself pledge his cattle or crops to any other creditor. Landlords, in letting their land, ought to be put upon the same footing as other creditors—no worse, and as certainly no better. He would give them no preference which other creditors did not have, and he would not allow contracts to be made in favour of one class of creditors which could not be made in favour of others. These were the general considerations which, to his mind, operated against the law of hypothec. It had always appeared to him to be an exceptional and artificial law, which interfered with the ordinary course of affairs, and interfered in an impolitic manner. It was not enough to say that the law had been infrequently put in force. Notwithstanding the rarity of its enforcement, it nevertheless had a great influence. While artificially creating an increase of credit in the direction in favour of which it operated, it produced a corresponding diminution of credit in the opposite direction—in the direction of those at whose expense, in the event of any failure, the preference was given. Being in favour of the principle of the Bill, he should give the second reading his support, though he wished to remark before sitting down that he could see no difference between rural and urban hypothec, and his only wonder was that either law had been allowed to stand so long.

MR. ORR EWING regretted that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate did not support the recommendation of the hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice) to refer the Bill to a Select Committee with a view to the framing of a measure which might settle that much agitated question for the benefit of both countries. If it were so unjust that a preferential claim should be given to the landlord, why was it that the Government, which during the five years of that Parliament had such a majority at their back that they could pass any measure, did not bring in a Bill to settle the question? He denied that it was the landlords of Scotland alone who had a preferential claim. Nine-tenths of the foreign trade of this country was carried on under laws which gave particular creditors a preference, and so was a large proportion of the trade of the country. He was himself acquainted with a case of failure to the amount of £478,000, of which £300,000 was secured to preferential creditors, and the remainder yielded not long since a dividend of 7½d. in the pound. But, though he believed the law to be more in the interest of the tenant than the landlord, yet, seeing the agitation which of late years prevailed in Scotland on the subject, and sooner than have it made a party cry, if they could not get a Select Committee, he would be prepared to vote for the abolition of the law.

MR. LEEMAN said, not a single new argument had been advanced in favour of the Bill, and he therefore hoped the House would be prepared to deal with it on that occasion as it had done with a similar measure two years ago, which was rejected by a majority of nearly two to one. The main ground upon which that Bill was rejected was, that if the law of hypothec in Scotland was abolished, it must be a prelude to the abolition of the law of distress in England. All the Bills which had been introduced on the subject of hypothec since 1867 were rooted and grounded in the opinion of the minority of the Royal Commission; four members of that Commission were in favour of abolition, while 13 were against it. The objectionable part of the law of hypothec was removed in 1867, and he would remind the Lord Advocate, that in the Committee whose recommendation led to that alteration, he was in the minority. A Committee of the House of Lords declared in a subsequent year its opinion that the abolition of the law would be injurious to the interests of all classes. The former Lord Advocate of the present Government had also said that if hypothec were abolished landlords would get rather less than before, while the other creditors would be in the same position as they were. Did the Government support the Bill? In 1870, in answer to a Question put by Mr. Carnegie, the Government said that they were considering the question in connection with the subject of the law of distress in England. In 1871 only one Member of the Government rose to say a word in favour of the Bill. Only one had yet spoken in its favour this year; and the nature of the Whip issued that morning, coupled with the appearance of the Treasury bench, which was all but empty, did not say much for the anxiety of the Government to pass the measure. He doubted whether the Bill had the support of any Member of the Government, excepting the Lord Advocate. It was the large farmers of Scotland who asked for the repeal of this law, and many of those were men who had risen to their present position mainly through the influence of the law. That had been given in evidence before the Commission. To attack the law of hypothec in Scotland was to attack by a side wind the law of distress in England, and the only fair way of dealing with the question was to bring in a Bill founded on inquiry by a Select Committee to settle the question in both countries. If they took away the power of distress in England, the consequence would be that no poor farmer would obtain a holding, and for that reason he should vote against the Bill.

Mr. R. W. DUFF said, there were very few Scotch Members who dared appear before their constituents without saying that they were in favour of the abolition of the law of hypothec. The Bill of 1867, which modified the law of hypothec, had failed, and there was now no alternative but to abolish the law altogether. [Lord ELCHO: How has that Bill failed?] Why, it had failed to satisfy the just wishes and requirements of the people of Scotland. In voting for the second reading, however, he wished it to be understood that he did so in order that the law might be abolished in the urban as well as the rural districts.

Mr. VANS AGNEW said, that although he believed that tenant-farmers would not derive much benefit from the proposed abolition of hypothec, the effect of which had been much exaggerated in the arguments on both sides, yet he would support the Bill to the extent of its proposal to abolish the law in agricultural districts, but he was not in favour of its abolition in towns. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Baronet the Member for South Ayr would undertake to limit the Bill to agricultural districts.

Sir DAVID WEDDERBURN said, he could not undertake to do so, but he would not offer objection to its being done.

Mr. VANS AGNEW said, when the Bill got into Committee, if it passed the second reading, he should move that its operation be confined to agricultural districts. He had been recently returned for an agricultural constituency under the Ballot, and he was free to admit that if it had not been known that his opinion was in favour of this Bill he should not have been returned; and he believed the same thing might be said of some hon. Gentlemen on the other side. The Scotch law differed from the English Law of Distraint in this—that cattle and crop could be followed and recovered by the landlord after they had been sold. The farmers' case was, that by the action of this law competition was increased, rents raised, and their credit reduced. Several members had spoken of the class of small farmers, which he took to mean those paying less than £50 of rent. They were a class who lived a very hard life; in fact, they and their families were not so well housed, clothed, or fed as the farm servants on large farms, and their children were kept more at work than at school. It was a question worthy of the consideration of the House, whether it was a national benefit to encourage the letting of land to men without capital, when there were plenty with capital ready to take it. The effect of the repeal of the law to the farmer would be that he would have to find security for his rent, and he would in future be fore-rented. But they said that it affected their credit; that the rent was not so large a part of the expense of cultivation as the cost of seed, manure, and labour, and they had a very strong feeling on the subject. He hoped the House would grant them what they asked. It was not a landlords' question; they could protect themselves, and had no interest in maintaining the law for themselves. It caused great irritation in Scotland; and by dividing those, whose interests should be identical, was a source of more political evil than its repeal would be.

Mr. M'LAREN said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill on the grounds stated by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. So far as regarded the abolition of the law of agricultural hypothec, the speech of the right hon. and learned Lord was unanswerable. That, however, was all the length he (Mr. M'Laren) could go to. The right hon. and learned Lord seemed, if he understood him rightly, to think that the urban was in no degree different from the rural population. On that particular point he (Mr. M'Laren) was inclined to take issue with him, but at all events no person would question that if the law affected injuriously 79,000 householders—and there was 500,000 who were not at all connected with agriculture in any shape or way—they ought not to be told that for the sake of removing a grievance from 79,000 of the inhabitants, they were to inflict an injury upon 500,000 others. He should like to see any hon. Member getting up and saying that he ever presented a Petition from any place, great or small, complaining of any wrong done to them in agricultural districts by this law. Of course, where a farmer or agriculturist inhabited a house, the household furniture and other effects were the smallest part of his capital. He had probably five times as much in stock and other property; but if they took the case of the poor householder, the circumstances were altogether different. His only capital as a rule was his sinews and bones, and they could not take these away from him. They remained at his own disposal. In the case of a farmer, the landlord could take the whole of the capital of the farm, visible or invisible, as far as it was embarked in the land. He spoke entirely in the interest of the working-classes, and he believed that it would be a disadvantage to tens of thousands of working men if they abolished this law in their case, because it was quite obvious that in the proposed new system, it would be impossible for them to give any security for the rent, and the consequence would be that they would be unable to get a house at all. It would be a great evil to abolish the law of hypothec generally.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought that the law as it stood at present had worked well for Scotland. There had been a great increase in her produce, and, as a rule, landlords and tenants worked admirably together. Not only that, but the manufacturing industry of that part of the Kingdom was such that the produce of Europe, India, and Australia, was brought in large quantities to the ports of Scotland. He would not believe any man who told him that the landed proprietors of Scotland had not done their duty. His recollection of Scotland extended, he was sorry to say, over 55 years. Before he first went to sea, he lived in that country, which was at that time almost covered with broom. There was, however, an indomitable spirit of energy and independence in the youth of Scotland, which was shared alike by rich and poor; and the sons of the upper classes went into foreign countries where they often made their fortunes, and returning, threw fresh capital into the soil, which enabled them to bring many enterprises to a successful issue, and greatly to increase the produce of the land. They were told that there had been a great many Petitions for the abolition of this law. Now, he knew exactly how Petitions were got up in Scotland. A number of persons were sent round with blank pieces of paper, to get signatures on any kind of representation, and when sufficient names were got, they were all put together on a piece of paper on which was the heading of the Petition. He had some of those documents got up in that way in his possession, and very curious they looked. The fact was, that this agitation was fostered, if not got up, by the Scotch Chambers of Agriculture, which, although useful at first, had much degenerated, and were now in the habit of only discussing matters on trade union principles. Men would not say in the House of Commons what they would at their own dinner tables, and it was necessary at once to fall down and worship the popular idol, whatever it might be.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) admitted that no candidate now came before an agricultural constituency in Scotland without declaring in favour of a change in this law, and of this the hon. Member opposite lately elected for Wigtownshire (Mr. Vans Agnew) was an instance. The hon. Baronet paid hon. Gentlemen who had supported the Bill on both sides of the House the compliment of saying that at his dinner table they would hold a different language. He hoped not; but for his part, he attached more importance to what a man said in his responsible place in the House of Commons, than at any dinner table. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), seemed to think that it was not right for hon. Members to advocate the views of their constituents; but he (Mr. Parker) considered that when a Member was elected for a certain constituency, under certain pledges, he was bound so far to represent their opinions in the House. He did not mean to say that he should argue against his own convictions of what was for the public good; but he thought that he was bound to express the opinions and feelings of his constituents, for though he might have private interests opposed to them, it was in that sense he was prepared to give his vote. He admitted that there was some weight in the argument of the hon. Baronet that this was not an exceptional law passed for the benefit of one class, but a remnant of the old Roman law, and a portion of the law at this day of most countries in Europe. He knew that there was a good deal to be said in its favour, but not sufficient to induce them to retain it; because, since the old Roman law was adopted the conditions of agriculture had been considerably changed, and in no country more than Scotland. It was not necessary to retain a law, because it existed in other nations of Europe; and since the people of Scotland had strongly expressed their opposition to it, he thought that Parliament should give due consideration to their wishes. On a former occasion the opposition to a similar measure was founded upon the analogy existing between the law of hypothec and that of distress in England. Those tactics had succeeded once, and the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) naturally had recourse to them again. There might be some analogy between the two laws, but he (Mr. Parker) contended that the one might be dealt with in Scotland, where it was felt as a grievance, without interfering with the other, if it was not felt as a grievance, in England. There were two reasons for the abolition of hypothec; first, that the landlord's preferential right against other creditors, however well known could not be enforced without creating a sense of injustice; and secondly, that it tended to make landowners less careful in the choice of tenants. On the other hand, he did not see any reason why it should be maintained, and therefore he would vote for the second reading of the Bill.

LORD ELCHO said, he certainly deprecated the idea that any Member of the House was sent there as the mere mouthpiece of his constituents. Certain persons always had the idea that when they were returned for a constituency, they were merely the delegates of that constituency. He repudiated that idea, and said that in his view, when once returned, a Member was bound to advocate the adoption of measures which were for the good of the community at large. With respect to the observation which had been made that persons would not say in the House what they say at their dinner tables, he thought it would be sometimes much better if they did. He entirely concurred in the powerful speech made by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman), who showed conclusively that the law of hypothec in no degree differed from the law of England, as respected houses, ships, and land, and various other kinds of property, and he confessed he was rather curious to hear how a shipowner, returned for an agricultural constituency, could draw such distinction between the two as to make him vote for the present Bill. The burgh Members for Scotland had endeavoured to satisfy their conscience by imagining that there was such a distinction, when in point of fact there was none. The fact was, that this was an attempt to do an impossible thing by legislation—namely, to put the owner of property into the same position as the person who wished to obtain possession of it, and that too in respect to a limited description of property, which was always in demand—namely, the land. To legislate in that way was to legislate upon unsound principle. As long as the demand existed, they would never be able to regulate these matters, and as soon as it ceased legislation would become wholly unnecessary.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that he was desirous to make a few observations on this measure from the point of view of an English lawyer. It appeared to him that hypothec, especially after the modifications made in it by the recent Act, was so similar to distraint for rent in England that the former could not be abolished without the latter being fully considered. Now in the value he set upon a landlord's right to distraint he did not go as far, or half as far, as his hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Leeman), who almost seemed to consider that that right could not be taken away without shaking the British Constitution to its foundations, and that if distress in the legal sense were abolished, wide-spread distress, according to the popular meaning of the word, would inevitably ensue. At the same time, it was clear that the House was not at present prepared to deal with the English law on this subject, and that being so, he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) thought that the present Bill could not be profitably proceeded with.

Mr. C. S. Parker

He believed that if the power of distress were destroyed, the principal result would be that landlords would habitually require bills of sale of the tenants' goods, which would put them in much the same position as if the right of distress still existed. He collected from the observations of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that the Scotch law recognized no instrument analogous to the bill of sale. But the point to which he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had just referred was one of those which required examination in that comprehensive view of English and Scotch law which ought to be taken before the House attempted further legislation on the subject.

MR. M. T. BASS said, that he had been a tenant-farmer for 50 years, and he was quite assured that no change in the law of hypothec would induce a Scotch or English landlord to take for his tenant a man who had not sufficient capital to farm the land, but he would always look out for a man who, by laying out his capital upon it, would render it more productive. At the same time, he wished to express, in the strongest manner he could, his objection both to the law of hypothec in Scotland and the law of distress in England, as being alike opposed to good farming and the interests of the community, and prejudicial to both landlords and tenants.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, that notwithstanding all the arguments that had been advanced against the measure, he should take the opinion of the House upon it. He could not consent to withdraw the 2nd clause, which he had inserted to fulfil a pledge he had given to those who had sent him there; but if an Amendment were proposed to limit the operation of the clause in respect to the urban population he should not oppose it, nor would he withdraw the Bill in consequence. At the same time, he did not himself see any difference between the urban and the rural population which should induce him to make any such exception.

MINORS' PROTECTION BILL.—[BILL 69.]

(Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Headlam, Mr. Butt, Mr. Scourfield, Mr. Charles Gilpin.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in moving "That the Bill be now read the second time," said, that the short time which remained would only allow him to say a very few words in asking the attention of the House to this Bill. Almost everyone knew the extent to which the money-lenders' conspiracy was carried on against young men and boys by the issue in extraordinary numbers of circulars and letters tempting them to borrow money. If these things were confined to the sons of rich men, or even to expectant heirs, it was not probable that he would have interfered in the matter; but he claimed the sympathy of the House on behalf of the parents of professional and struggling men, who, striving to meet the expenses of a public school or University education for their sons, found them exposed to these insidious and unprincipled temptations. Money-lenders' circulars were sent to the merest boys at public and private schools, and if time allowed he would relate to the House some of the strange facts that had been communicated to him. Now, in every civilized country, from the time of the Romans downwards, the law had endeavoured to give some protection to minors, and it was worthy of remark that the lex Latoria which dealt with the subject, was instituted in consequence of the mischief wrought by a noted money-lender. The present Bill had for its basis, in common with the Roman law, the institution of guardians; and it rendered it a misdemeanour to make loans, or to aid in procuring loans for gain, for those who were in the eye of the law infants, without the consent of their parents or guardians. According to the present law such loans were void ab initio, and could not be recovered at Common Law; and the main provisions of the Bill were merely directed to carrying out effectually that protection which the ingenuity of the money-lender enabled him to destroy. The most notable device was to induce a young man who had been inveigled into the money-lender's den to acquiesce in an admission that he was of age, although the money-lender perfectly well knew that he was not, and then by holding over the victim the terrors of the criminal law for obtaining money under false pretences to get a secure hold over the borrower. The Bill provided that no such plea as that could be urged against a minor in any Court of Law, and the effect would be to make the lender careful whom he trusted, and to require in doubtful cases corroborative evidence, such as a certificate of birth, before he parted with his money. No doubt, that and other clauses in the Bill would meet with hostile criticism; but he wished emphatically to say, that the Bill was not an example of amateur legislation, but had been drawn by two of the most competent and distinguished practising lawyers of the day; and, in his opinion—if a lay Member of Parliament, who might conceive that an alteration in any law could be advantageously made did, to the best of his ability, make himself master of the subject, and obtain the counsel and assistance of eminent jurists and experienced Members of the House, he had done everything in his power to secure himself from the charge of presumption in proposing changes in the law. Experience showed, and it was not in accordance with human nature that it should be otherwise, that great improvements in the law did not always spring from the legal profession itself. He trusted, therefore, that the House would not allow the Bill to be talked out, but would give it a second reading, and he could promise that those whose names were on its back were most anxious to profit by and to adopt any improvements that might be made in Committee. He would conclude by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

MR. LOPES said, he regretted the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich (Mr. West), who had put a Notice on the Paper for the rejection of the Bill. Legislation for the protection of children and young persons was rather the fashion just now, and the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had passed a Bill relating to those deserted bantlings who were found on the doorsteps of houses wrapped up in a portion of The Daily Telegraph. He yielded to no one in detestation of the practices against which this Bill was directed, but it was impossible that such a measure could become law. Under the present law, if a minor made a contract, it could not be enforced against him if he set up a plea of infancy, nor would it be any answer to the plea of infancy if the money-lender said—"You told me you were of age." The infant could upset the contract if he did not, after he came of age, confirm it. That was a very considerable protection, and it might be advisable to go still further. But, under the Bill, any person making or procuring to be made a loan to an infant, without the written consent of his father or guardian, was liable to fine or imprisonment. What would be the effect of that in the case of an infant, without either father or guardian, who might wish to make a contract highly for his own benefit—say for his advancement in life? Then, again, under Clause 10, no representation made by an infant as to his age was to be used in evidence against him in any Court or proceeding. Why, that would be holding out an inducement to a young man to say that which was false. Was such a clause ever inserted in an Act of Parliament before? The effect would be to subject a particular class—the money-lenders and bill discounters—to criminal proceedings. But were there not other classes quite as bad—the unscrupulous shopkeepers, for example, who persuaded young men to order goods they did not want and could not pay for; or quack doctors, who preyed upon young men quite as much as money-lenders? He could not help characterizing the Bill as most absurd, for the Legislature could not transfer to the criminal law matters which essentially belonged to the civil law. How far would it be necessary to go, moreover, if Parliament undertook to protect all the infants and all the idiots in the world? There were many men of 60 who were greater idiots than boys of 15. Let him point out another class of persons who required protection, and let the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) bring in a Bill to protect young men against the solicitation of importuning mothers who too often, in the language of the Preamble, "induce such infants to enter, improvidently and recklessly, into onerous contracts" which often turned out quite as detrimental to the interests of the young men as those contracts against which the hon. Member wished to protect them.

MR. MUNTZ, as the father of a family, thanked the hon. Gentleman the Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) who had brought in the Bill. Letters from money-lenders had long been known at the Universities, but they were now sent to the public schools—Eton, Rugby, Harrow, &c.—and boys of 13, 14, and 15 years of age were excited by these offers to every species of abomination and extravagance. He would admit that this Bill would not hold water, yet he should support the second reading, in the hope that it might be amended in Committee.

MR. F. S. POWELL also thanked the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) for the attempt he had made to stop this growing abuse. He knew from undoubted authority, that these practices had done much mischief in the University of Cambridge, and the heads of that University believed much good would result from its adoption.

DR. BALL said, he wished to express the opinion that the House would not succeed in any efforts to make people virtuous by the coercion of the criminal law. He was not prepared to say that the acts dealt with by the Bill were crimes; and he was strongly opposed to the introduction of new crimes to the law of the country. It was, moreover, by no means certain that the Bill would have any effect in preventing this particular class of offences?

MR. HENLEY said, that the question was not whether these practices were an evil, but whether the Bill would not be a much greater evil than that which it attempted to counteract. He had known a great many very "rum" transactions on the part of borrowers as well as lenders. Under the Bill a young man might swear till he was black in the face that he was of age, when he was a minor, in order to persuade the lender to advance him money, and then he was to go scot free. Such a law would breed up a generation of liars and swindlers. An infant of that kind might get a man's money, and then the wretched individual might be subjected notwithstanding to a penalty of £20 or two month's imprisonment. But that was not all. If the money was for the "bond fide advantage and benefit" of the young man, then all the provisions of the Bill were null and void. What a pretty thing that would be to have to ascertain! He could not imagine a wider or more difficult question to decide. Suppose a young man in the Army was in danger of losing his commission if he could not raise a certain sum; or, suppose it was necessary for him to pay his College dues; or suppose he was threatened with an action for seduction or breach of promise, and it was thought to be a benefit to him to get some money to stop the scandal.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

PUBLIC WORSHIP FACILITIES BILL.

(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

(NO. 56.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he had hoped that the second reading would have passed without opposition; but the Notice for its rejection given by his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) rendered it necessary for him to give an explanation of the measure; and whatever its fate, he was desirous that it should be fully discussed. Its object and its provisions were very simple. Its object was to pro-assumed that they would not abuse their trust. They acted, moreover, in the full light of public opinion, with a degree of responsibility scarcely resting on any layman, and it was a chimera to suppose that they would gratuitously promote parochial strife, the results of which would inevitably re-act on themselves. Their decision would have to be given in writing, the incumbent would have every facility of objecting, and the whole transaction would be as public as possible; while, should an unworthy person be unfortunately licensed, the licence was revocable by the Bishop. He would have nothing to do with the Bill were it likely to tell for one party in the Church and against another; but its effect, if any, must be equal on both parties, who would be equally able to take advantage of it; and it was more fit to meet the difficulties he had described than difficulties arising from differences of opinion. At present, as long as an incumbent complied with the bare requirements of the law, no action could be taken, though the Church might find dissent grow and infidelity increase—every other sect being free to open places of worship, and the Church alone being chained up and barred, however much the parishioners and the Bishop desired to remedy the evil. No measure of this kind could be free from objections, but they were far outweighed by its advantages; and in nine cases out of ten the freedom and power given by the Bill to the laity and diocesan would operate as a sufficient stimulus to induce a negligent or obstinate clergyman to meet the requirements of the parish. No one was more familiar with the evil than the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), and he would entreat him to propose a remedy, if he had one, but not to adopt towards the Bill a non possumus policy. The noble Earl, who had lightened many burdens, should not take the responsibility of stopping a measure which could produce only an infinitesimal degree of mischief, and of thereby leaving parishes in a state of paralysis and bondage, with the life-giving influences of religion checked.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Earl of Carnarvon).

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice—that the Bill be read a second time that day three months—said, that the magnitude of the subject did not seem to be altogether appreciated by the noble Earl who had taken charge of the Bill. He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had been appealed to not to impede the progress of true religion and shut out the light from the dark recesses of large populations. Now, so far from doing that, he would open the doors much wider than the noble Earl was prepared to do; he was prepared for a large and extensive scheme for letting in the light as far as possible on the whole mass of the population. The public hitherto had been silent on the Bill, but the clergy, in private communications, had not been entirely indifferent to it. One of the first men in the Church, Mr. Miller, of Greenwich, had described it as a revolutionary measure; and a letter he had just received from another incumbent denounced it as the culminating point of Episcopal aggression. The Bill was vicious in principle; and while he admitted that something ought to be done, it would be a remedy far worse than the disease, impairing, without any compensating advantage, the integrity and independence of the parochial system, and bringing great discredit on the Establishment itself. It was quietly introduced into the House of Commons, and passed through Committee in the small hours with one or two Amendments, but without a single speech throwing any light on its object and purpose. No public man besides the noble Earl had come forward as an advocate of it, and only two other authorities had been found in its favour—one, a pamphlet endorsed by Mr. Salt, the introducer of the Bill, but written, he believed, by a friend of his; the other, in a letter by an admirable and excellent man, Mr. Ryle, rector of Stradbroke. All those authorities urged the necessity of affording the people the largest means of enjoying the religious worship of the Established Church, and, the removal of many obstacles thereto, especially an abatement of the power of incumbents in obstructing all improvement by a rigid enforcement of the parochial system. Now, he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) concurred in the whole of that, and was prepared to go much further than the noble Earl in supporting a wide and deep reform, bringing the Church more into harmony with the existing wants and feelings of the people, and even bringing its government under better supervision and control. Mr. Ryle, originally a staunch supporter of the Bill, writing last April to The Record, admitted that it was not faultless, and was open to serious objections, even going so far as to say—

"It interferes rudely with the parochial system of the Church of England. It affects the position of incumbents. It risks the introduction of divisions, strife, and party spirit into parishes. It places a dangerous amount of arbitrary power in the hands of Bishops. All these are undeniable evils."

Deeming the evil so great that he was prepared nevertheless to support the Bill, how would Mr. Ryle remedy that evil? These were his words, and they were well worthy of the attention of those who supported the Bill—

"We must break the bonds which black tape has too long placed on us, and cast them aside. We must take the bull by the horns, and supplement the ministry of inefficient incumbents by an organized system of Evangelical aggression, and that without waiting for any man's leave. Parishes must no longer be regarded as ecclesiastical preserves, within which no Churchman can fire a spiritual shot or do anything without the licence of the incumbent. This wretched notion must go down before a new order of things."

Now, if that system of aggression were good for the Evangelical party, as it was called, it was equally good for the Ritualist and the Broad Churchman; all must be allowed to make their several attacks and form their several congregations as the Bishops, with their several tastes, might give them leave. That that—which he could not contemplate without dismay—was no mere theory, was shown by a letter written by a clergyman of considerable note, Mr. Portal, of Beauchere, Newbury, a neighbour of the noble Earl, in which he advocated a wider latitude and provision for at least three distinct schools of teaching within the Establishment. After arguing the question at some length, he said—

"We have now our three recognized parties; and I believe it will be infinitely conducive to peace and to religious liberty when each of these parties is allowed to have its own preachers and its own worship."

Could their Lordships think that desirable? Even Mr. Ryle, whose first letter was written before fully ascertaining the contents of the Bill, had written another, in which he said—

"One crying want of this day is liberty for Churchmen to provide additional places for worship, without being obliged to wait for the sanction either of the incumbent or the Bishop. This ought to be the main principle of Mr. Salt's Bill. If the present Bill, now before the House of Lords, cannot be amended so as to provide this liberty, by all means let it be thrown out. It would not be worth having, and might do more harm than good."

The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had spoken of the freedom enjoyed by other bodies as compared with the Church of England. Now, if he became a Unitarian or a Jew, he might have all the liberty he desired; but while a member of the Church of England he must surrender some portion of his liberty in return for the great privileges attached to an Established Church. As to proprietary chapels, they were by no means a parallel case, for the proprietor usually appointed the clergyman, while the incumbent's consent was necessary; whereas the Bill empowered the Bishop to nominate a clergyman in spite of the incumbent's objection. Now, in his Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had guarded against proceedings being improperly instituted against a clergyman by restricting the power of instituting a suit to three members of the Church, and by rendering them liable to costs as between attorney and client; but this Bill allowed 25 parishioners to set the Bishop in motion, without requiring them to be members of the Church, ratepayers, males, or even adults. In some parishes there were men whose object was to vex and worry the incumbent, and they would be able to take action under the Bill with that motive. As to the power to be conferred on Bishops—he wished to say, directly or indirectly, nothing which could be offensive to the Episcopal Bench, but Bishops were men of like passions and infirmities with laymen, and however satisfied one might be with the present occupants of the Bench, he could not be sure who would come after them. The operation of the Bill would resemble a system of terrorism, and many incumbents would never feel safe against being cited by 25 parishioners to give an account of their actions. Its operation was limited, indeed, to parishes with not less than 1,000 inhabitants; but the greatest amount of necessity, neglect, and ignorance existed in smaller parishes, and he could see no reason for a restriction which greatly weakened the case in favour of the Bill. As to the commission of inquiry which the Bishop, at his own option, or at the request of the incumbent or 10 parishioners, might appoint three out of its five members would be actually in the nomination of the Bishop, and experienced persons had told him that such a commission could not be discharged for less than £100. Even if the cost was only £50, it would be a serious matter for incumbents with small incomes. If the majority of the commissioners reported favourably, the Bishop might nominate a clergyman without the slightest regard for the feelings of the great bulk of the parishioners. He could conceive nothing more likely to drive people into Dissent. People had taken the parochial system with all its defects as inherited from their forefathers; but if, in addition to having an incumbent put upon them, another man could be put in by 25 parishioners, he believed many would declare the Established Church a nuisance, and would profer other denominations. Then, again, the Bill required copies of the notice to be given by the Bishop to the incumbent, to be posted in all Church of England places of worship in the parish—thus making the whole proceeding public. That notice, moreover, was to specify the name and residence of the clergyman whom it was proposed to licence—clearly implying that the parishioners were to express their opinion of his doctrine, and whether he was Ritualistic, or Neological, or Evangelical. The question would be talked of in the workshops and gin-palaces, and much of the spirit and feeling attending the election of clergymen in certain parishes by popular election would be excited. The man appointed would be shut out from any parochial duties, subject to the revocation of his licence by the Bishop in a more summary way than any curate was liable to, and while the Bill did not touch the incumbent's endowment and disallowed pew-rents, it made no mention of Easter offerings, free gifts, and collections, all of which might be had recourse to; so that if the licensee were planted, as would often be the case, in the richest part of the parish, they would gradually be absorbed, leaving the incumbent to his endowment only. Moreover, the last Proviso afforded a means whereby the Bishop might assign the new clergyman a source of income. It provided also—

"That the money given at the offertory and the alms collected at any public service held under this Act shall be disposed of as the incumbent and churchwardens may determine, unless the Ordinary shall otherwise direct."

Now, that was a Proviso which absolutely gave the Bishop the power to override the rubric, which said that—

"After Divine service is ended the money given at the offertory shall be disposed of for such pious and charitable uses as the ministers and the churchwardens shall think fit, wherein if they disagree it shall be disposed of as the Ordinary shall appoint."

Under the existing rubric, therefore, the Ordinary could not dispose of the money, unless the incumbent and the churchwardens disagreed; but under the Bill there would be no question of disagreements, and the Bishop might step in and direct the money to be disposed of entirely as he pleased, and the whole of it would, of course, go to maintain the new clergyman. In that way—and he was sorry to make the remark—a very large portion of patronage would in a short time pass into the hands of the Bishop. A clergyman, indeed, had written to him, entering into details as to an appointment which had been already made in the richest part of his parish, which was a very small one; and if the present Bill were to pass, a very large portion of his receipts would fall to nothing, and he would have to live on his own miserable endowment. He would pass over those objections to the measure, and would be prepared to give up all patronage, if necessary, if it stood in the way of the spiritual welfare of the people. He would, however, give it up only on the condition that it should not pass from lay into ecclesiastical hands. It was evident, he might add, that under the operation of the Bill the incumbent of a parish and the other clergyman who might be appointed would be likely to engage in a most strenuous rivalry. The one would be desirous of keeping his church full, while the other would have the same object in view with regard to his own place of worship; the one would strive to get the offerings, the other to keep them from him. That was a state of things which their Lordships could not, he thought, contemplate without regret. He recollected well the energy with which a noble Marquess declined as to the supposed consequences in that respect of a Bill which he had introduced, enabling three men in a parish to remove the Judge's office;" but the results in the present instance had been ten times worse, because instead of a single movement, there would be one which might be constantly renewed. Sunday after Sunday there would be such scenes as a Ritualistic clergyman and an Evangelical incumbent denouncing one another and hurling against one another the thunderbolts of theology. There would, in fact, be perpetual disputes, and perpetual rivalry. That being so, if Mr. Mackonochie—whose name he mentioned merely as a representative of extreme opinions as a High Churchman—had the care of souls in a certain parish, and that he (the Earl of Shaftesbury, who was supposed to be an extravagantly Low Churchman) had the power of appointing Dr. McNeil to act with him—he should do no such thing, because he should think it horrible to give occasion for disputes, and the exchange of hard words from Sunday to Sunday. He objected to anything of the kind on principle, and because such proceedings were calculated to drive many people into infidelity, and to induce them to ask whether there was any such thing as truth at all. He now came to that part of the Bill which gave the incumbent the right of appeal to the Archbishop of the Province; and that led him to the subject of the expense connected with proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Knowing them to be enormous he had written to Archdeacon Denison, Archdeacon of Taunton, to ask him what was the cost of an appeal to the Archbishop—as he himself had made an appeal, and had been awfully punished in consequence. The reply of the Archdeacon was as follows:—

"Dear Lord Shaftesbury, - The first step in the matter of expense was the requirement of £100 guarantee on account of each of my two curates. This guarantee I gave. When the judgment of the Appeal Court was given in our favour, we were made to pay our own costs. My bill of costs was £509 11s. 5d. Other necessary expenses connected with the appeal brought up the amount to nearly £600. Besides this, a demand was made upon me for costs in my priest curate's case up to the time of withdrawal of his appeal."

[His appeal was withdrawn upon the ground of a technical difficulty created by the Bishop having allowed his licence to lapse].

"I refused to pay the amount so demanded and have heard no more about it. I was also asked to pay £45 to the Archbishop's secretary for his attendance upon the Archbishop in Appeal Court. This I also refused to pay, and it was allowed that there was no legal claim for it. Upon the whole I have paid some £600, and if I had paid all I was asked to pay, it would have been some £800. Upon the above statement, which I place unreservedly in your hands, it does certainly appear that to give curates such power of appeal as this is a simple mockery."

He was sure their Lordships would concur in that view. No doubt, the whole system of Ecclesiastical fees demanded revision; they were oppressive in the extreme—and here was a pretty hope of redress, to be held out to a clergyman seeking justice. Such were the contents and purport of the Bill to which their Lordships were invited to give a second reading. They would admit, he was sure, that they were worthy of grave consideration. The integrity and independence of the parochial system were threatened, and without any adequate compensation; and yet the parochial system was in the present day the only practical argument for the maintenance of our Established Church. That something should be done to limit the obstructive power of incumbents he did not deny. But they must resist an effort to place it exclusively in the hands of the Bishops, to the vast extension of their Episcopal power, and to the increase of their ecclesiastical patronage. To accomplish its end, that Bill would put one or more preaching-houses in every district approved by the Bishop. Each clergyman so named, as well as the invaded incumbent, must be in perpetual rivalry with each other to win or to retain the greatest number of attendants at their respective places of worship, the greatest amount of Easter offerings, free gifts, and the like; and, in their zeal, to canvass for the rich, not unfrequently forgetting the poor. And yet how would that satisfy the people? Assume for the sake of argument, that it would give them more places of worship. Would it give them such a minister as they desired? Because, if it did not, the multiplication of places of worship would be of no avail. It was not so much the want of room as want of inclination that kept many away from our churches. They might see, at that moment, in London, churches in the midst of a dense population, not filled to the extent of one-third, because the minister and his services were altogether unattractive to them. Moreover, no sufficient reason had been assigned for the omission of the smaller population in the rural districts—generally the most necessitous, the most ignorant, and the most neglected. The minister oftentimes reigned paramount among them, with no resident country gentleman, away from public opinion, and not pressed by any of the sense of danger which arose from the presence of large masses. There were greater mischiefs to be apprehended from our rural districts than many people were aware of. It had been said that anyone who opposed this Bill must be prepared to propose a better. Was the assertion just? Was anyone bound to find a substitute for the proposition he rejected? Was it the dictate of common sense or the rule of ordinary life? But, so far as he was concerned, though there were none that he would offer as alternatives, there were some that he would rather accept than that Bill—all bad, but each preferable to the measure before them. He would like a Bill for a larger extension of district churches; he would even accept one for an increase of proprietary chapels; nor would he resist a Bill to restrain the rights of incumbents, and give to any ordained minister of the Church power to obey the call of a majority of dissatisfied parishioners, who, regardless of Bishop, rector, and patron, might form a congregation of their own choice—bad enough, he admitted—as approaching to the Congregational system, but yet better than ecclesiastical disorder under the sanction of authority. But the present Bill he must unhesitatingly oppose, for, in addition to its other evils, it was, as Mr. Miall said in The Nonconformist paper, the first step towards the disestablishment of the Church of England.

An Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day three months.")—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, the noble Earl who had just sat down (the Earl of Shaftesbury) appeared to think that the Bill originated with the Bishops, and that they looked upon it with great favour because it so largely increased their power. Now, the Bill did not originate from the Episcopal Bench. Two years ago a similar Bill was proposed in the other House of Parliament, he believed, by the same hon. Gentleman who proposed this measure, which now came up to their Lordships; and as the Bishops supposed that the clergy had not had then sufficient time to consider the whole subject, and as the Bill appeared somewhat rudely to interfere with the parochial system, most of his right rev. Brethren opposed it, and it was rejected. In the two years that had since elapsed, the Mover of the Bill in the other House had taken counsel in all directions respecting his measure. It had been before the clergy and the laity now for nearly two years; and he was bound to say, so far as his information went, that no strong feeling of opposition had been manifested against it in the ordinary way of petitioning either branch of the Legislature. Therefore his right rev. Brethren and he felt themselves in a somewhat different position from that which they occupied two years ago. They were led to suppose that those evils which the noble Earl contemplated as likely to arise from that measure, could not have presented themselves to the great body of the members of the Church of England, otherwise they would have heard of their alarm. The Episcopal Bench therefore had to consider whether, a measure being proposed by a layman and supported principally by lay authority, and having passed the other House, and being introduced by a layman into their Lordships' House, ought by them to be opposed or supported. He confessed that, regarding the measure as a very difficult one, believing that it was capable of a great deal of amendment, and that much might be said against it—as the noble Earl had abundantly proved—he still thought that its defects were greatly surpassed by its merits, and that more was to be said in its favour; and therefore he was prepared to vote for its second reading. But neither he, nor any of his right rev. Brethren separately, nor the whole Bench collectively, desired to be held responsible for the introduction of the measure; consequently, when the Bill was called a measure of Episcopal aggression, it must be understood that it was not an aggression which the Bishops on their own motion had made on the rights of the laity or clergy. It was quite possible that the measure might be of such a nature as greatly to increase their power, and he was glad if there was such confidence felt in the Bishops that lay members of the Church desired—if they did desire—to place so much power in their hands; and he did not believe it would be possible to construct any measure for the improvement of the Church in which Members of the Episcopal Bench could be omitted from consideration, and not allowed that due degree of influence which their very office implied. The noble Earl appeared to think the Bill gave the Bishops the power of nominating clergymen in a parish; but, as he read it, it gave no such power. The persons who were to nominate the clergymen were the laity of the parish. A certain number of laymen, perhaps too few—though that could be set right in Committee—requested that a certain clergyman should be licensed, and the Bishop had nothing to do with the matter, except either to licence or not to licence him. The power of the Bishops, therefore, would not be so largely increased as the noble Earl had imagined. He gathered from the noble Earl's speech that this was in no way a party question—in the sense of theological party. The noble Earl quoted a venerable Archdeacon, with whom he appeared to be in correspondence, and also the authority of Mr. Ryle; so that there seemed really to be a division of opinion on that matter, altogether irrespective of party; and he inferred from this that the measure, be it good or bad, was perfectly impartial, offering no more power to one party than to another. Before he proceeded to consider the objections of the noble Earl, he desired to call attention to one or two ways in which, according to the ancient constitution of the Church of England, the parochial system had in past times been somewhat interfered with. It was a common mistake to suppose that a parish could not be subdivided without the consent of the incumbent. Acts which bore the name of a noble Duke opposite and of Sir Robert Peel, gave power for the sub-division of parishes, and therefore interfered with the rights of those who were at the head of the old parishes. In his administration of the diocese of London, he too often found that when it was proposed to sub-divide a parish the incumbent was dead against

it. Then the power of the Ecclesiastical Commission and the Bishop of the diocese were put in force, and the parish was sub-divided, and the clergyman who before had been endeavouring to force his way into the parish himself became an incumbent. But in London the population increased very rapidly, and the clergyman who had forced his way into the parish of the original incumbent soon found some other clergyman equally anxious to force his way into his parish; and however eager he had been to obtain access to the parish of the old incumbent, he was almost certain to resist strenuously the attempt of the new-comer. They might, therefore, go too far in preserving the rights of incumbents. No doubt, they had rights, and these rights ought to be respected; but he considered their right as of no importance at all, if they in any way interfered with the spiritual benefit of the people placed under their charge. Moreover, from the days of the Commonwealth, if not before, there had been lecturers in most of the large parishes; and though the incumbent might have power to protest against the appointment of the lecturer, in point of law, he was quite certain that some pressure, gentle or otherwise, would be brought to bear to secure the appointment; and the lecturer, once appointed, he was not aware that a new incumbent coming into office could remove the lecturer otherwise than by undertaking all the duties himself, and even then there would be great difficulty in preventing the lecturer from performing the duties for which he was appointed. Then there were proprietary chapels, with many of which they were familiar, in London. In London, indeed, in the days of his predecessor, Bishop Porteus, he believed the only real extension of the Church of England to the wants of the congregation came from the introduction of these proprietary chapels, which were not very easily distinguishable from the sort of chapel proposed to be erected by this Bill. It was true that the consent of the incumbent, willing or unwilling, given freely or under pressure, was required before a clergyman could obtain possession of one of these proprietary chapels; but, once there, it was impossible for the incumbent to remove him, and he remained irremovable in spite of the incumbent, exercising his office according to a system which, whether it belonged to the original Constitution of the Church or not, was at least a hundred years old. Therefore, there was not so much novelty as at first appeared in the proposal of the noble Earl who had introduced this Bill. Moreover, in the overgrown parishes of London, it was considered most desirable to introduce missionary clergymen to exercise their office among the poor. Those persons were selected for the express purpose of ministering to the poor, and they were persons, generally, who had a certain capacity for addressing the labouring classes. It was very true that the incumbent might at any time refuse permission to any of these persons to officiate in his parish; but, as a matter of fact, incumbents were in one way or another induced to allow these somewhat irregular agencies, and the missionary clergy were reckoned, as he heard that day at a meeting of the Bishop of London's Fund, one of the most valuable agencies at present in existence for the evangelization of a large class of our fellow-countrymen. Therefore, though this measure might go a little further, it was still travelling in the course in which legislation and custom had been travelling of late years—relaxing the parochial system in order to meet the exigencies which arose by an increasing population, or by an increased sense of responsibility to that population. He should be quite ready to agree that the measure should go to a Select Committee, or that it should be examined in detail in a Committee of the Whole House and every provision dealt with upon its merits; but he must allude to a few more of the points raised by the noble Earl. Seeing the need for an extension of the evangelizing agency of the Church, he was not prepared to reject the measure. He was surprised that the noble Earl should be so afraid of the name of the clergyman being submitted to the parishioners. The noble Earl seemed to think that nothing but evil could possibly arise from such a system, but, with some little inconsistency, he suggested at the end of his speech, that the laity should be the persons to pronounce judgment upon the qualifications of their minister. He (the Archbishop of Canterbury) saw no objection to the laity having a voice in the appointment of the clergyman, or to the names being placed on the church door, in order to give them publicity; and he could imagine an incumbent who had not done a great deal in past times, being stirred to a sense of duty by the knowledge, that there was a chance of his parishioners nominating some person whom the Bishop would licence to perform certain functions which he had failed to perform. He should certainly object to the Bishop appointing three members of the Commission, and he saw nothing in the Bill to throw the expenses on the clergyman of the parish; but if any, those expenses would be very small indeed. His belief was with regard to fees, that the fees complained of by the noble Earl were not ecclesiastical, but were those payable to certain members of the legal profession who were called upon to address the Archbishops and Bishops on these occasions. He knew that in the case of Appeal to which the noble Earl alluded, two gentlemen of the long robe addressed him (the Archbishop of Canterbury) in a long oration, and a very considerable portion of the sum of £600, of which mention had been made, went no doubt into the pockets of those gentlemen. In conclusion, he must say that he had found this a matter somewhat difficult to decide, but upon the whole, he thought that the Bill ought to be carried. He had no fear that its effect would be to abate the zeal of Churchmen for the erection of new churches, for in the diocese of London it was found that the construction of these temporary chapels almost always led to the erection of a permanent church afterwards. The noble Earl who moved the rejection of the Bill feared that the destruction of the Church would follow, because the Bill adapted itself to the wants of the times in the manner proposed. He (the Archbishop of Canterbury) did not share in that fear, and the noble Earl's remarks, in which he quoted Mr. Miall, reminded him of a recent discussion in that House, and which had been echoed back from Scotland, in which it appeared that the seceding bodies in Scotland expressed an apprehension that any extension of the Established Church in Scotland would lead to its destruction. He thought that, on the contrary, its extension would strengthen it, and do some damage to those who had suddenly awakened to a sense of its value. The clergyman of a parish claimed a monopoly, but it must be admitted that this was sometimes a monopoly of eccentricity or of neglect upon which it was desirable some check should be placed, and because the Bill imposed such a check, he had determined, after very considerable hesitation, to support the second reading.

THE BISHOP OF LLANDAFF said, that there was no difficulty in getting good congregations in Wales when the Church of England had an opportunity of putting itself before the people; and from a long practical experience, he could testify as to the necessity that existed for giving such facilities as were requisite for the purpose. Notwithstanding all the exertions of both Protestants and Dissenters, there was still a great amount of practical irreligion and ungodliness which required all the earnestness and zeal of Christians to contend against; more especially, when it was considered that under the existing system, it was impossible for members of the Church to do all they might do. The present jealousy of Episcopal power, of archidiaconal influence, and of the clergy generally, was utterly unworthy of many of those who entertained it, and he trusted that their Lordships would give a second reading to the Bill, in order that greater facilities of religious worship might be provided for the Church in Wales.

LORD DYNEVOR spoke from experience as a minister of the Church of 45 years' standing, and declared his conviction that the Bill would do more harm than good. He thought that in very large parishes the incumbent ought not to have a veto; but he believed that the effect of passing such a measure as that proposed by this Bill would be to create strife in every parish, and that it would prove an impediment to religion more than anything else. It would create a Cave of Adullam in every parish, and have effects similar to those which occurred in Ireland on the appointment of coadjutor priests by the Roman Catholic Bishops.

On Question that ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents, 52; Not Contents, 68; majority, 16. Resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2^d this day three months.

REGISTER FOR PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTORS BILL.

(The Lord Privy Seal).

(NO. 133.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that he had supposed that, considering that the Bill related solely to the constitution of the other House, and that it had been introduced and fully discussed there, it would not have been necessary for him to say more than a few words in asking their Lordships to give it the second reading. But the Notice which had been placed upon the Paper by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) made it necessary to go into the details of the measure at greater length than he had proposed. As to the principle of the Bill, no opposition whatever had been raised in the other House. So far both sides were in accord. Why, therefore, the noble and learned Lord should now move its rejection was more than he could understand. If indeed, the noble and learned Lord objected to certain of the clauses, and had given Notice that they should be omitted in Committee, or if he thought that some of the details could be advantageously altered, or that some new propositions could be advantageously added, that could have been easily understood; the noble and learned Lord's objections and wishes could have been considered and, where needful, concessions might have been made; but the noble and learned Lord's proposition to reject the Bill altogether was not, under the circumstances, easily intelligible. The primary object of the Bill was to provide for a single register of Parliamentary and municipal votes; and a second object was the prevention of frivolous objections, and for providing a simpler form of appeal against the decisions of the Revising Barrister that at present existed. For the first of these purposes the Bill provided that where a municipal borough is wholly or partly coincident with a Parliamentary borough, the electors of such Parliamentary borough and the burgesses of such municipal borough shall be comprised in one register of electors. For this purpose the registration of burgesses was assimilated to the registration of Parliamentary electors, and all the provisions of the Parliamentary Electors Registration Acts were, so far as circumstances would admit, made applicable to the former. As the dates fixed by the present law for qualifications, claims, revision, and so on, in respect of the municipal and Parliamentary franchises were generally dissimilar, it was provided by the 3rd clause that all dates now provided by the Acts relating either to Parliamentary or municipal elections should be altered, and that the dates applicable to the several subjects should be the same for both. The first Schedule appended to the Act set forth in a tabular form the present and the substituted dates. The 5th clause contained a complete scheme for the registration of lodgers. The second section of the Bill was directed to the prevention of frivolous objections. It was enacted that every notice of objection, to be valid, must state specifically the ground or grounds of objection. Each ground of objection was to be treated by the Revising Barrister as a separate objection, and he was directed to award costs to the amount of at least 2s. 6d. on each several objection that might fail, notwithstanding that the claim might be struck out upon some other ground. Where a person who is actually on the list of voters is objected to, and the voter is retained on the list, the Revising Barrister is to order costs to be paid to the person objected to. He thought these penalties would be sufficient to protect persons from the annoyance of frivolous objections. They would probably prevent unscrupulous agents from giving notices of objection on the calculation that the persons objected to might not think it worth while to attend to maintain their claims. The length to which this vexatious practice was sometimes carried might be shown from the fact that in the last registration for Oldham 11,000 objections were made when the total number of electors was about 14,000. The Bill also contained a variety of provisions relating to the Revising Barristers' Courts and the procedure by and before that officer. The only clauses with which he should trouble their Lordships were those which provided an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister, and directed that there should be an evening sitting for the purpose of revising. In the first case it was provided that the Revising Barrister might be compelled by the person aggrieved to state a case for the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, and in the latter it was provided that every barrister appointed to revise the list for any Parliamentary or Municipal borough containing a population exceeding 10,000 shall hold at least one evening sitting of his Court in such borough, for the convenience of those persons who by reason of the nature of their employment, or otherwise, are unable to attend the Court during the day. He thought this provision would confer a great boon upon the poorer classes of voters. These were the principal provisions of this important measure as it was sent up to their Lordships from the other House, after having undergone careful consideration and much alteration in Committee. The Bill could not, he thought, be looked upon with any considerations of party whatever. It had been introduced simply to facilitate the exercise of the franchise by those upon whom it had been recently conferred by the Legislature, and, so far as he could see, must be beneficial to both parties alike. The Act of 1867 had made the Parliamentary and Municipal franchise in boroughs identical, and it was a pure waste of time and expense to have two registrations of the same qualification of the same person. He trusted, therefore, their Lordships would not withhold their assent to the Bill which had been sent up to them by the other House of Parliament. He might add that the Bill was not to extend to Scotland and Ireland.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord Privy Seal).

LORD CAIRNS said, the noble Viscount (the Lord Privy Seal) was unable to see on what grounds any opposition would be offered to the second reading of the Bill; and, having heard the objections which had occurred to the noble Viscount as being the only objections that could be raised to it, he (Lord Cairns) perhaps must not be surprised at his surprise. He knew so well the candour of the noble Viscount that, when he ventured to state some of the objections which had not yet occurred to his noble Friend's mind, he did not altogether despair that he would be disposed to agree that under the guise of a very simple character the Bill, when it came to be understood, embraced changes of very great gravity and very great danger. Before dealing with the objects of the Bill as stated by the noble Viscount, he solicited particular attention to the manner in which as a piece of legislation it proposed to deal with the registration law of the country. There were at present some 10 or 12 statutes—doubtless of a complicated character—provided for the borough and county registration of England; but those statutes had by degrees come to be so well understood that during last year there were scarcely any appeals, and perhaps he might say no appeal involving any question of importance. They abounded in minute details of dates, times, and periods at which and during which certain steps must be taken in boroughs and counties, and with those dates all the official bodies and individuals in the boroughs and counties were now perfectly well acquainted. He did not know whether their Lordships were disposed to attend to what might be termed "a Chinese puzzle;" but he could direct attention to a number of Chinese puzzles of a most intricate kind which might rise out of the Bill. The first Schedule gave about 20 or 30 dates in one column, and about 20 or 30 other dates in another column; the dates in the later column being the dates to be substituted for the dates in the earlier column. He demurred to the idea that it was the business, the duty, or the privilege of Parliament to set Chinese puzzles for the people of this country, and for the Judges who had to decide what the law of the country was. Their Lordships were supposed to have a little more leisure than the other House of Parliament, and that they could therefore supervise the legislation of the other House, and see that it was expressed in a proper manner; and that that was necessary in this case he could show, for of all the Bills brought up from the other House, or, indeed, presented to Parliament for consideration within his experience, that was the worst. In fact, he never before saw anything like the way in which the Bill proposed to deal with the whole series of Acts of Parliament, sprinkling

new dates over old ones, and introducing new names to be substituted for others. The 5th section provided that every person claiming to be a Parliamentary elector for any borough in respect of the occupation of lodgings shall send his claim to the overseers "after the day substituted by this Act for the last day of July, and on or before the day substituted by this Act for the twenty-fifth day of August;" so that the intended claimant must study his almanac carefully to see to what the dates referred. Part of the Bill was to come into operation immediately after it passed, and the residue was not to take effect till January 1874. Would their Lordships desire to have a metaphysical puzzle? If they did, they had only to look at the 44th section, which specified certain clauses that were to come into operation on the passing of the Act, and the remainder of the Bill, which included that very section, was not to come into operation till the 2nd of January, 1874. The section, which was to make the other sections come into operation immediately, was not itself to come into operation till January, 1874. The repealing clause, too, which was to repeal existing provisions as to registration, was not to take effect till next year, and therefore, if they passed the Bill, there would be two sets of provisions as to registration in force at the same time. The Bill was positively disgraceful in point of drawing; and it was useless to go into Committee upon it; for it could not be amended so as to provide a Code of Municipal and Parliamentary Registration Law. The Select Committee of the House of Commons, though they differed on many points, united in the recommendation that a Consolidation Bill should be introduced without delay, dealing with the borough registration. This Bill, however, was not to affect the list of voters for this year, either Parliamentary or municipal. It could not affect any municipal list except that which came into operation in November, 1874; and it could not affect any list of Parliamentary voters, which would come into operation till after, in all probability, there had been a new Election. The objects of the Bill as described by the noble Viscount were to have one list of voters both for Parliamentary boroughs and municipal boroughs; to provide a practical appeal, which there had not been hitherto, against improper rejection of claims; to make provision with regard to frivolous objections against the claims of voters. That was what the Bill aimed at, and what it failed to secure. The noble Viscount said it was desirable there should be only one register and one revision of Parliamentary and municipal voters, and all that he stated about the saving of expense was connected with that revision. What the Bill aimed at in regard to the saving of expense it signally failed in effecting, and he hoped to convince the noble Viscount himself that it was impossible to have one list for Parliamentary and municipal electors. The Bill, in fact, admitted upon the face of it, that there could not be one list. In sub-section 4 of Clause 4 it was provided that—

"Where a Parliamentary borough is wholly or partly coincident with a municipal borough, the list, for the purpose of claims and objections, and (if and so far as the revising barrister so directs) for the purpose of the revision thereof, shall be deemed to be composed of two separate lists, of which one (omitting part B. of the first column and everything exclusively relating thereto) relates only to Parliamentary electors, and the other (omitting part A. of the first column and everything exclusively relating thereto) relates only to burgesses."

Thus having gone through the operation of printing upon one and the same paper a list of the burgesses and the Parliamentary electors, it was necessary to declare that this was to be read not as one, but as two lists. If their Lordships would look at this list in the Schedule, they would find that any man in the country might be misled, and that there would be people coming forward to vote at Parliamentary elections because their names were in this list, whereas they were only entitled to vote at municipal elections. And the saving of expense would be effected by burdening these districts with the expense of preparing and printing this double list when they only wanted one list. He now came to the question of revision. The obscurity with which this Bill was drawn was so great that it had almost passed the House of Commons before its effect upon the counties of England came to be known, and the counties were now only awaking to that knowledge. He could state from communications addressed to himself—and other noble Lords had received similar representations—that the effect of the Bill was regarded in the counties with positive alarm.

Their Lordships would remember that the measure was not brought forward for the purpose of giving to the counties any advantage whatever, or of saving the counties a single shilling; yet it overthrew the whole system of county registration in England for the purpose of conferring some supposed advantage upon the boroughs. The present Parliamentary revision in counties was fixed at the most convenient period—namely, between the 20th of September and the last day of October. The harvest was then over, the agricultural classes had a little leisure, and when the revision was concluded, there was a period of two months between the 31st of October and the 1st of January, when the county list came into operation. In 1867, it was found that one month was insufficient, and arrangements were made to give two months for this purpose. But in order to get the Revising Barristers to work earlier and to have the list out in time for the municipal elections in November, this Bill proposed that the dates should be altered. The county revision was now to be carried on between the 9th of August and the 20th of September. In the northern counties this was the period of the harvest; many of the circuits were settled for this period, and the Revising Barristers were engaged; so that for no purpose or advantage connected with counties, and for the mere object of getting out certain burgess lists with which the counties had nothing to do, the Bill proposed to subvert and overturn all the county arrangements, and to throw the county revision to a period when the claimants could not attend, when the legal profession could not attend, and when it was doubtful whether the Revising Barristers could be present. The Bill also shortened the period during which the clerks of the peace were to deliver the register. At present, the register was to be delivered between the 30th of November and the 31st of December. Under the Bill the 21st of October was to be the date of delivery of the register. He had received a communication from the clerk of the peace of a county in which there were 17,000 voters who assured him that it would be utterly impossible for him to see to the printing and revision of the lists for which he was responsible, and to have the register in operation by the 22nd October. That, however, was the whole principle of the Bill. He believed that that had only been known lately in the counties, where it was expected that the Bill would be withdrawn when these defects were pointed out, and that a Consolidation Bill would be brought in. It was now found that the authors of the measure refused to make these alterations, and it was felt that the rejection of the Bill was absolutely necessary. The next object was to improve the right of appeal; but the appeal provided under the Bill was the purest mockery. The appeals from the revision under this Bill were to the Court of Common Pleas. The revision was to be carried out between the 9th of August and the 20th of September. The Court of Common Pleas sat on the 2nd of November; but the municipal elections were held on the 1st of November, so that all the voters who ought not to have been on the list would have voted, and all those who ought to have been on the register would lose their votes before the Court of Common Pleas could be appealed to, and next year another list would be made out. And that was the appeal provided by the present Bill. The next object of the Bill was to do away with frivolous objections. Well, they were bad things, but frivolous claims were just as bad, and he should say that that was really a Bill to turn frivolous claims into votes, and its machinery might be worked with unerring precision to accomplish this object. The effect of the Bill was, in the first place, to make the overseers of the poor the absolute masters of the registration of voters; secondly, to throw every possible obstacle in the way of making objections to bad claims; and, thirdly, to give every possible facility to the making of bad claims. Now, when an objection was made to a claim, the objector could be examined as to the validity of it, and if it turned out that the objection was frivolous, the Revising Barrister had full power to mulct the objector in costs. It did not, in the long run, suit the purpose of a political agent to make what were called frivolous objections, which were very irritating to the men objected to; and, besides being an impolitic course, it was a costly one. And on that point he should like to quote a Report of a Committee of the other House. They said that, as the Revising Barrister could not refuse to place on the register a claimant to whom there was no objection, and as unqualified persons came on with undue facility—an evil which would prevail more largely but for the existence of party registration societies, by whom the register was purified and a check placed upon unqualified claims—they deprecated the very change proposed by this Bill—the throwing of the onus probandi on the objector; the Committee, therefore, were unwilling to cast unnecessary obstacles in the way of objectors, or to make the law more stringent and severe than it was in the matter of costs. Their Lordships, therefore, would not be led away by the term “frivolous objections.” It was essential to the purification of the register that there should be proper facilities for the making of objections. It was proposed by the Bill that an objector, even if the claimant did not appear, should give prima facie evidence of the validity of the objection—that was, evidence which would be conclusive if it were not met on the other side. Why, in many cases such evidence could be obtained only from the mouth of the claimant himself, and the objector could not state what he had simply heard or had reason to believe. Under such a requirement many would remain on the register who had no right to be there. It seemed as if the object of that part of the Bill was really to facilitate improper claims. Previously it was required that the successive occupations in one borough which constituted the qualification should be stated, but now only the last was to be named, and therefore it would be impossible for objectors to make the necessary investigations beforehand. Under the Bill objections might be made without prima facie evidence, without cost, without risk or liability, by the overseers, who, where politics ran high, were chosen as party men, and even if not now, certainly would be under the operation of this Bill, because the overseer would be master of the situation and proprietor of the register. But where objections were made by persons “other than the overseer,” prima facie proof was to be required. He was told that in some cases now party objections were made through overseers; but, at present, the other side had equal liberty of objection. This Bill would alter the footing of one party in each place, and so make at each place the appointment of the overseer a party question. The Select Committee of the other House refused to entrust overseers with this duty and recommended the creation of a new officer for the purpose. An expiring Parliament ought not to make a fundamental change of the kind proposed by this Bill—a change, too, which could not come into operation before, to a moral certainty, we should have a new Parliament. An expiring Parliament would have been more usefully occupied in consolidating the law rather than in making fundamental changes in it, and discounting the proposals which must come before the new Parliament. He was anxious to facilitate the registration of lodgers as enfranchised by the Bill of 1867, but a clause of this Bill subverted the conditions on which the lodger franchise was granted. By the Bill of 1867 this franchise was carefully guarded by different considerations connected with the character of the house, of the tenure of the lodger, and the relations which existed between landlord and tenant, and it was further insisted that the claim of the lodger should be renewed every year. Those were the conditions on which it was deemed wise and safe to establish the lodger franchise. Curiously enough, this subverting clause was not in the Bill as originally introduced by the Government, and it had nothing whatever to do with the main object of the measure, which was to assimilate Parliamentary and Municipal elections. A very respectable Gentleman—Mr. Rathbone, the hon. Member for Liverpool—brought in a Bill containing this clause about lodgers, and the Government accepted it and introduced it into their own Bill. He had heard it said—he knew not with how much truth—that a great political effect would be produced in the borough of Liverpool by any measure which would place 2,000 more lodgers on the list, without a narrow scrutiny as to their right to be there. In regard to lodgers, objectors were required by the present Bill to give prima facie evidence of the ground of their objections, but that it would be almost always impossible to do in the case of lodgers. Again, the 5th clause of the Bill provided that the overseers should—betical order, and should add 'objected to' against any claimant whom they might have reasonable cause to believe to be not entitled to be registered."

Now it was clear that an overseer, with a strong political bias, might object to a great many claimants, and if they did not appeal against the overseer's objection they would, as a matter of course, be struck off the list. In that way, the overseers might weed the lodger-roll from one end to the other; and it would be comparatively easy to succeed in doing this, because many of the lodgers were persons whom it was difficult to get to appear in Court. Besides, he would remark that these provisions as to the lodger franchise could not take effect except in reference to the list, which was not to come into force until the end of the year 1874; and he maintained that a change of such vast importance ought to be made in a new, and not in a moribund Parliament. He would suggest that the measure should be withdrawn, and that the Government should introduce a Consolidation Bill. As it now stood, he must repeat that it seemed to him to have three objects:—First, to make the overseers of the poor absolute masters of the registration of the country; second, to place every possible obstacle in the way of making objections to bad claims; and thirdly, to give every possible facility for turning bad claims into votes. For those reasons he should ask their Lordships to reject it.

An Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day three months").—(The Lord Cairns.)

VISCOUNT HALIFAX, who was indistinctly heard, was understood to say that the House might strike out in Committee the clause relating to lodgers, so that could by no means be such a valid objection to the progress of the Bill as the speech of the noble and learned Lord implied. As to the objection against the alterations proposed in dates, the Schedules provided generally that the dates for the various proceedings in reference to registration and other things should be two months earlier than at present, and there was no "Chinese puzzle" in such a process of substitution. As to the objection on the score that only one part of the Bill would come into operation this year and the other part not till next year, it was impossible to carry out a Bill of this description otherwise.

On Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents, 26; Not-Contents, 62: Majority, 36.

Resolved, in the negative; and Bill to be read 2^a this day three months.

ADMISSION TO BENEFICES AND CHURCHWARDENSHIPS, &c., BILL.

(The Lord Archbishop of York.)

(NO. 153). COMMITTEE.

House in Committee according to Order.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to with Amendments,

Clause 3 (Salaries of Archdeacons may be raised to £200 per annum.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, in moving that the clause be agreed to, said, it was not intended to create any new charge on the Common Fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in moving to strike out the clause, said, he objected to these salaries being taken from that common fund which was intended solely to meet the spiritual necessities of the people. What was the sum already raised in various ways for the purposes of the archdeacons? According to a Return which he had, the archdeacons received £11,800 a-year, of which about £3,800 was for themselves, about £5,000 was for registries, £800 for officials, and £1,600 for apparitors. If that large sum of £11,800 per annum were better distributed, it would be sufficient for the archdeacons and for other purposes. The £5,000 a-year for registers was nearly all taken in fees from the parochial clergy. The clergy complained of the pressure of those fees, and that clause in the Bill took from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to that extent the power of reducing them.

Moved, to leave out Clause 3,—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the Bill had now arrived at a satisfactory point, and he trusted the noble Earl would not press his Amendment.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that he would not carry his Amendment to a division against the feeling of the House; but he begged solemnly to protest against the clause, and the payment from such a source. He was afraid it might be drawn into a precedent for the payment of additional bishoprics from the same fund.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Report of the said Amendments to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 176.)

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND) INSPECTORS. QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Minute of the Board of Supervision, dated the 8th May last, relating to Inspectors of Poor in Scotland, has or has not been found to be in excess of the statutory powers conferred upon the Board by the Act of the 8th and 9th Vic. c. 83; and, whether, in the event of this being the case, it is his intention to instruct the Board of Supervision to cancel the Minute referred to?

MR. BRUCE: In answer to the Question of the hon. Baronet, I may say that in reply to an inquiry addressed to me by the Board of Education in Scotland, my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate informed them that, in his opinion, the Minute issued by the Board of Supervision was beyond their powers, and that, so long as the Inspectors of the poor performed their duties "faithfully and efficiently," they had no power to deprive them of their appointments. In reply to the second Question, he begged to say that the Secretary of State had no power to instruct the Board of Supervision to cancel the Minute.

ARMY—COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE FORCES IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be not the fact that the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland has been absent from duty about fifteen months out of the last thirty; and, if not, how many; and whether, during all that absence, he was allowed to draw command allowance and table allowance, while the duties and expenses for which these allowances are made devolved on others?

MR. CARDWELL: In order to answer the Question which has been put by the hon. Gentleman it has been necessary for the Adjutant General to refer to the general officer commanding in Dublin, and as soon as a reply is received from him I shall be in a position to give the information asked for.

GUNPOWDER ACT—SHIPMENT OF GUNPOWDER AT NEWHAVEN.

QUESTION.

MR. MILLER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to take measures to avert the imminent danger to Edinburgh, Leith, and neighbourhood, arising from the shipment of gunpowder at Newhaven Pier, and from the transmission of it from the manufactory to the pier, as now carried on, and as brought out in the Report of Major Majendie to the Government; and, if so, whether he is prepared to state what the measures are?

MR. BRUCE: Major Majendie's Report, which was very full and elaborate, was received at the Home Office on the 26th of May, and forwarded to the Leith Harbour Commissioners on the 30th. The Report contained several recommendations for the purpose of diminishing the risk now incurred both in the conveyance of powder and its shipment.

Mr. Bruce

These are now under the consideration of the Commissioners. With respect to any danger which may arise from the conveyance of gunpowder in disregard of the provisions of the Gunpowder Act, it is the duty of the local authorities, not of the Secretary of State, to take the necessary steps for enforcing the law.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1872—THE POOR LAW.—QUESTION.

MR. MILLER asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, under the provisions of "The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872," a parent would be rendered a pauper by having his child or children provided with Elementary Education under the sixty-ninth section of that Act; and, if there is any dubiety as to this, whether he will take such measures as to make it clear for the guidance of parochial boards?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: My attention has been called to the paragraph in the Minute of the Board of Education in Scotland which I presume has suggested the Question. When the Scotch Education Bill was under consideration in this House it was stated more than once that the payment of school fees under the clause referred to would not have the effect of rendering the parents of the child paupers. I expressed that opinion unhesitatingly, and I have expressed it to the Board of Education.

SALMON FISHINGS (SCOTLAND.)

QUESTION.

MR. ELLICE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can give an assurance that, as a general rule, proprietors of, or public bodies interested in, lands ex adverso of the sea shore where Salmon Fishings belonging to the Crown are situate, shall have the refusal of such Salmon Fishings; and, where exceptional circumstances appear to warrant a departure from such rule, that such proprietors or public bodies shall have full opportunity for representing their case to the proper department?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests inform me that it would be inconsistent with their duty to give such an absolute assurance as my hon. Friend seems to desire; but they will give every consideration to applications of proprietors of lands ex adverso of the sea shore wherever Salmon Fishings belonging to the Crown are to be let.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND)

ACT, 1870—THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

QUESTION.

MR. HUNT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether at a recent examination of a school in Wiltshire the Government Inspector refused to allow the children to sing "God save the Queen," as being contrary to the principles of the 7th section of "The Elementary Education Act, 1870;" and, if so, whether such refusal has the sanction of the Committee of Council on Education?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, in consequence of the information given to me by the right hon. Gentleman, I made inquiries in regard to this case, which I had not previously heard of. I found that the Government Inspector did think it his duty to prohibit the singing of the National Anthem during the hours for secular education, as being contrary to the Education Act. I need not say that he, like every other Inspector, would, from feelings of loyalty, have had great pleasure in hearing the Anthem sung, but he thought its singing under the circumstances contrary to the Act. The opinion of the Department, however, is that it is not so, and we have informed the Inspector that he laboured under a mistake.

ARMY—RECRUITS—INACCURATE RETURNS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, who had given Notice of his intention to ask the Secretary of State for War a Question with reference to a Return as to Recruits, said, In asking the right hon. Gentleman the Question that stands in my name, I am anxious it should not be assumed that any suspicion exists in my mind that the right hon. Gentleman personally gave any instructions to those who made these Returns that any Return should be made other than what was strictly conformable to the truth. I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to a letter from Colonel Anson in the "Times" of the 24th instant, in which Colonel Anson states, with reference to a "Return of the age and chest-measurement of Recruits since July, 1870," presented to the House of Lords on the Motion of the Duke of Richmond, that "when the forms sent down to the various regiments to be filled up from their records were sent back, the Returns in some cases disclosed the fact that a certain laxity existed somewhere, and that men had been enlisted under regulation measurement. Where this was found to be the case, the Returns were sent back from the War Office with orders to the commanding officers to transfer the men enlisted under the regulation measurement from a column in the Return noting that fact to a column which showed them to be over the regulation measurement, and in such altered form was the Return presented;"

and, whether this statement is true; and, if so, what explanation can be given of the orders so sent to commanding officers to alter the figures with which they had filled up the column for chest-measurement in the Return?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, when I saw the letter in The Times, I sent to the Adjutant General's Department for information upon the subject, and I am informed that the following are the circumstances of the case:—Under the Queen's Regulations the Commanding Officer of the regiment is bound to ascertain the chest-measurement of every recruit he passes, and no recruit is accepted who is below the regulation measurement without the special permission of His Royal Highness the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. When the Duke of Richmond's Return was moved for, it appeared that in some regiments recruits had been accepted, without any application for that special permission, who were below the regulation measurement. When this became known at the Horse Guards, the following Memorandum was issued:—

"Horse Guards, War Office,

"April 16, 1873.

"His Royal Highness the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief directs that the accompanying Return be amended in the following way—viz., all the men shown therein as under 33 inches chest-measurement to whom no objection was raised by you or by the Officer commanding at the time being, on their being finally passed into the service, must be accounted for as of the regulated chest-measurement of 33 inches.

"C. A. EDWARDS."

It cannot be disputed that this was a grave error. The matter in question was the preparation of a Parliamentary Return, and the actual fact alone ought to have been looked to. Directions have been given which will prevent a recurrence, and for the amendment of the Return.

Afterwards—

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, with reference to the answer of the Secretary of State for War just given on this subject, he would ask, Whether, if an Officer connected with the War Office directed that false Returns should be sent in, he was merely to be told not to do so again?

MR. CARDWELL; Sir, that is a Question which the hon. and gallant Member had better put upon the Paper, if he wishes to ask it. I have already stated how this error—and it is a grave error—occurred, and that steps have been taken to prevent its recurrence.

LICENSING ACT AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will arrange to introduce his Irish Licensing Act Amendment Bill at an hour when it can be fully discussed, seeing that the honourable Member for Oxford has given Notice of an Amendment calculated to raise a Debate on the whole Licensing system?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he feared it would be impossible that his Motion could come on in time to enable the House to have a full discussion of the subject, and he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Harcourt) to re-consider his intention to raise the whole question of Licensing upon the Motion. Certain practical defects had been found in the working of the Licensing Act in Ireland which did not in any way touch the principle of the measure, and it was extremely desirable to remedy those defects; but if the Bill for this purpose was to be made the means of re-opening the whole policy of the Licensing Acts, he feared he should have no opportunity of proceeding with it.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, if the Government would give him any other opportunity of raising the question of amending the English Licensing Act, he should be very happy to give the noble Marquess every facility for proceeding with the Bill; but if they could not hold out any hope of that kind, he was afraid he must persist in raising that question on the Motion of which the noble Marquess had given Notice.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE KHAN OF KALAT.—QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that relations have been broken off with the Khan of Kalat, and that the roads in the direction of Quetta are stopped?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that no information has as yet reached us with respect to the alleged rupture with Kalat.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS—CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR. QUESTION.

MR. BOURKE asked the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, Whether it is his intention to proceed with the Motion for the nomination of the Committee on the Zanzibar Mail Contract which stands amongst the Orders of the Day?

MR. BOUVERIE, in reply, said, that the last time the question was before the House it came on in an extraordinary way, and at half-past 1 o'clock in the morning, when there was no time to discuss it properly. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) thought that the Committee to be named should be named not in the ordinary way, but by the Committee of Selection, and subsequently it was proposed that the debate be adjourned. Now, he (Mr. Bouverie) knew that if an adjournment took place, he had no command of the time of the House, and therefore he had no possible chance of bringing it on again, and he stated then that he should give up the whole question; but since then the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, seeing that the question must be settled somehow, had given him precedence that night, when he hoped the question would come on in the ordinary way.

MERCANTILE MARINE—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS — THE "ELEANOR." QUESTION.

MR. T. E. SMITH asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that the "Eleanor," one of the ships condemned as unseaworthy by the Board of Trade, has been sold to Norwegian owners, and has sailed away with British seamen on board?

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, it was true that the ship Eleanor, which had been declared by the Board of Trade to be unseaworthy, was sold to Norwegian owners, and she either had sailed or was about to sail away under the Norwegian flag. Whether she had British sailors on board or not he did not know; but if that were the fact, it would not give the Board of Trade power to stop her now that she was in her new hands. But he had communicated with the Foreign Office for the purpose of informing the Norwegian Government as to the history of the ship.

Mr. T. E. SMITH gave Notice that he would on that day week ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he had considered the advisability of introducing a clause into the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Bill to prevent the recurrence of such a transaction?

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: That clause is already in the Bill.

ARMY—INDIAN OFFICERS—SIEGE OF LUCKNOW.—QUESTION.

MAJOR TRENCH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any Royal Warrant or Horse Guards General Order depriving certain Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army who, by length of service become entitled to promotion and increased pay, of the privilege of reckoning the additional year's service towards pay and pension, granted to them by Her Majesty for service in connection with the relief of Lucknow, under Horse Guards General Order dated June 2nd, 1862, when the additional year's service, if allowed to reckon, would bring with it increased pay; if there is no such Royal Warrant or General Order, whether he will state to the House why it is that Officers have not been allowed to reap the advantages to be derived from this additional year's service; and, whether he will read to the House the Horse Guards General Order of the 2nd June, 1862 (Lucknow, 1, 1862,) granting this boon?

Mr. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to my hon. and gallant Friend's first Question, I have to say that, to the best of my knowledge and belief, there is no such Royal Warrant or Horse Guards General Order; but the question whether there is or is not is more properly one for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend's second Question, I have to say that I am not aware that any Officers have been deprived of any benefits with respect to the year's service to which he alludes, granted to them by Royal Warrant or Horse Guards General Order. In reply to his third Question, I shall have much pleasure in complying with his request to read the Horse Guards General Order of the 2nd June, 1862, of which I have obtained a Copy from the War Office; but before doing so I may remind my hon. and gallant Friend that that document could have no sort of bearing on the Officers of the Indian Army who were at Lucknow, but only on those Officers of the British Army who happened to be there, except in so far as it may have been made specially applicable to the Officers of the Indian Army by the Government of India. This is the document—

"HORSE GUARDS GENERAL ORDER, NO. 810,
JUNE 2, 1862.

"Her Majesty having been graciously pleased to grant to the Officers, Non-commissioned Officers, and Soldiers who comprised the garrison of Lucknow, in 1857, the permission to reckon an additional year's service towards pay and pension, and having been pleased to extend this boon to the force which entered that place under the late Sir Henry Havelock, in September of that year, is now further pleased to direct that the troops composing the detachment left by that Officer in the Alumbagh, on the 25th of September, together with those that subsequently entered it and remained there until the relief by Lord Clyde, on the 18th of November, 1857, shall also participate in the above-mentioned advantages. The additional year's service in all such cases is allowed to reckon towards the qualifications for 'medal and gratuity.' This grant is to be entered at once in the record of service of all those who are entitled to its advantages."

BANK ACT—THE CHEQUE BANK.

QUESTION.

Mr. BIDDULPH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to an Institution called "The Cheque Bank;" and, whether he is of opinion that this Institution, if successful, will not tend to infringe the principle of the Bank Act?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the nature of these banks seems to be this:—They receive money on deposit, and against that deposit issue cheques which cannot be filled up with a greater value than £10. These cheques are drawn payable either to the drawer or to the order of the drawer. My hon. Friend asks me whether I consider that such an institution interferes with the principles of the Bank Act. Now, Sir, the only principle clearly laid down with which I can think it would interfere is Section 11 of the 7 & 8 Vic., which says that bankers shall not issue bills, promissory notes, or Bank Notes payable on demand. These cheques, however, are not payable on demand; they are payable to the drawer or his order, and do not, therefore, come within the words of the section. They are, in fact, in the nature of Bills of Exchange which have not been accepted, and payment is coupled with the condition that there should be assets to meet them. It is not everything which economizes or dispenses with currency which contravenes the Bank Act, otherwise it might be objected that the general system of deposits economizes currency, and therefore contravenes the Act. The question really is, whether these notes are so much in the nature of Bank Notes that they do the duty of Bank Notes, and thereby infringe the Law. Now, I think this is not the case, because they are Bills of Exchange not accepted, and the nature of them is that the person holding them, if not paid, has no remedy against the person accepting them, but against the person who gave them to him. As the holder, therefore, has no remedy against the Bank, but only against the person who gives him the bill for payment, it is a matter of personal credit between these two persons, and the question of interfering with the currency does not arise.

IRELAND—THE LETTER-MULLEN COASTGUARD.—QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Before I ask the noble Lord the Question which stands in my name, I wish to say a few words in explanation of it. In January or February last some logs of timber either from a derelict vessel or, coming direct from the Atlantic, drifted on a remote island on the coast of Galway, and the timber was taken in charge by the coast guards in the usual way with the assistance of some fishermen. Shortly after the coast guards had taken possession of it, some persons from the main island came in a boat and attempted to remove the timber, whereupon the coast guard fired upon these men, who were unarmed, and killed two and wounded several others. A Coroner's inquest was held on the dead bodies in due course, and in February I asked the noble Lord the Chief Secretary what steps were being taken on the part of the Government to investigate the circumstances of the case, to which the noble Lord replied that he could give no answer to my question until the result of the Coroner's inquest was known. The result of the Coroner's inquest was that the commander of the coast guards and the chief boatman were committed for trial on a charge of manslaughter, and they are now awaiting their trial for that offence. The principal witness against these persons at the Coroner's inquest—"Agreed." This is a matter that refers to human life, and, therefore, I trust that the House will be patient. The Coroner's inquest was prolonged for a period of three months, but last month two of the principal witnesses, John Larkin and another, to whom my Question refers, were charged by the accused persons with perjury. ["Order!"] If necessary I will put myself into Order by concluding with a Motion. One of the accused persons having charged one of these principal witnesses with having committed perjury at the Coroner's inquest, and the resident magistrate who took these informations having committed the man to prison during the period of eight days, at a distance of thirty miles from where the alleged perjury had been committed. ["Order!"] As the House does not seem inclined to listen to me, I only say that the result is that the principal witnesses in a case of manslaughter have been committed on a charge of perjury, and the consequence is that the people in the neighbourhood are afraid to give evidence against the accused persons. Under these circumstances I wish to ask the noble Lord the Chief Secretary the following Question:—Whether he will explain the circumstances under which John Larkin, a principal witness against the Coast Guard in the fatal occurrence at Lettermullen, county of Galway, has been sent to prison on a charge of perjury, before the persons accused of manslaughter have been tried in the usual way; and, further, what action the Government is taking to insure a proper investigation into all the facts attending the use of firearms by the Coast Guard at Lettermullen?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that all the information the Government had received on the subject was that there was an investigation before two magistrates, and upon the deposition of two persons, supported by the evidence of five other witnesses, John Larkin was committed for trial in the regular way upon the charge of perjury, but was admitted to bail. As to the second part of the Question, the inquiry before the Coroner, which was extremely protracted, terminated in the committal to prison of an officer of the coast guard and one of the boatmen, and these men would be tried on the charge of manslaughter at the next Assizes. Pending the trial it was, of course, impossible for the Government to institute any general inquiry into the circumstances under which use was made of firearms on the occasion referred to. But even should the result of the inquiry be to show that the two men accused were not the persons who fired the shots, still, as there was no doubt that shots were fired, and that considerable loss of life resulted, the Government would think it necessary to institute a full and searching inquiry into the facts of the case.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS. CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR.

MR. BRUCE (for the Prime Minister) moved—

“That the twenty-seven Orders of the Day following next to the Order for the Committee on the Rating (Liability and Value) Bill be deferred till after the Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the nomination of the Select Committee on the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mail Contract.”

MR. DISRAELI: What is the latest hour at which it will be taken?

MR. BRUCE: It will be taken at a reasonable hour.

MR. OSBORNE: That is very unsatisfactory. After what hour will it not be taken?

MR. BRUCE: The words “reasonable hour” have never received an exact definition in this House, and, with reference to the importance of the subject, the Government will take the most convenient opportunity for allowing the Order to come on.

MR. OSBORNE: What is the most convenient opportunity?

MR. MONK said, he did not understand the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) to complain of the course he took the other night as to the nomination of the Committee; but he felt that some explanation was due to the House. It was not till he entered the House on Monday that he ascertained there was a general feeling that the Committee as proposed by his right hon. Friend consisted of too many Members, and that it should be appointed by the Committee of Selection. Entertaining those views himself, and having regard to the hour at which the Motion was brought on, the only course open to him was to move the Adjournment of the Debate. Finding when he came down to the House yesterday that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) had placed a Notice on the Paper with reference to the question, he considered that no further action was necessary on his part.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he must appeal to the Home Secretary to state distinctly at what hour he intended the Debate to come on.

MR. BRUCE said, it was extremely inconvenient to fix the hour exactly; because if by any accident the discussion on the Rating (Liability and Value) Bill were protracted five minutes beyond the hour named the Government might be charged with breach of faith in going on with the debate on the nomination of the Zanzibar Committee.

MR. OSBORNE: I confess that I am not satisfied.

MR. BOUVERIE: I may state that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government assured me he intended to give an opportunity for this question to come on at a fair hour of the evening. I understood before 12 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)

BILL.—[BILL 146.]

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen,
Mr. Hibbert.)COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 14 (Application of Act to Metropolitan, 32 and 33 Vict. c. 67.), agreed to.

Clause 15 (Definition of Occupier.)

MR. PELL moved, in page 5, line 26, to leave out all after "The," to the end of sub-section 1, and to insert—

"occupier of any land shall, for the purposes of this Act, be taken to be the person entitled to the exercise of any right of fowling, shooting, sporting, or fishing on such land, although such right be severed from the occupation or ownership of the soil."

If this Amendment were adopted excessive disputes and excessive references to the assessment committee would be avoided.

MR. LOPES said, that as the Bill stood this would be the first time that the right of shooting severed from the land was to be rated, and it would cover the case of a landlord who reserved the right of shooting, but who did not exercise that right or preserve game.

MR. STANSFELD said, there was no doubt something in the criticism which the hon. Gentleman had just offered; but, practically speaking, the valuation which an assessment committee would put upon the right of sporting over an estate which was not exercised, and where there was no preserving, would be very nearly nominal. But if there was a right which was capable of being exercised, and was becoming of value some value must be attached to it, though it would probably be the minimum. The Amendment before the Committee had not met with much discussion, and he should content himself with referring to a subsequent Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. Read), which appeared to raise a question well worth the attentive consideration of the Committee—namely, what person should be rated with reference to the enjoyment of the right of sporting. As far as he was concerned, he had gone on this line of argument—that the occupation of the land and the enjoyment of the right of sporting were not, as a matter of fact, commonly in the same hands. Those who enjoyed the right of sporting were not necessarily the occupiers of the land. If the owner occupied the land, he probably reserved the right of sporting; but there was no difficulty in that case, because the ownership, the occupation, and the right of sporting were all in the same hands. But suppose the owner of an estate had divided it into 20 different farms, occupied by 20 different tenants, but retained the right of sporting over it, or let the right to another person, his proposal was that in either case the owner should be rated. This proposal was founded on a principle of convenience, because the right of sporting might be let to one person or to a great number of persons. The hon. Member (Mr. Pell) proposed to rate the occupying tenant for the right of sport as if he enjoyed it on his own farm; but he thought the Committee would require more argument than they had yet heard to induce them to adopt that proposal, for it would place on one class of the community a liability they ought not to bear. His proposal, on the other hand, was that liability to pay rates in respect of the right of sport should fall on those who possessed and enjoyed that right, and it was only when it was let that the proprietor would, as a matter of convenience, be rated.

MR. CLARE READ observed that the moment they got away from the simplicity of rating hereditaments and proposed to rate the right of "sport" and all sorts of rights they would get into confusion. Game was a product, and they did not rate products. Even in the case of underwood, they rated, not the underwood, but the land on which it was grown. His proposal was to apply that rule everywhere. Game of all products was the most likely to vary, not only with the seasons, but with the caprices of the owner; but whether the land grew corn, sheep, or hares, he would have but one simple assessment. The difficulties of assessing "rights" would be innumerable. It would be almost impossible for the overseer to collect the rate. He might not know where the game tenant lived, and he could not distrain his hares and rabbits. He hoped the Committee would adopt his simple proposal.

MR. CORRANCE said, the right hon. Gentleman had created a monster. The "owner" was actually made "occupier" in order to carry out this proposal.

MR. DODSON, said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would adopt the excellent suggestion of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. Read), which seemed to be the only one that would meet the difficulty. By the law of England game belonged to the occupier, and the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk would allow the assessment to proceed in every case on the supposition that the law was to be carried out in practice. The assessment committee would have only one person to deal with, and the value of the game would have to be settled as between the landlord and the tenant. In cases where there was very little game on the land, and where the owner reserved the right of sporting—and this was the case in many counties of England—it was absurd to put a rateable value on the reserved right and levy a separate rate.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he was glad these Amendments had been suggested on behalf of the tenant farmers by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. Read) and the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). Everyone must know it was in the interest of the whole community that one person should be responsible for the payment of rates. This was the most simple and straightforward way of doing the business, and therefore he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk.

MR. MUNTZ agreed that the only practical way was to rate the occupier. If the owner were rated would they distrain upon the tenant because the owner had not paid? Again, if the shooting were let to a third person, how could they enforce the rate against him? Would they distrain upon another man's land for his default? Further, there were millions of acres in England which were not preserved, and on them any rate upon the shooting could only be nominal in amount.

MR. PELL said, it appeared to him that it would be utterly impossible for any assessment committee to apply the usual rule to hereditaments of so new and extraordinary a nature as those comprised under the name of game. It would be very difficult to arrive at a rateable value.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought it was a great mistake to cut up the land into these small allotments. Supposing a tenant had a farm of 20 acres and was rated for game, of course he could only be rated for those 20 acres, which would not be of much use to any person for sporting purposes. It seemed to him there was as much difficulty in rating the occupier as in rating the person who had the right of sporting.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Committee had already passed a clause enacting that these incorporeal hereditaments should be rated when severed from the occupation of the soil. It was therefore of no use to go back to the earlier part of the Bill, and say it was inconvenient that one matter was to be subjected to two rates. The question arose as to who was to be rated—whether the person who was, in the ordinary sense, the owner of the land, or the person who was the tenant? He admitted that there might, in particular cases, be some difficulty in getting at either the owner or the occupier for the purposes of rating; but that was not a difficulty of the law, but of the application of the law. What the Committee had endeavoured to do was to settle what should be done by the local authorities in all cases of rating. The proposition of the Government had, at least, this convenience—that it did not enact an absolute rule, but said that the occupier or the owner might, according to the view of the assessment committee, be rated, leaving it to the assessment committee to settle each case according to its merits, and to rate the occupier or the owner, as appeared most convenient. It would have been impossible for the Government to have laid down a strict rule, which might, in many cases, be at variance with the facts.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that according to the wording of the clause to which the Attorney General alluded, the man who had the right of sporting was the person to be rated, and not the occupier. It seemed to him that that was an imperative clause, and not an optional one; and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman now said the assessment committees were to choose between the tenant of the land and the person who had the right of shooting over it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the proposition of the Government, as amended, was that the right might be either in the hands of the owner or of somebody who let it, and that the assessment committees would deal with each case as convenience dictated.

VISCOUNT GALWAY objected to the rating of game altogether, and he did not think that the matter was one that should be left in the hands of the assessment committee, who, in order to assess the rate fairly, would have to enter into laborious calculations as to the precise value of the game on every person's land. It would be better to require the occupier rather than the landlord to pay the rate.

MR. PEASE said, the whole of the counties in England were not like the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, which abounded in game, and therefore could not bear to be rated in the same way as those two counties. In many districts in the North of England the game was worth little or nothing, and yet for that they had all degrees of preservation. If they began to rate for game in those districts, they would put it upon the assessment committee to find out that which it was almost impossible to discover.

MR. CLARE READ explained that it was on behalf of those counties where little game existed that he was anxious to carry his Amendment.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM objected to the rating of game as involving a double rate upon the land. It was quite a new principle to rate game if the owner let the shooting, but not to rate it if he kept the shooting for himself.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE wished to know, in the case of a gentleman giving away the fishing on a river on his estate, who would be required to pay the rate in respect of it?

MR. LOPES felt that there would be this difficulty in adopting the proposed Amendments—that the land would be rateable for no more than it was now, whilst the Bill declared that rating should be extended. Rating at present applied to the whole value of the land. Subject to this difficulty he agreed in the proposed Amendments.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH pointed out that moors in such counties as Derby and York, in the neighbourhood of large towns, let at a higher figure for shooting than for pasture, and said the difficulty he felt was that under the Amendment the tenant would not be rated more highly for the moor when it was let for shooting than if it were let for pasture. On the whole, he thought it would be better to take the words of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) and leave the responsibility with the Government. It could hardly be expected that in the first year of rating these incorporeal hereditaments everything would go quite straight.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he was not disposed to leave the responsibility with the Government. He objected to sending the Bill to the country to be worked by assessment committees, while the House of Commons was itself unable to say absolutely what was the meaning of the clause. In his opinion, the rateability ought to be one and undivided, as was suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk.

MR. CLARE READ said, that in the event of the land being let for shooting as well as for pasture, he would let the assessment committee assess at the joint value; for instance, supposing it were let for 1s. 6d. an acre for pasturage and 1s. an acre for shooting, he would have it assessed at half-a-crown.

MR. HENLEY said, the advice of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson) was very sound. He (Mr. Henley) put the case of a man refusing to pay the game assessment and inquired how the rate collector was to distrain. Was he to chase the hares as if they were so many Welsh sheep and impound them? This might, he considered, be a convenient way of making faggot votes, for all that an extensive landed proprietor had to do was to apportion out his shooting and sporting rights in sections of £15 each, when each of these tenants would as a matter of course come upon the Parliamentary register. He was afraid that if they passed the clause as it stood inconveniences would arise out of it which they by no means expected. He would suppose a man rated at 3d. in the pound for £5 valuation to be paid quarterly. How could they expect a rate-collector to waste his time in making those collections? The proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) was a simple one, and he thought our forefathers were very wise in saying that the man who occupied the land must pay the burden upon it.

MR. HINDE PALMER suggested that for the purpose of any poor rate the occupier of land should be the person rated in respect of any right of shooting, fishing, &c., but that such rating should not prejudice or interfere with any arrangement made between the landlord and tenant when such right was enjoyed separately from the occupation.

MR. DODSON said, he did not see any inconsistency in adopting the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. Read), which he thought was the simplest way of meeting the difficulty. As to the moors of which the value for shooting was greater than for pasture, that was an exceptional case. The clause must be framed to meet ordinary cases, and the proposal of the hon. Member for South Norfolk seemed the best calculated to secure that purpose.

MR. HUNT submitted that in the case of a common where the lord of the manor enjoyed both the right of sporting and the right of the soil he should be held to be the occupier under this Bill.

MR. STANSFELD said, that in deference to the general feeling which appeared to prevail in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. Read), he was prepared to accept that Amendment. He would also accept the Proviso of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), if it were slightly amended, by leaving out the words "for the purposes of this Act," and, at the end, the words "or ownership."

MR. BRAND suggested another difficulty. In the event of one man being the lord of the manor and another the owner of the soil, which of them would be rated for the game?

MR. STANSFELD said, he would consider whether some words might not be introduced with the view of meeting cases of that kind.

Amendment (Mr. Pell) amended and agreed to.

MR. CLARE READ moved to add at the end of the clause the following—

"Provided, That the gross value of any land let or occupied by the owner for agricultural purposes shall be the full rent at which the land, irrespective of any reservation of game and timber, might reasonably be expected to let one year with another, free of all tenants' rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rent charge if any. Provided always, That when any tenant shall pay any increase of rate by any such assessment of game or timber on any land which he may occupy under any lease or agreement at the time of the passing of this Act, he shall be entitled during the currency or continuance of such lease or agreement to deduct from any rent he may pay for such land the amount of the increase of such rate from such rent, and the amount of such increase shall be fixed and determined by the assessment committee of the union in which the land is situate."

MR. STANSFELD suggested that the second Proviso should be withdrawn, as his hon. Friend (Mr. C. Read) would see at a moment's reflection that the amount of increase in the rates could not be settled beforehand.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the Amendment as it now stood would throw on the assessment committee the duty of arbitrating between landlord and tenant, which was something very different from what they were bound to undertake.

MR. CLARE READ said, suppose a man was now assessed at 30s. an acre, and the assessment committee raised the assessment for the future to 31s., what he wished was that the committee should have the power to say that the additional shilling was put on for the purpose of assessing the game.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 16 (Definitions, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67.) agreed to.

Clause 17 (Commencement of Act).

MR. LIDDELL observed that the clause referred to the "Valuation Act, 1873," and would require to be altered in the event, which he considered very probable, of the Valuation Bill not passing during the present Session.

MR. STANSFELD said, he did not at all despair of the Bill in question becoming law this Session. If, however, he saw reason hereafter for being less sanguine than he was on the subject, he would propose an alteration of the clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18 (Saving as to mine where dues payable in kind).

MR. PEASE moved to add at the end of the clause the words—

"and no mine shall be rated under this Act until a portion of the produce thereof shall have been conveyed away from it for the purposes of sale or manufacture."

The object of this Amendment was to protect those parties who were searching for minerals, and who might produce small quantities and lay them on the surface, and then have to abandon the work because of its not being likely to be remunerative.

MR. STANSFELD objected to the Amendment, observing that one might just as well propose that no farm should be rated until the tenant had reaped his first crop.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 19 (Saving clause) agreed to.

MR. STANSFELD moved, after Clause 7, to insert new Clause.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. STANSFELD moved, after Clause 11, to insert the following Clauses:—

"(Application of Act to Scotland.)

"This part of this Act shall apply to Scotland, subject to the following provisions:—

"1. The expression 'hereditaments,' shall have the meaning assigned to the expression 'lands and heritages,' in the Act of the seven-teenth and eighteenth years of Her present Majesty, chapter ninety-one, intituled 'An Act for the Valuation of Lands and Heritages in Scotland,' and hereinafter called 'The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act:'

"The expression 'local rate,' shall mean any county, municipal, parochial, or other local rate or assessment:

"The expression 'valuation list,' shall mean the valuation roll in force for the time made up under 'The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act,' and any Acts amending the same:

"The expression 'Assessment Committee,' shall, with regard to any assessment, mean the authority empowered by law to impose such assessment:

"The expression 'umpire' shall include overman.

"2. In Scotland the provisions of this part of this Act with respect to arbitration shall be read and construed as if sections twenty-four, twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty, thirty-one, thirty-three, and thirty-four of 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,' were substituted for the corresponding sections of 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.'

"3. Nothing in this part of this Act shall be construed to prevent the Treasury from recovering from the owner of any lands and heritages in Scotland, or retaining out of the rent, in like manner as any other tenant or occupant, any share of any local rate chargeable on such owner.

Mr. Pease

"(Application of Act to Ireland.)

"This part of this Act shall apply to Ireland, subject to the provisions following:—

"1. The expression 'Assessment Committee,' shall mean, in relation to each poor law union, the board of guardians of the poor of such union;

"2. The expression 'valuation list' shall in relation to each Poor Law Union mean the list or lists of the valuation of rateable hereditaments and tenements, and of any revision of the same transmitted to the clerk of the board of guardians of such union under the Acts relating to the valuation of rateable property in Ireland:

"3. The expression 'local rate' shall mean and include grand jury cess, city, town, or borough rate, and any local rate or tax leviable under any public general Act or under any local and personal Act:

"4. The costs of and incident to an arbitration and award shall, if either party so requires, be taxed and settled by the principal taxing officer in common law business in Ireland, and not in the manner prescribed by section one of 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1850.'

"5. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the Treasury from deducting from any rent payable in respect of any hereditament in like manner as any other occupier paying rent, any share of any poor or other local rate;

"6. In any scheme or valuation list the rateable value only of Government hereditaments shall be stated."

MR. BRUEN moved, as an Amendment to Mr. Stansfeld's proposed new Clause, "Application of Act to Ireland," line 1, before "This part of," to insert "Clause 6," and before sub-section 1, to insert—

"1. The expression 'Poor Rate Act' shall mean and include the 'Act for the more effectual relief of the destitute Poor in Ireland, 1838,' and the Acts amending the same."

MR. HIBBERT assured the hon. Gentleman that Government property in Ireland could not be exempted from taxation, when the present Bill abolished such exemptions in England. Separate Bills would be introduced for Scotland and Ireland, and every exertion made to pass them during the Session. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

MR. VANCE wished to know whether the Bill repealing the exemptions in Ireland would be introduced and carried during the present Session?

MR. STANSFELD said, he was afraid it would not be possible to carry a Bill through this Session; but Bills were being prepared which would give Ireland and Scotland the benefit of the same exemptions as England.

MR. BRUEN said, that after the assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman he should withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause added to the Bill.

Mr. STANSFELD moved, before Clause 12, to insert—

“Part III.

“(Liability of property to local rates as well as poor rates.)

“After the commencement of this Act, the hereditaments to which the Poor Rate Acts are extended by this Act, and which are thus made rateable to the relief of the poor shall be rateable to all county rate, borough rate, highway rate, and other local rates which are leviable upon property rateable to the relief of the poor, in like manner as if the Poor Rate Acts had always extended to such hereditaments.”

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Mr. STANSFELD moved, after Clause 12, to insert the following clause:—

“(Gross and rateable value of tin and copper mines.)

“Where a tin or copper mine is occupied under a lease or leases granted without fine on a reservation wholly or partly of money dues, or rent, the gross annual value of the mine shall be taken to be the annual amount of the whole of the dues payable in respect thereof during the year ending on the sixth day of April preceding the date at which the valuation list is made, in addition to the annual amount of any fixed rent reserved for the same which may not be paid or satisfied by such dues.

“The rateable annual value of such mine shall be the same as the gross annual value thereof, except that where the dues or rent are liable for repairs, insurance, or other expenses necessary to maintain the mine in a state to command such annual amount of dues or rent, the probable average annual cost of such repairs, insurance, and other expenses shall be deducted from the gross value, for the purpose of calculating the rateable value.

“1. Where any such mine is occupied under a lease granted wholly or partly on a fine; and

“2. Where any such mine is occupied by the owner;

“and in all cases to which the foregoing provisions of this section do not apply, the gross and rateable annual value of the mine shall be taken to be the annual amount of the dues or dues and rent at which the mine might be reasonably expected to let without fine on a lease of the ordinary duration, according to the usage of the country, if the tenant undertook to pay all tenant's rates and taxes, and tithe rent-charge, and also the repairs, insurance, and other expenses necessary to maintain the mine in a state to command such annual amount of dues or dues and rent.

“The purser, secretary, and chief managing agent for the time being of any tin or copper mine, or any of them, may, if the overseers or other rating authority think fit, be rated as the occupier thereof.

“In this section—

“The term ‘mine’ includes the underground workings and the engines, machinery, workshops, tramways, and other plant, buildings (not being dwelling houses), and works and surface of land occupied in connection with and for the purposes of the undertaking, and comprised in the lease or leases under which the dues or dues and rent are payable or reserved;

“The term ‘dues’ means dues, royalty, or toll, whether in money or partly in money and partly in kind, and the amount of dues which are reserved in kind means the value of such dues;

“The term ‘lease’ means lease or sett, or licence to work, or agreement for a lease or sett, or licence to work;

“The term ‘fine’ means fine, premium, or foregift, or other payment or consideration in the nature thereof.”

Mr. LIDDELL moved to add the words “or lead” after the word “copper.”

Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN suggested that the words “or zinc” should also be added.

Mr. STANSFELD said, that he had accepted the proposal of the hon. Member for Cornwall with regard to tin and copper mines, because that hon. Member had in his opinion made out a good case for rating those mines in the manner proposed by the clause he was asking the Committee to assent to. But as to the extension of this Bill to lead mines he was satisfied there was a difference of opinion both in the House and in the country, and therefore he could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northumberland.

Amendment negatived.

Sir RICHARD BAGGALLAY moved the insertion of the following clause after Clause 17:—

“Nothing in this Act or in the said recited Act of the forty-third year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth shall be deemed to render any person or persons or body corporate liable to be assessed or rated, either as owner or occupier, to any county, borough, parochial, or other local rates or cesses, in respect of any land, houses, or buildings, or parts of houses or buildings, in the United Kingdom, which shall be used exclusively as a hospital or infirmary for the relief of the sick poor, or for the transaction of the business relating to such hospital or infirmary, and shall yield no pecuniary profit to the governors, trustees, or other administrators of the charity aforesaid.”

The hon. and learned Gentleman said, that charitable institutions had been virtually exempted from rating from the passing of the Act of Elizabeth until a recent decision in the House of Lords. In former discussions much stress had been laid on the fact that Chief Justice Holt had in the reign of Queen Anne decided adversely to charities; but this case was of no authority. The report of it occupied four lines only of print, and from the report itself it was evident that some artifice had been resorted to to escape from rating. But however this might be, it was clear that the Legislature, by whom the Act of Elizabeth was passed, contemplated the exemption of charities, for by one of the sections of that Act, a portion of the rates raised under it, were to be appropriated towards the support of hospitals for the relief of the poor. This view was adopted by Lord Mansfield in the cases of St. Luke's and St. Bartholomew's Hospitals, in the middle of the last century, and was thenceforth continuously acted upon. The principles, however, upon which Lord Mansfield's decisions were founded were carried beyond their legitimate consequences, and, in process of time, claims for exemption were made and allowed in the cases of land devoted to public purposes generally. This view was rejected by Lord Westbury in the case of the Mersey Docks Company, on grounds which were subsequently held by the Court of Queen's Bench to be equally applicable to charities. If this modern construction of the statute of Elizabeth was to be accepted as a true exposition of the law as at present existing, it was time that some sufficient steps should be taken to secure a recognition of the older construction, which had prevailed for upwards of 200 years, for public policy, and to a great extent public opinion was in favour of the exemption. The poor were the parties chiefly concerned, it was the poor who would suffer if the claim was rejected. He might refer by way of illustration to the case of St. Thomas's Hospital. It appeared from a Petition which he had presented from that hospital, that if the clause were not adopted they would have to contribute a sum of £3,000 a-year in the shape of taxation. The practical result would be the closing of no fewer than 140 beds out of 600. Now, of the 4,000 in-patients in the year, more than one-third came from the parish of Lambeth, and so also did more than one-half of the total number of out-patients. The parish, therefore, would have had to pay, but for the existence of the hospital, more for the relief of its sick poor than it would gain by the rating in question. If the principle of the Bill had been to impose liability to rating on property of all kinds he would have felt difficulty in pressing his Amendment; but the principle of exemption had been accepted by the Committee in the case of ragged and Sunday schools, and he hoped it would be extended to the case of hospitals and infirmaries.

New Clause (Saving in favour of hospitals for the sick poor,)—(Sir Richard Baggallay),—brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL opposed the clause. He regretted to hear the account his hon. and learned Friend had given of St. Thomas's Hospital, and hoped that he (Sir Richard Baggallay) was right in saying that the proportion of patients he had referred to belonged to the poor of Lambeth, and not to a class who could afford to pay for medical aid. He could not think the Committee would be induced to change the resolution which they had arrived at on the question as to literary and scientific institutions by now introducing a number of exemptions which had not hitherto existed. It must be remembered that in that case an exemption was expunged; whereas now the proposition was to insert an exemption which did not obtain even under the present law. The principle of the Bill was to abolish exemptions, which meant that no person had a right to compel his neighbour in a given parish to subscribe to any charity he thought fit against the will of his neighbours in such parish. If instead of a large parish like Lambeth they took the case of a small parish in which a great hospital was built, extending over one-third or one-fourth of its entire space, on which rateable property would otherwise be erected, would they allow the governors, who at their own will selected the site, to compel the remainder of the occupiers of property in the parish to pay out of their own pockets an enormous contribution towards the maintenance of the hospital?

Sir Richard Baggallay

That was virtually what they were asked to do. Suppose a railway came in and took possession of the site of a hospital, and the hospital was transferred to a new parish, was that parish to be taxed for its support? As regarded the exemption of the ragged schools, the Government objected to that exemption on principle, but had deferred to the majority by which the House expressed its opinion on a former occasion in favour of maintaining that particular exemption. That exemption, however, was of a totally different kind from the one before them, being entirely at the option of the parish. These hospitals for the sick were charities now maintained by voluntary contributions; but if the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend was accepted they would be maintained by involuntary contributions, and the parish of Lambeth, for example, would be taxed for St. Thomas's Hospital to the amount of £3,000 a-year. But we could not possibly tax people for the maintenance of an institution over the government and expenditure of which they had no control whatever. He hoped the Committee would not be led away by feelings of benevolence, which were so easily indulged at the expense of other people, to accept the clause.

Mr. LIDDELL said, he thought the able legal argument of the Solicitor General cut both ways, and cut very strongly against himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman had taken the case of a small parish in which a body of benevolent persons might erect a hospital, and said that if you exempted the establishment it would be at the expense of the inhabitants; but supposing those benevolent persons took off the streets of that parish a large number of sick poor who were previously chargeable upon its rates, surely in that case the existence of the hospital would relieve the ratepayers. He should certainly support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid Surrey (Sir Richard Baggallay.)

Mr. RYLANDS asked if they were to indulge in feelings of benevolence in the case of hospitals where were they to stop? There were many of these institutions supported by a few benevolent persons while the bulk of the people rendered no assistance. But if the Committee decided that the public should pay, they must give them control over the management.

Mr. CAWLEY contended that the argument of the Solicitor General was founded upon an entire fallacy. Hospitals were not property in the same sense as those establishments which yielded a benefit to an individual occupier. It was therefore begging the question to say that if they did not rate them they would be imposing a tax upon the rest of the community. This was not a Bill to extend the area of rating, but to alter the law in respect to it. Where an order to clear the site for the building of a hospital, property which had been contributing to the local Exchequer was removed, the hospital which took its place ought to contribute to the rates; but otherwise those institutions ought to be exempted from local taxation. For these reasons he would support the clause.

Mr. LEEMAN agreed with the Solicitor General. In York there was a large hospital which received patients from all parts of the country. It was situated in one small parish, and property having been cleared for its erection which formerly contributed to the rates he did not see on what ground of justice it could be exempted from rates. There was a second large hospital in another small parish of the same city, as to which the circumstances were precisely the same. In fairness to the ratepayers they ought both to be rated. In the case of the ragged schools there was simply power given to the parish to exempt from rating, whilst in the instance now under consideration an absolute exemption was asked for.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, that the cases mentioned by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) were altogether exceptional. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) thought hospitals deserved all the support which could be given to them. They were essential to the benefit of the country, and he should vote for the clause of his hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. CANDLISH said, the question was whether hospitals were entitled to a forced support levied upon the poor by means of removing the rates of the establishment to other persons' shoulders. He did not think that an exemption coupled with such consequences should find support in the Committee; and he hoped that the Government would resist the Amendment. The exemption in favour of Sunday and ragged schools was one for which the people and not the House were responsible.

Mr. BIRLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) would rate the Pyramids of Egypt if they were in this country; or, perhaps, if it were brought under his notice, he would rate the Duke of York's column. He (Mr. Birley) saw no beneficial occupation in a hospital which could bring it within the area of taxation according to the statute of Elizabeth. If a hospital was unable to pay the rates, was a collector to distress upon the beds of the patients or the bottles of the dispensary? All the great jurists had held that hospitals were exempt, and until the decision of the House of Lords in the Mersey Docks case, hospitals had been established upon that understanding. Hospitals should not be rated until it was shown that such establishments contributed to produce burdens upon the poor rates.

Mr. GILPIN supported the clause, and said that though a hospital did not directly tend to increase the poor rate it certainly maintained within its walls many persons who would otherwise have been chargeable upon their own parishes. It was hard that the parish in which a hospital stood should be burdened for the benefit of other parishes.

Mr. SCOURFIELD observed that this was simply a proposition to continue an old exemption, not to create a new one, and he should vote for the exemption.

Mr. STANSFELD said, the argument that hospitals should be exempt because they were useful public institutions was open to considerable objection, because there was a great variety of hospitals, and some were well and some badly managed. But admitting the general proposition, if they took land for a hospital which otherwise would pay rates and exempted it, they clearly made a deduction from the rateable value of a parish and enforced a contribution to the hospital of that amount. It was also impossible to prove that a hospital for the sick poor in any degree relieved a parish from a portion of the rates or of the cost of maintaining its poor. The tendency might even be in the other direction. A hospital or other charitable institution planted in a given locality attracted to that locality poor persons who, sooner or later, expected to benefit from it. Did anyone suppose that the establishment of St. Thomas's Hospital on the other side of the river did not attract a poor population to the neighbourhood? Permissive exemption had existed ever since the Act of 14 & 15 Vict. It was then enacted that—

"The guardians of any union or parish map, with the consent of the Poor Law Board, pay out of any fund of such union, or in the case of the parish out of the fund in the hands of such guardians, any sum of money as an annual subscription towards the support and maintenance of any public hospital or infirmary for the reception of sick or disabled persons or persons suffering from any permanent or natural infirmity."

Mr. MUNTZ said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman must have very much amused the Committee, because he gravely stated that wherever hospitals were built paupers would come to live near them. The right hon. Gentleman might as well have argued that wherever you constructed a cemetery people would come to live near it for the purpose of dying. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the existence of a permissive provision enabling the local authorities to contribute towards the exemption of hospitals from rating; but it was a matter entirely at the discretion of the Poor Law Board, which always refused its assent when applications of that kind came before it. [Mr. STANSFELD said, the hon. Member was mistaken.] He (Mr. Muntz) contended that it was absurd to exempt places of religious worship from the rate, and fix it on hospitals. What was religious worship to one was gross idolatry or heresy to another, and the most pestilential doctrines of Mormonism or any other "ism" might be preached, and the preachers charged what they liked at the doors, and yet they were to be exempted; while the hospitals, which were founded entirely on Christian principles, were to be taxed. He maintained that the popular feeling was decidedly in favour of the exemption of hospitals from rating, and would on that assertion challenge any Member in public meeting in any town in England. The Act of Elizabeth never intended to charge poor rates upon charitable institutions; and feeling, as he did, very strongly upon it, he should support the exemption clause.

Mr. MACFIE supported the Amendment, believing that the rating of hospitals would have the effect of restraining the contributions of the rich towards their support.

MR. CAWLEY asked in whom the beneficial occupation of a hospital rested?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would put the case of the Chester County Hospital. There were 64 parishes in the Union. Why should that hospital in Chester be supported at the expense of those 64 parishes? Upon what principle of justice were all the parishes within that union to be made to contribute compulsorily for the relief and support of that institution which was for the benefit of the whole county of Chester, and not only so, but likewise for the county of Flint? There were many other arguments against the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman to prevent the Committee from adopting it. In the first place, he contended that the present state of the law was satisfactory and sound, and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) completely broke down when he came to this vital point. The president of the Local Government Board showed that the existing law empowered the representatives of the local committees, who were able to judge of all the circumstances of the case, to subscribe at the public expense to the local hospitals. But then it was subject to the consent of the Local Government Board, and the hon. Member for Birmingham said that the Poor Law Board refused its consent. The President of the Local Government Board, who was at the head of that Department, denied this, and said that applications made to the Poor Law Board of the present Government had been acceded to. [Mr. Muntz said he had referred to a previous time.] It was in that state of the case that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Richard Baggallay) proposed a clause insisting that by this enactment they should make every local community subject to a compulsory tax for the maintenance of these hospitals. Was that desirable, or was it not? The hon. and learned Gentleman moved mainly in the interest of the rich and endowed hospitals which possessed £20,000, £30,000, £40,000, and in at least one instance he believed more than £50,000 a-year. Not content with such incomes, he contended that they should by Parliament be allowed to tax the community.

He did not think those hospitals were managed with the economy they ought to be. He would not name the hospitals, but he would give the hon. and learned Gentleman the names if he wished. A short time ago there were two hospitals in London which relieved with equal efficiency as nearly as possible the same number of cases annually; but with this difference, the one relieved them out of an income of £15,000, and the other out of an income of £30,000 a-year. That was the income of the endowed hospital, and it was to that income the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to add £3,000 a-year by compulsory taxation on the community. Was that rational? When they had a law by which the local authority could tax the community for these purposes, with the sanction of the Local Government Board, was Parliament to interfere and over-ride that authority and tax local communities for the support of those great wealthy endowed bodies, which undoubtedly did a great deal of good, but he would say fearlessly at a much greater cost than need be. He did not even admit that voluntary hospitals stood on different grounds, or that they should be supported by taxation imposed by the will of Parliament. Taxation by exemption was essentially vicious. When people were taxed it was desirable they should know it, but exemptions hid from the people the fact that they were taxed. Where there was public taxation there ought to be public control. He was the oldest Governor of Guy's Hospital, and he wanted to know why the community in the neighbourhood should be taxed for its support, having nothing to say in its management, and no control over it? But that was the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman. If an amendment of the law were required, should it not be in the direction of striking out the veto of the Poor Law Commissioners? His hon. Friend (Mr. Muntz) desired no doubt to be consistent with the principles he had laid down; but, if so, that was an Amendment to which he would not object. With respect to the main question, he hoped the Committee, considering the power contained in the existing Act, would not accept a measure so retrogressive as that now proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. His hon. Friend said he was ready to meet his opponents at the hustings. If he were, let him vote in favour of the voluntary principle to this extent—namely, to place in the hands of the Guardians the power to decide whether the different localities should be taxed in the manner now proposed.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY said, he was prepared at any convenient time and place to accept the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman and discuss the circumstances of the two hospitals which he had referred to; and in reference to the one which expended £30,000 a-year, the Committee must bear in mind that the large endowed hospitals not merely received the sick poor, but were also engaged in preparing, by their medical schools, a large number of well educated professional men to go forth into the world. With regard to Chester Hospital, and other hospitals in large towns, the parishes which were taxed would derive a larger amount of benefit by the relief of their sick poor than they would by the taxation. The clause which he proposed did not provide for absolute exemption; it only provided that nothing in this Act, or in the Act of Elizabeth, should make hospitals and infirmaries liable to rating, the Act of Elizabeth being included in order to remove the doubts raised as to the extent of that Act by the judgments of the House of Lords in the cases of the Mersey Dock Company, and Gray v. the University of Edinburgh. The only part of these institutions which his clause would relieve from liability to rating under these Acts was that which was entirely devoted to the purposes of the sick poor. The principle of exemption had been recognized in the case of ragged and Sunday schools; he asked the Committee to extend that principle to the charitable and deserving institutions the subject of the clause.

MR. MUNTZ said, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had asked him to be consistent. He was consistent, and hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be the same. The right hon. Gentleman said, in effect, that he was prepared to leave the question of rating hospitals in the hands of the Guardians and other local authorities. So also was he, and he believed the hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed the clause (Sir Richard Baggallay) would be so too.

Mr. Gladstone

If an undertaking were given that on the Report the powers conferred on the Poor Law Board would be struck out of the Bill, he was sure the clause would be withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE observed that the control of the Poor Law Commissioners was salutary as a check, and would not be exercised to nullify the operation of the law. If the hon. Gentleman could show that the board had exercised the veto improperly he should be inclined to agree with him.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that these institutions were of infinitely more benefit to the localities in which they were immediately situated than they were to the outlying districts. In addition to this, the immediate locality had the advantage of supplying all the stores wanted by the hospital.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he lived close to Chester Hospital, but in a parish which was not in Cheshire. His district derived the greatest benefit from the county hospital, but would not have to pay one farthing towards its maintenance in return for the advantage it received.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 70: Majority 20.

On Question, "That the Preamble be agreed to,"

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, that as the right hon. Gentleman on the second reading of the Bill had stated there were certain Government properties which he did not propose to make subject to rates, and especially alluded to the Royal Parks, he wished to point out that those Parks would distinctly come within the purview of the Bill if it remained in its present shape. He therefore desired to ask whether before the right hon. Gentleman took any further steps, he proposed to bring in a scheme for the exemption from rating of any portions of Government property. He was also anxious to draw attention to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he did not propose to interfere in any way with the statutory bargains made with respect to property taken over for Government purposes in regard to rates. With respect to the land purchased for the New Courts of Justice, if it were to continue to be rated as heretofore the amount would be about £4,000 a-year. They all knew that a large sum was about to be expended upon building a Palace of Justice on that site—probably £1,000,000—but according to the right hon. Gentleman's plan, the parish in which the land was located would only receive the commuted sum of £4,000 a-year. That he thought was quite right; but take the case of the Houses of Parliament. These buildings cost £3,000,000, and the parish in which they stood would be entitled to require that an assessment should be placed upon them somewhat in accordance with their value and cost. The same remark would apply to Chelsea Hospital, the Horse Guards, the Treasury, and other buildings of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman had by this Bill opened the door to attacks upon the public purse which might well be avoided, and he wished to know what he intended to do in this matter.

MR. STANSFELD said, he thought they would be in a better position to discuss the questions raised by the hon. Gentleman when the Bill, as amended in Committee, was reprinted for the purposes of Report. He, however, did not intend to touch any of the statutable bargains which had been made in reference to particular properties, for if he had done so he could hardly have hoped to pass the Bill this Session.

MR. LIDDELL protested against the assumption that this House should be assessed upon the cost of its construction. If a man spent £500,000 in building a mansion and impoverished his descendants to future generations, the mansion ought not to be assessed on that account on the cost of construction.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 205.]

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS—
CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR.

NOMINATION OF COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE RESUMED.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Nomination of the Committee [23rd June],

"That Mr. Dodson be one of the Members of the Select Committee on the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mail Contract."—(Mr. Bouverie.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. HUNT moved, as an Amendment—

"That the Committee do consist of Seven Members, Five to be nominated by the Committee of Selection and Two to be added by the House."

He wished it to be clearly understood that in making this proposal he was actuated, not by any invidious feeling towards those hon. Members whose names had been proposed by the right hon. Member for Kilniarnock (Mr. Bouverie), but by a desire to act strictly in conformity with precedent. In his opinion, the Committee ought to be chosen by the especial machinery provided for this purpose in the form of the Committee of Selection. In former times, Committees of this nature were chosen by the Committee of Elections; but since the House had surrendered its jurisdiction over Election Petitions, the Committee of Selection had generally nominated five, and the House itself two of the Members of the Select Committees. In the case of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances relating to the Inman and Cunard contracts which he, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, had entered into in 1868, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), it was ordered that five Members of the Committee should be nominated by the Committee of Selection and two by the House. That Committee was so nominated with the consent of the present Government, and he submitted that the present was on all fours with that case, and that, therefore, the precedent then set should be now followed.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Committee do consist of Seven Members, Five to be nominated by the Committee of Selection and Two to be added by the House,"—(Mr. Hunt.)

—instead thereof.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that this was a matter which, except as a question of precedent as to the mode of appointing Select Committees, was really not of much importance. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) had suggested itself to him before he had brought forward his Motion for the appointment of the Committee, and he should have been glad had it recommended itself to his judgment, because had it been adopted he should have been relieved from the very invidious and ungrateful task of himself selecting the names of those who should serve on the Committee. He had, however, discovered that there were great objections to its adoption. In the first place, the Committee of Selection strongly objected to having this duty cast upon them. The right hon. Gentleman was accurate in his statement of facts connected with the precedent that he had referred to; but the decision of the House in that case had not been arrived at deliberately, after mature consideration by the House, but hastily, on the spur of the moment, in consequence of hon. Members opposite having declined to serve on the Committee. Moreover, on one or two previous occasions a similar proposal had been rejected by the House on the ground that the Committee of Selection had been appointed for a totally different purpose—that of nominating Members of Select Committees on Private Bills. In this instance the right hon. Gentleman said that he had no objection whatever to the hon. Members whose names he had submitted to the House, and who were gentlemen of unexceptionable character, bearing considerable weight in that House. The first name on the list, that of Mr. Dodson, was one universally respected in that House, and that Gentleman happened to be a Member of the Committee of Selection, who could not, therefore, have selected him to perform the duty he was so well calculated to discharge—that of Chairman of this Select Committee. He was aware that objections had been taken to the proposed constitution of the Committee on the ground that it was highly desirable that members of the legal profession should have been appointed; but he did not consider it a question for lawyers at all, and he deprecated the principle of referring subjects even of a simple character on all occasions to lawyers. As the poet Gay had said—

“We know that lawyers can with ease
Twist words and meanings as they please,”

All they wanted in the Committee was good sound sense, honesty, and independence. He was sure that those qualities would be found in the names already placed upon the list. He had originally contemplated proposing a Committee of five Members; but, in consequence of what had occurred with reference to the Committee appointed to inquire into the case of Mr. O’Keeffe, when the House appointed seven in order that the Chairman should not have too great a preponderance, it had occurred to him that seven would be a better number than five. He had originally contemplated appointing two more members to represent the opposing views of this subject, and without votes; but then it was suggested that they might as well vote, as they would always vote contrary ways and thus neutralize each other. He had accepted this suggestion, and as both these Members sat on the same side of the House, he had thus destroyed the original balance of the Committee between the two sides of the House. But he did not think this was a question between one side and the other. It was a question as to what were the facts, and they would be easily ascertained by seven or eight Gentlemen of honourable and independent minds. He did not think it mattered whether the Committee was nominated by the Committee of Selection or by the House; but if the names he submitted met with acceptance it would be best to adhere to the usual practice, and to allow the Mover for the Committee in this case himself to nominate it, rather than to follow a precedent adopted in a hurry, and which was protested against by the Committee of Selection.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had very little to say on the subject. The Government should be very happy with either of the two alternatives proposed. He knew of no substantial objection to be taken to the one or the other. The precedent quoted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) was perfectly fair and unexceptionable; but the Resolution was adopted at a moment’s notice, and that diminished its weight as a precedent. He should have been glad if there had been such an indication of opinion on the part of the House as would have enabled the Government to judge what was the prevailing sense of the House upon the subject, for by such indication they would have been guided. But if the House should remain mute, and give no utterance of their opinion before they went to a division, he thought, considering that the right hon. Member (Mr.

Bouverie) had been at the pains to make a selection, which on all hands was admitted to be unexceptionable, and the Gentlemen had been requested to serve, he should be inclined to vote with his right hon. Friend, at the same time declaring that they did not object to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman opposite if the House thought fit to adopt it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the House in considering this question should have regard to possible future proceedings. There could be no doubt that the names proposed were those of Gentlemen of character and position who would deal with the subject with ability and justice. If this Committee was appointed the House would feel sure that the inquiry would be conducted in a manner which was satisfactory and creditable. But the important consideration was whether it was a tribunal which would command public confidence. There had been many occasions on which the House had proceeded, not on the principle of allowing a Member of the House to submit a number of names to be voted upon—and with respect to whom it was always rather delicate and invidious to vote—but of arranging these matters by the intervention of an intermediate body. It was stated in Sir Erskine May's book on the Law and Practice of Parliament, to which they had been accustomed to look as authority of late years—

"Where the inquiry has been of a judicial character it has been usual to delegate the nomination of a Committee to the General Committee of Elections."

A good number of cases occurring between 1848 and 1864-5 were mentioned. No doubt an impression prevailed that Committees named by the House were constituted by private arrangement, and when a list was presented it was difficult to vote upon it without appearing to reflect on the names it embraced. The proposal to refer the choice of names to the Committee of Selection was met by the reply that they existed for a wholly different purpose, and that they were not particularly well fitted for the duties of the former General Committee of Elections, which, indeed, might be disagreeable to them. As the Committee was not likely to be renewed, was the House to abandon nomination through an intermediate body? That was the question rather than the eligibility of the names submitted. It seemed to him more desirable to conform to the old practice than to set it aside by making a precedent which might be found inconvenient in the future.

MR. MASSEY remarked that the practice of referring to a Committee upstairs the appointment of a Select Committee was comparatively modern, and ought to be restrained within precise limits. It had been adopted when the characters of Members of the House were involved, or when the questions at issue were of a similarly delicate nature, which it was thought desirable should be investigated by a body appointed in a judicial manner. The present inquiry related to a matter of primary interest to the House—namely, the proper expenditure of public money; there was nothing in it of a delicate nature, and he did not think it was necessary to delegate the appointment of the Committee. On the contrary, it was the duty of the House to take upon itself the responsibility of appointing this Committee. Here, there was no question involving the character of any of the Gentlemen concerned in the transaction, for during the discussions he had heard on the subject not a shadow of an imputation had been cast on the motives of any of the parties concerned in making what, according to the present impression in the House, was an improvident contract. He saw nothing which ought to induce the House to depart from the practice of appointing a Committee in the ordinary way. The General Committee of Elections that formerly existed was certainly a very convenient tribunal, it being constituted for the express purpose of nominating gentlemen to try judicial questions. He would suggest that in a future Session the Committee of Selection might be advantageously reconstituted with a view to particular exigencies.

MR. SCOURFIELD, as a Member of the Committee of Selection, thought that tribunal ought not to be charged with the duty of nominating a Committee on this subject. The business of the Committee of Selection was to choose gentlemen to consider Canal, Railway, Gas, and other Private Bills, and there was, in fact, no reason why all its Members should not be taken from either side of the House exclusively.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 124; Noes 85: Majority 39.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Select Committee nominated:—Mr. DODSON, Mr. BENYON, Mr. LEATHAM, Sir ROWLAND BLENHERHASSETT, Mr. WATERHOUSE, Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Viscount SANDON, Mr. HOLMS, and Mr. GOSCHEN:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

SUPPLY.—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOTE 1.—PUBLIC EDUCATION.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £1,083,603, to complete the sum for Education, England and Wales.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in rising to move the Vote for Public Education, said, the Vote showed a considerable decrease on that of last year. The sum which he was about to ask for was £1,290,603, or in round numbers £1,300,000. That showed a decrease on the Vote of last year of £101,952. There was an increase in three items of £11,000—£4,500 for Inspectors, it having been found necessary to appoint four additional Inspectors; £1,000 on new extra grants, under Section 97 of the Act of 1870; and £5,390 for training colleges, in consequence of the large increase in the number of students, which he felt sure the Committee would not be disposed to regard with regret. There was a decrease of £509 for the Central Office, of £13,000 in the sum allowed for the working of the Act, and of £52,900 for building grants, in consequence of the buildings not having been erected as quickly as might have been possible, though, perhaps, as quickly as could reasonably have been expected. In making the Estimate last year, however, it was deemed desirable to take every contingency into account, and to err, if at all, on the safe side. There was a decrease of £12,500 in the sum for night schools, which was chiefly owing to the new regulations adopted with regard to these schools. He regretted on account of their good social effect that night schools should have been diminished; but they were social rather than educational institutions, and he was still of opinion that the House had done right in stipulating by the new regulations that the money expended on education should be really given for educational results. He came, in the next place, to a considerable decrease of £34,000, which was due to the day schools. The reason of the decrease was that matters did not get on quite so quickly as had been thought possible, and that it had, as he had before stated, been deemed wise to err on the safe side. Taking that view, there had been an over-estimate last year; but, notwithstanding, nearly the same amount was asked for in the present. That was done because there were good grounds now for being confident that the Act was getting into work; that the number of schools was increasing, and the number of scholars, and, as a consequence, the number who had to be paid. He found that the increase since August was very considerably greater than for the corresponding period last year, and that new schools were coming in very quickly. From 1862 to 1869, the average number of new schools brought under Government inspection and receiving Government grants in England and Wales was 492 each year. In 1870, the number was 1,114; in 1871, 1,353; and in 1872, 1,530. It was found in addition that the attendance was greatly on the increase, and it was only due to those gentlemen throughout the country who were engaged in the working of the school boards with such devoted energy that he should give two or three facts to show the results of their labours. He found that in Stockport the average attendance had increased 15 per cent since compulsion was introduced, and in Bath 17 per cent. In Manchester the weekly average attendance had increased 36 per cent in 15 months; while in London the average increase had been in the two years ending last December 36,041, and in Hull 3,580 since February, 1872; while in Leeds the average attendance had increased since 1869 to 8,475, or 63 per cent. As yet the increase had not told in the Returns published in the yearly Estimates; but it was an increase which was telling in the inspection which was now going on from month to month. The monthly increase in the actual payments as compared with last year furnished very striking facts as regarded the larger number of schools and the larger average attendance, and he believed he might safely put the average number of attendances this year at

1,557,910. In 1869—the last year previous to the passing of the Act—the number of average attendances was 1,062,999, so that there had since been an increase of 500,000, or 50 per cent. The actual results, he might add, of inspection in England and Wales were as follow:—The number of departments of day schools inspected in 1872 was 14,101; the day scholars present at examination, 1,607,511; the average attendance at the day schools, 1,336,158. Those scholars were taught by 14,771 certificated teachers, 1,646 assistant teachers, and 21,297 pupil teachers. The population of England and Wales had increased from 1869 to 1872 $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and during the same time the number of day scholars instructed $24\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; the scholars present at examination rather less than 21 per cent; the average attendance rather more than 25 per cent; the certificated teachers also rather more than 25 per cent; and the pupil teachers more than 70 per cent. That was the increase up to last year; but the present would show a much larger proportionate increase—a very pleasing fact so far as the progress of education was concerned, but one which would necessitate next year probably a much larger Bill. He did not wish the Committee to suppose that the increase which he had just mentioned did not still leave much to be done. In 1872, the population of England and Wales might be put at about 23,000,000, and, as far as he could estimate, we should aim at an average attendance at elementary schools of about 3,000,000. Our schools would now hold 2,300,000, which, as the Committee would see, would leave a large deficiency in the accommodation, which ought to be considerably in advance of the average attendance. Some of the deficiency with regard to school accommodation was no doubt already supplied; and one of the good results which had followed the inquiries instituted under the Act was that, even in cases where the managers had not thought fit to come under Government conditions, they had in several respects improved their schools, and were improving them, so as really to supply education; while also a larger number of those schools were every day coming under the conditions of Government aid. The building grants, when completed, he estimated would give room for 300,000 more children than they had before. That was without touching the large sums being expended by the different school boards in building schools, taking advantage of the means of obtaining money through the Public Works Loan Commissioners. The London School Board was at work now for 100,000 children, a number which that Board itself, and the Education Department also, believed was the least they could start for, being considerably under the deficiency given by the actual Returns. Besides the case of London, the Department had already recommended loans from the Public Works Loan Commissioners that would afford accommodation for at least 115,000 more children. The Committee would, perhaps, expect a few words as to the progress made in getting the Act into operation. Taking the Census of 1871 as his basis, the population of England and Wales might, in round numbers, be divided somewhere in this fashion:—In the metropolis and in boroughs, 9,800,000; and in 14,082 civil parishes not in the metropolis and boroughs, 12,900,000. For this population of 22,700,000 there were school boards in London and in all the larger boroughs—103 in number—for 8,500,000 of the population; and also school boards in 445 civil parishes, which, although a small proportion in number of the 14,082 he had mentioned, yet comprised a very considerable number of the larger of those parishes. There were school boards in these parishes for 1,500,000 of the population, so that altogether there were school boards for 10,000,000 of the population, leaving 12,700,000 without school boards. The Committee must not suppose that those places were now either without education or without great efforts being made to give it; but, undoubtedly, it was the business of the Department and the object of the Act that in all those parishes there should be strict inquiry as to whether there was sufficient education or not. The only part of the country where it was not necessary to make an inquiry before ordering the adoption of a school board was in the metropolis, in which it was decided to have such a board at once. In the rest of the country school boards were to become necessary if there were no other means of supplying the deficiency. The large towns and several of the large parishes had of their own accord declared that they would rather meet the requirements of their position by voluntarily forming a school board. With regard to the other parishes, it had been the duty of the Department to make inquiry and to act according to the results of that inquiry. Some hon. Members might think that process took rather longer time than it need do; but those who had practically to conduct it found that it proceeded as quickly as could reasonably be expected. It might have been possible to have put on more Inspectors, and covered the country at once with a larger staff; but there was a limit to the extent to which any Department could carry on work of that kind, because difficult points were constantly arising which had to be decided by two or three persons at its head. The permanent heads of his Department had done as much work as it was possible for any human being to do in the time, and he did not believe it could be done much, if at all, quicker with a due regard to doing it well. It was no slight task to institute a searching inquiry throughout the kingdom. That inquiry came to an end in the Spring of last year. The first notices were issued on the 16th of May, 1872. By the 31st of May, 1873, they had published the notices for 8,551 districts, and they hoped to complete those notices in August, or within 16 months of their commencement. The Committee might be interested to hear that of those 8,551 notices, as regarded 3,465, or about 40 per cent, the amount of accommodation was sufficient; and in regard to 5,086, or about 60 per cent, it was more or less deficient. Of those last, in respect to 2,817 they found strong reasons to order a union of parishes, and they had sent out notices that they should be formed into 989 united districts. Out of the 8,500 and odd parishes they had dealt with up to the 31st of May last, although they found 5,000 deficient, he should mislead the Committee if he did not state that in many cases the deficiency was very slight and would be easily filled up, while it was impossible to say to what extent it might be filled up even where it was rather large. So much for the working of the Act. With reference to the report of the examination, it was impossible this year to compare the results of the examination with those of the previous year, because they had not got a year of the New Code with which to compare this year. The New Code introduced a considerable change in the mode of examination one most important alteration being that the age for infants was raised from six to seven. The consequence was an apparent diminution in the number presented for examination. Then the standards of examination were a step higher than last year, and the number of attendances demanded was also larger. Therefore, they were not in a position to compare the results with any previous year. He should be interested, however, in comparing next year with this. In one respect such a comparison might be expected to be rather discouraging. As the school boards and the voluntary managers succeeded in sweeping up the neglected children of the country, they must necessarily bring down the average results of the examination; and they must bear that in mind in justice to the teachers; for nothing was more arduous than to deal with a big boy or girl who was brought into the school utterly untaught; and in some cases the number of such children would lower the general result; but it must not, therefore, be imagined that good work was not being done. As to special subjects, they were making to some extent satisfactory progress. Of 118,799 children presented in standards 4 to 6, the three higher standards, 71,507 were examined in one or more special subjects, and of those 18,958 passed in two subjects, and 30,515 in one subject. Thus about 50,000 out of 71,000 passed their examination in special subjects. This educational business was and must be hard work. Sometimes they seemed to be making very little progress; but, on the whole, he believed their progress was considerable, and also sound and sure as far as it went. They had three great problems to solve?—First, to get the schools; second, to get the children into the schools; and third, to get as much teaching as possible for them during the time they were at school. Their first problem they were very quickly solving. They would speedily have schools throughout the kingdom. The attendance also was increasing, though it was still deficient. They had in that respect to contend with the very prosperity of the country, because work competed with education. Yet they were making progress, and he trusted the House would take measures to insure its being still more rapid. Then he came to what was to be taught to the children. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) took great interest in that. He entirely agreed in principle with the hon. Baronet. The principle he would lay down was that they should aim not merely at giving the children elementary instruction in reading, writing, and ciphering, but strive to teach them everything useful which they could learn during the time they could keep them at school. He believed that under the present Code the children of the poorer classes would receive education from which they had before it existed been practically excluded. They should not, however, go too fast. The foundation should first be laid—the elements of education be imparted before they could hope to go further. They had the encouraging example of Scotland before them, and it was one which he trusted they would follow. With respect to the sum asked for Scotland, he had only to say that, the Scotch Act having only been passed last Session and the New Code only now coming into operation, it was not probable that a larger grant would in consequence be required for Scotland during the current year. He expected this to be the case, judging by the English precedent; but should this turn out to be a mistake, a supplementary vote would be asked for next Session. He hoped the Committee would vote the sum for which the Government asked.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken—whether there was, under the present regulations, any provision made for the examination of masters for certificates in schools which had not hitherto received a grant from the Government? He believed that in the last Code proficiency in teaching music had been rendered an essential qualification in the examination of masters of elementary schools. Admiring, as he did, music as much as any man, he did not think that music formed such an element of education as should render the capacity to teach it an essential qualification for a certificate to the master, or for a grant to the school. He wished to know what the right hon. Gentleman thought on the subject?

MR. RATHBONE complained of the inadequacy of inspecting power in the town of Liverpool, and of the disadvantages in an educational point of view resulting therefrom. There were 157 schools to be inspected, and there was but one Inspector, who had one assistant. He would suggest the appointment of supernumerary Inspectors, who would by their training become fitted for the higher office.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he was of opinion that everybody must have been satisfied with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, and he believed the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) must now see that education was progressing favourably, notwithstanding the fact that school boards were not general throughout the country. He thought that much more would be done by encouraging voluntary effort than by compulsory education. He disapproved, however, of taking away anything because children could not sing, though he would encourage singing as much as possible, and believed that "God save the Queen" would be the most popular song among them. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) stated that a great want of school accommodation existed; but some of the Inspectors demanded a great deal more than the necessity of the case required. Some allowance should be made, and the Inspectors should not ride roughshod over those who were trying to do their duty.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he had listened with great interest to the lucid statement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Education Department. It was, no doubt, a matter of congratulation that the number of children sent in for examination in the extra subjects was increasing; but it appeared that even now, out of 1,500,000 of children in our schools, only 70,000 were examined in anything more than the mere rudiments of reading, writing, and arithmetic, nor did he think we could expect that under the present provisions of the Code there would be any great improvement in this respect. He therefore congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the improvements he had introduced in the Scotch Code, and hoped that similar modifications would be introduced into that for England. As regarded those who passed in the fourth and higher standards, 3s. per scholar was allotted by the New Scotch Code to history and geography. Again, the grants for extra subjects were no longer to be reducible by the excess over 15s. a-head. He had always argued that this limitation rendered the grants offered for extra subjects practically delusive, in confirmation of which he observed that the Education Department estimated the amount which would be earned this year at 12s. a-head on the average. It was obvious, therefore, that if the schools averaged 12s. by reading, writing, and arithmetic alone, the best ones would earn the full 15s., and there would be no inducement to take up any of the so-called extra subjects, under which term it must be remembered, was included everything except mere reading, writing and arithmetic. He regarded the alterations in the Scotch Code, therefore, as great improvements. When on former occasions he pressed the question on the right hon. Gentleman he was supported by the Chairmen, both of the Education League and of the Union, by every Member of the London School Board who had a seat in the House, and indeed, by almost everyone in the House who took an interest in education. He hoped, therefore, that the boon now granted to Scotland would next year be extended to England.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he hoped that this Vote would never again be proposed until the Report of the Committee of Privy Council had first been laid on the Table. He regretted that the extravagance of some school boards was inflicting unnecessary burdens upon the ratepayers; but he congratulated the Committee on the great progress which education was making throughout the country. He hoped the Government would take care that there was an uniformity of action among the Inspectors, some of whom, he understood, had a much higher standard than others. It was also to be desired that Inspectors should be more accessible to the teachers.

MR. A. JOHNSTON asked whether the Government would take some security that schools should not be closed in districts in which children did not attend by reason of attending Sunday schools?

MR. CLARE READ said, he hoped that a better supply of certificated teachers would be found for rural districts. In his parish, a school which had been kept open every day except during holidays for 35 years since its establishment, had been closed during the last nine months, because a certificated teacher, as ordered by the Privy Council, could not be obtained, although a most ample salary had been offered.

MR. WHITWELL also complained that the supply of certificated teachers was not sufficient, and expressed a hope that the item for normal schools would be increased next year. He, however, could not but congratulate the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) on the increase of education throughout the country.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE bore testimony to the great value and importance of night schools. It was a most interesting sight to see such numbers of young men, women, and grown-up people sitting side by side of an evening after their day's work, endeavouring to make up for their deficiencies in education. These were schools which were particularly susceptible of discouragement, and he regretted to think that the action of the right hon. Gentleman might tend in that direction.

MR. DIXON complained that the usual Report had not been placed before the House prior to the discussion on this Vote. It was delayed last year, and was still further delayed this year. This placed hon. Members at a disadvantage in the present discussion. In country districts the people seemed to be afraid of school boards; but facts proved their great practical value. The increased attendance at schools in Birmingham during the last 12 months under the school board system was 50 per cent, as against 50 per cent increased attendance at school throughout the whole country during the last four years. The Vice President of the Council had said that there were 5,000 districts where a deficiency of school accommodation existed, and he should like to know in how many of these districts school boards had been formed? He should like also to know what had been done with reference to normal schools?

MR. W. H. SMITH trusted that, however valuable the work done by school boards might be, there was no disposition on the part of those who were interested in education to endeavour to thrust school boards on districts where they were not really required by proved deficiency of the means of education. School boards were, at the best, an expensive mode of proceeding—which would tell largely on the people's minds when they came to reckon the costs, and which would tend to discourage education if they were forced upon districts where it was not shown that they were necessary. With respect to the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Forster's) statement, it did not appear to be so sanguine as the one he made last year; but it was one on which the House and the country might be congratulated. For his own part, he was not so sanguine as to the effects of direct compulsion as he was last year and the year before. Considerable results had been obtained, no doubt, by the application of direct compulsion; all the children most readily got at had been swept into schools, but the difficult work remained behind. Those parents who were indifferent to the value of education were beginning to find out how they might evade the regulations that were laid down, and by some means or other managed to keep their children at home, or to continue that irregularity which had been the bane of the schools in this country. He looked with longing eyes in the direction of indirect rather than direct compulsion. He believed that better results would be obtained if some system could be established under which a certificate of attendance at school should be made a condition of employment in ordinary pursuits as well as in manufacturing districts. There were many difficulties which had to be met, and he would earnestly entreat hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in education not to be too sanguine, but to wait patiently, expecting smaller results than were calculated upon last year, but not to be discouraged, and to look right and left for means of inducing rather than of compelling parents to send their children to school.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the discussion had been full of useful hints, and afforded a hopeful sign of that interest in the subject throughout the kingdom, without which the Department would be altogether helpless. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for South Essex (Mr. A. Johnston), as to whether the Education Department would take steps to ensure that the schools now considered efficient should continue to be efficient, it was impossible to say when the Department might think it necessary to institute fresh inquiry; but of course it would be the duty of the Government to find out, from time to time, if districts were supplied in the sense of the Act. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) had asked in how many of the 5,000 odd districts in which a deficiency existed school boards had been formed? The Act did not give the Department power immediately to issue an order for a school board. They had first to give notice of the deficiency, and that might be disputed. If it was not, there was still a final notice to be issued intimating the ascertained deficiency, and notifying that unless it was supplied within some period not exceeding six months a school board would have to be established. These final notices had not yet been issued to any great extent, because it was thought better first to finish issuing the first notices throughout the country, and that would be done by August this year. The hon. Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) said that the Inspectors of the Department ought not to proceed by hard-and-fast-lines in ascertaining deficiencies. It had been their object not to do so; and although they had not given universal satisfaction, they had not had any overpowering evidence of dissatisfaction. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had asked two questions. With regard to the examination of masters, there was in the Code a means by which the master of a school which was not in receipt of a Government grant could obtain a certificate without going up for examination, under certain conditions. With regard to such cases as that which the hon. Member had stated, he (Mr. Forster) would undertake to consider the matter fully before the next Code was settled. With regard to the Musical Fine, the rule had not been unsuccessful. The Code required that singing should be part of the teaching of the Elementary Schools, and that a shilling should be deducted from the grant for average attendance where singing was not taught. The final result had been that for all the schools which had been inspected last year the deductions under the Musical Fine had been only £262 10s. out of the total grant of £848,319. Music and singing were generally taught in the schools with very successful results. The hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. F. S. Powell) seemed to think that school boards might be extravagant in consequence of the grants made to them; but he (Mr. Forster) would rather have thought that complaints, if any were made at all, would have been that the grants were rather too much than too little fenced round. As to the staff of Inspectors, he could not honestly say that it was at present too small; but there were circumstances connected with last year which were exceptional, and in some cases untried men had to do the work. The mode of conducting examinations was becoming more uniform, and the President of the Council and himself had revived the custom of having an annual meeting of the senior Inspectors to give suggestions as to the mode in which inspection should be conducted, especially as to the mode of conducting it with uniformity. Hitherto the Government had not set to work to start any establishment in which suitable masters might be trained, as it was a serious matter to do so. He thought however that the suggestion that training halls might be started was one well worth considering, although he hoped it would not be left to the Government to originate them. With reference to the question of compulsion, he might point out that the great size of London made the work of the London School Board much more difficult than that of any other board in the country, for they had to deal with such an enormous multitude of persons who were neglected and more or less degraded. They must also bear in mind that there was a considerable difference between the town and country, and that though there might be some villages and districts in the country where there was great neglect, there were not those masses of neglected children which they saw in towns. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had said that modes had been discovered for evading the Act; but he (Mr. Forster) had endeavoured to meet those cases in the Bill which he had lately introduced. With regard to the night schools, although the regulation that every school must be open 60 times in the course of a year and the average attendance of the scholars must be 40 might have had the effect of shutting up some schools, he thought that any institution which was worthy of support on educational grounds should be able to comply with that condition. He hoped the Committee would agree to the Vote which he now asked.

MR. SCOURFIELD gave the right hon. Gentleman credit for great earnestness and zeal in his endeavours to promote the education of the people; but he regretted that the results, as compared with the cost, were not as satisfactory as might be expected; and he thought that the heads of schools might receive a caution on the subject.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £218,503, to complete the sum for the Science and Art Department.

In reply to Mr. BOWRING,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was quite true that Mr. Cole had resigned his position as Superintendent of the Science and Art Department, at South Kensington, and the important question of the appointment and duties of his successor would be taken into consideration by Lord Ripon and himself, with the assistance of his Colleagues in the Government. He could not allude to the resignation of that gentleman without saying that he had always found him a most efficient, devoted, and painstaking public servant. He only wished that in every Department they had such good servants. He had found very few persons to compare with Mr. Cole either in devotion and industry or in ability and knowledge. He had also been most successful as an administrator.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the answer of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to Mr. Cole's successor was not satisfactory. He objected at so late an hour to go on with this Estimate; particularly as the Government intended, as he understood, to take Supply at the morning sitting this day.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £129,413, to complete the sum for Public Education in Scotland.

MR. MILLER asked how it came that this year the sum allowed for education in Scotland was only £3,000 more than when they had no Act, and he also wished to know why the building grants were put down at the very small sum of £1,400, while the Vote for building grants in England was £105,000?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the reason why the Estimate for Scotch Education was not larger was they did not think it necessary to make it so during the first year of the passing of the Act. If they found more money was wanted, a Supplemental Estimate could be introduced next Session. As to the Scotch Code, that had been drawn up with a view to consult the feelings and wishes of the Scotch people, and he should be very much surprised if Scotland did not earn more money per child than England did.

In reply to MR. DALGLISH,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not undertake to alter the Scotch Code at once, provided it did not come up to his expectation.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £4,610, to complete the sum for the Board of Education, Scotland.

ORDER OF MERIT.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

EARL STANHOPE, in proposing an Address, praying Her Majesty to take into her gracious consideration the institution of an Order of Merit, by which Her Majesty would be enabled to bestow a sign of her royal approbation on men who have deserved well of their country in science, literature, and art, said, that when in February last a proposal to allow British subjects to wear foreign decorations was made to the House by his noble Friend opposite (Lord Houghton), he expressed his concurrence in the answer given by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He (Earl Stanhope) then said that he deemed it of great importance to maintain the principle that the Queen alone was the fountain of honour; but at the same time he expressed his great regret that no means appeared to exist among us of distinguishing the men who had deserved well of their country, or who had attained eminence in other walks of life than civil or military service. That was no new opinion of his, arising only out of that debate. For many years past he had felt the same regret, and awaited only what he thought a favourable opportunity of submitting that question to the judgment of the House. Orders of Knighthood in their earliest origin were, it might be said, confederacies for military objects, arising from the wars in the East between the Christians and the Saracens. One of those early institutions—the Knights of Malta—continued, as their Lordships knew, to live, or at least to linger, until nearly their own times. Subsequently there arose other Orders of Knighthood rewarding military services in wars between the divers Christian States. Civil services were for the most part only by slow degrees acknowledged. Still more tardy had been the recognition by any State of merit in literature, art, or science, which, indeed, in a less civilized state of society, were held of small account. Poets, for example, in this country were for some time regarded as an inferior rhyming race, whose principal distinction was the Poet Laureateship, and their principal employment to extol in birthday odes the virtues of the reigning King and Queen. Only by degrees had juster ideas on these points prevailed, and at present there was scarcely a State of any importance on the Continent which had not admitted the right to decorations to the men of eminence in art, science, and literature. England only, he believed, among the nations of Europe was on these points, he must say, discreditably lagging in the rear. As regarded those foreign nations, he would not weary the House by going over the States of small extent or more recent formation, but would confine himself to those four which, in conjunction with England, used to be surnamed the Five Great Powers. First, as to France. There, as was well known, the Legion of Honour was in its very nature comprehensive. There, an artist like Delaroche, or a man of science like Cuvier, was decorated with the same riband that rewarded a diplomatist like Talleyrand or a statesman such as Thiers. There, as he would venture to assert, a most healthful spirit of emulation was engendered by a distinction which was open to all, and which required no passport of birth, but only the proof of merit. Passing to Austria, he had received much information from that most accomplished statesman, Count Beust, who now so worthily represented the Court of Vienna in this country. He learnt from him that of the various Austrian Orders only one, that of Maria Theresa, was strictly confined to military service. To the others, men of literature and science were freely admissible. As instances might be mentioned, Professor Mittermeyer, of Heidelberg, and a poet at Vienna of great fame throughout Germany, and less known in England than perhaps he deserved to be, Grillparzer, who had attained old age, and was celebrating the anniversary of his birth with his friends, when, by a graceful attention of the Emperor, he was gladdened by receiving the Grand Cross of the Francis Joseph. Much the same, as far as he could learn, was the case in Russia. No Order was specially reserved for men of art and science, but they could find a place in others side by side with the men who had served the State in administration and in warfare. In Prussia of late years the greatest zeal in this cause had been shown. There was an Order entitled Pour le Mérite, founded by Frederick the Great, who had appropriated it to military service in the field; but the late King of Prussia, by a decree, dated May 31, 1842, extended the Order, or rather formed a new class in it, for men who had attained eminence in any branch of knowledge or of art. The number of these, exclusive of honorary members from foreign countries, was fixed at 30, and it was added in the decree—"The study of theology is in accordance with its spirit excluded from this Order." Here, perhaps, there was much to be said on both sides. On the one hand it might seem hard that eminence in theology should not be rewarded as eminence in different branches of study; on the other hand, it was certain that, wherever religious jealousies were rife, a minister would be exposed to constant misconstruction, as if he sought to promote a particular doctrine, while he ought only to consider the claims of eloquence and learning. He was not concerned, however, at present to argue that particular point one way or other; he had mentioned it only as part of the information which he was desirous of affording. He now came to the case of England, and here he would venture to assert that, so far as concerned the recognition of literature, science, and art, we, far from advancing, had actually retrograded. He would go through our different stars and crosses. The Order of the Garter was, as their Lordships knew, confined to Peers. The instances of Commoners holding it since the Revolution—Sir Robert Walpole, who received it before he was created a Peer—Lord North and Lord Castlereagh, as eldest sons of Peers—were very few. It had been refused by both Mr. Pitt and Sir Robert Peel. The same might be said of the Orders of the Thistle in Scotland, and St. Patrick in Ireland. As to the Bath, originally the reward of naval and military services, it had been extended to diplomatists and statesmen, but was not now extended to men in other walks of life. That had not been always so, for a red riband was formerly granted to men of science, and it added to the dignity with which Sir Joseph Banks used to preside over the Royal Society. No similar instance could be given at the present time, and it was this fact which justified him in saying that in this respect, far from advancing, we had, in truth, gone back. The inequality of the present system had also been strikingly shown by the decoration of the Bath being conferred only a few weeks since on Professor Owen, a man, he need not say, of the greatest eminence in the science of Palæontology, but who was eligible only as the holder of an office in the Civil Service—namely, at the British Museum. Now suppose that a man of equal eminence in the kindred study of Geology, Sir Charles Lyell, had been marked out for the like honour from the Crown; then as not holding an office he would not be eligible. Was not this single fact sufficient to make out the case against the present rules? Here were two men equally great in science; the one eligible for distinction because he filled an office, the other not eligible because without place or salary he had laboured in the same cause as an independent man. His object would be equally attained by the foundation of a new Order, or by the creation of a new class of the existing Order of the Bath, conferable upon distinguished men of literature, science, and art; and it would be for the advisers of the Crown to consider which course was preferable. He could not see why one or other of these courses should not be pursued. If done, he believed the effect would be to give a great encouragement to the progress of literature, science, and art in this country, and that a befitting means would be thereby supplied to the State to reward distinguished men who had hitherto been neglected by it. In the debate referred to, the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) spoke slightly of the value of Orders, and cited the remark made of Lord Castlereagh by Prince Metternich at the Congress of Vienna, undecorated in the midst of diplomatists brilliant with stars and ribands—“Ma foi! c'est bien distingué.” But from whom did the disparagement of Orders in that debate proceed? Who was the noble Earl who spoke so slightly of them? Why, a Knight of the ancient and illustrious Order of the Garter. Was it then seemly in a Knight of that illustrious Order, in a man who had attained the highest distinction that Order could confer, to blame other men who, in reward of honourable labour, sought in a lesser field a like distinction? For the noble Earl to adopt such a tone was something like one of the merchant princes of London—a Rothschild, say, or a Baring—holding forth on the worthlessness of wealth. Members of this House were ambitious of earning a red or blue riband by public service; and why should it be discreditable for the poet or artist to nourish a similar ambition? To condemn Orders altogether would partake too much of that utilitarian spirit which, unhappily, was only too characteristic of the present age. If admitted in this case it might be applied to other cases also. Why might not the standard of England itself be described as only a piece of silk, red or blue, with some devices embroidered upon it and stuck at the end of a pole? Yet, this was the standard which had never waved without affording protection to all entitled to it, and which thousands had died for in battle rather than surrender. Much had been said out-of-doors of the difficulty there would be in selecting men for this distinction. He admitted that there would be a difficulty; but the First Lord of the Admiralty had to select lieutenants from cadets, and captains of ships from lieutenants, while the abolition of purchase in the Army had increased the responsibility of the Commander-in-Chief with regard to appointments. The difficulty of selection would not be greater in that than in other cases, and he might add that both the late Prime Minister and the present, Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone, both men of literary attainments and corresponding reputation, would be peculiarly qualified to select the proper men. In the establishment of such an Order three rules, however, would be essential, and those would lessen the difficulty of selection. It might be right in already established Orders, as in the Garter, to consider political partizanship or party fidelity, but the new Order of Merit should be open to all parties and to all or nearly all professions and ranks, while the person admitted must be left quite free to vote against the Minister who had recommended him. Next, the number, whether confined to a single class, or, as he would rather advise, extended to two, should, as in Prussia, be limited; for otherwise there would be constant solicitation to add one more, instead of, when once filled, leaving only vacancies to be supplied. Thirdly, the Order should not carry with it any change of title, as distinct from the name of the recipient. In some cases knighthood would be welcomed; but not unfrequently men who had attained great celebrity by a particular name were unwilling to change it, however slightly. This was the case with Mr. Hallam, when offered a Baronetcy by Sir Robert Peel, and was one of the motives, though not the only one, which led Mr. Grote to decline the peerage offered him by Mr. Gladstone. The change of title might, when consistent with the merits of the case, and agreeable to the feelings of the person concerned, be effected by a separate act of favour from the Crown. With these rulers he had no fear as to the working of the measure. Such was the case which he desired to lay before the House. Whatever might be thought of the manner in which he had treated it, he was sure that the object itself would receive careful consideration from the advisers of the Crown. In the course of his public life he had been greatly struck by the contrast between the contempt and disdain often felt for literature and science by underlings in office, and the respect and attention almost invariably shown them by those men of higher mark at the head of public affairs. He was sure that the Ministers of Her Majesty would carefully consider this object, and he should rejoice if they felt it within their sphere of duty to concede it. If not, he would appeal to the House at large to put an end to that feeling of dissatisfaction, that chafing at unequal right which existed to a large extent in the literary, artistic, and learned classes in England. He appealed to the House—and these should be his last words—to seek to do honour to those men who had done honour to their country.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty would be pleased to take into her gracious consideration the institution of an Order of Merit by which Her Majesty would be enabled to bestow a sign of her royal approbation upon men who have deserved well of their country in science, literature, and art.—(The Earl Stanhope.)

Earl Stanhope

EARL GRANVILLE admitted the force of the arguments so clearly urged by his noble Friend, and felt that in urging any arguments on the other side it was rather difficult to do so in the present Assembly; he, however, did not think sufficient reason had been shown for acceding to the Motion. He fully agreed in all that had been said respecting the deservings of distinguished men of science, literature, and art, of whom the country had good reason to be proud, and that he should be glad to see his way to doing something towards satisfying the aspirations of the noble Earl; but he feared that the difficulties of dispensing a new Order of Merit such as that suggested were by far greater than the noble Earl seemed to think. One of the existing Orders, that of the Garter, had been remarkable for the distinguished persons who had possessed it, yet one of the things which gave it its charm was its mediæval character, and nobody would think of proposing that such an Order should now for the first time be created for the purpose of being distributed in the manner in which it was now generally done. No doubt there might be some advantage for a time in the creation of new Orders by despotic Sovereigns. For instance, no one could doubt that when the despotic head of an Empire like Napoleon I., with his great military genius, instituted the Légion d'Honneur, it inspired his troops with a spirit of emulation which facilitated his achievements; but the importance of these Orders somewhat diminished as time went on. It was some years since he lived in France, but he found the Légion d'Honneur much depreciated, not when given for eminent services, but because almost every third or fourth person one met in the streets displayed that red riband. He did not mean to say that that would be the case if the Order the noble Earl desired were established; but he thought that the creation of such Orders and their too free distribution might have the same effect. He agreed with his noble Friend that if an Order of Merit were established it must be irrespective of political opinions, and open to every profession in which distinction was sought, leaving the recipient thoroughly independent of the influence of party; but he saw difficulties in the practical working of it, and he was not sure that they were not greater in a country having the inestimable advantage of representative institutions than in one of a more despotic character. Their Lordships would all admit that the Prime Minister was overworked to a very great degree, and he doubted the wisdom of adding to his duties and obligations; yet it appeared to him impossible for any other person, with regard to an Order of Merit distributed among every class of the community, to assume the duty of administering it. In other countries it might be all very well for those who had already received honours to recommend those to whom they should be given; but in this country that would be a sort of close corporation which would infallibly break down. Literary pensions had given rise in innumerable cases to criticism and dissatisfaction, and promotion in the Admiralty was not an analogous case, for the First Lord was bound to acquaint himself with the merits of the officers under him. His noble Friend had mentioned Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli as men of literary eminence themselves entitled to distinction, but all Prime Ministers, though good Prime Ministers, were not equally competent judges. Sir Robert Walpole had a supreme contempt for the whole class of literary men, yet under the Motion he would have had to decide who was the best poet, the best historian, and the best jurist. He (Earl Granville) believed a Prime Minister would be above political considerations; but in the working of our institutions he was not sure whether, out of two men of equal attainments, the one who had written ably and successfully on the Ministerial side would not have the preference, unless the case were a very glaring one. The difficulties of instituting new Orders of this kind were enormous. He agreed to a certain extent with his noble Friend that it was illogical to confine rewards to servants of the Crown; but it should be remembered that it was the object of the State to tempt the best men into the public service, and that a certain number of rewards distributed among them increased the consideration in which they were held. It was a very different thing for the head of a representative Government to select virtuous, eminent, and distinguished persons from the whole community. He knew that many were anxious to obtain some such recognition of great services to the public, but he doubted whether men like Lord Macaulay and Sir Charles Lyell would derive the slightest increased consideration from an Order of that character; while, if mistakes were made, as was certain to happen in comparing different walks in life, there would be outcry and dissatisfaction. He did not complain of the noble Earl having brought the subject forward, or of the manner in which he had treated it. It was a matter, of course, quite open to discussion, and that House was perfectly qualified to express their opinion upon it. All he could say at present on the subject was that the Government saw no means of giving practical effect to the noble Earl's views, and therefore he could not agree to the Motion.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that as one who had taken some interest in the question of foreign decorations, he desired to say a few words on the question. He approached the consideration of the question with great diffidence, and although he admitted the existence of many objections could not withhold his support from the Motion of the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope). The discussion raised by himself (Lord Houghton) on a former occasion was useful, as having elicited the fact that the objection to wearing foreign decorations rested simply on the order of one of the Departments of the State, not countersigned by the Sovereign or even by the Prime Minister, and that there existed no legal penalty or disqualification on the subject. The matter under discussion, however, was a perfectly distinct question, and he must urge that it was advisable to keep the noble Earl's proposition altogether distinct from the question of the acceptance by Englishmen of foreign orders. The objections just urged by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs were very obvious, and it was doubtless easier to reward public servants than to select men distinguished in art, science, and literature; but if the proposal of the noble Earl were carried out, he believed the advantages that would accrue would considerably outweigh the defects comprised in those objections. Were such an Order established, probably the men who had most influenced the minds of their countrymen would hardly come under the cognizance of those who distributed decorations. Three men in the lifetime of their Lordships had guided and influenced the mind of England. The generation from which he came was under the moral and philosophical influence of Coleridge, under whose genius the literature of the time was almost transformed. The following generation, perhaps, not so patently, but in a great degree, was under the influence of Mr. Thomas Carlyle, whose writings had influenced not only the philosophy, but the practical statesmanship, of our time, and had even affected the structure of the English language. There had since been the influence of Mr. John Stuart Mill. He would not say that no one of these three men would in all probability have been offered or accepted any decoration; but it was not by these high superiorities that the question must be tried, but by the ordinary eminences in science, literature, and art. In addition to the arguments for the Motion urged by the noble Earl opposite, he would urge the evil to both parties of isolating literature from our political and social system, and the importance of bringing literary men into brotherhood with men of different conditions and ranks, thereby doing much to secure the maintenance of the orders of society and a community of interests among all classes. It was also desirable to take a step which would indicate the importance of art and literature, and would show that the well-being of a nation did not depend on active pursuits alone. Moreover, if by any recognition of the merits of science and art they could keep more prominently before the nation those qualities upon which the dignity, prosperity, the power and the mind of the nation depended for their development, a great good would be effected. The noble Earl said that he would be equally satisfied with the institution of a new Order, or with the extension of some existing Order for the purpose; but he (Lord Houghton) would, for his part, much prefer the latter, one effect of which would be to bring men of literature and science to a position of greater social dignity, and tend to put them upon a greater degree of equality with their Lordships than at present. The Order of the Bath had been extended to all civil officers under the

Lord Houghton

Crown, and that measure though denounced at the time, as exercised in an unscrupulous manner and to lessen the dignity of the Order, had been received with public favour. Many men of political distinction had received decorations, but the fact that Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli went about the world entirely undecorated argued caprices and inconsistencies in the distribution of Orders such as could hardly be equalled if they were extended to literature and science. He had had the honour of being present at the dinner given by the late King of Prussia to the Ordre de Mérite, which had maintained the French name it derived from its founder's Gallican proclivities, and he was much impressed at seeing an academy, as it were, of every kind of mental distinction gathered round an intellectual Sovereign. He believed the difficulty of selection would be less than in the distribution of rewards in the public service, for the Minister, though he might make mistakes, which attended the distribution of all honours and rewards, would be guided, not only by his own opinion, but by the distinct affirmation of the public, which would point out the men fit to receive the distinction; and, overworked as Mr. Gladstone was, he was sure his own classical mind and love of literature could have no more grateful task than the recognition of intellectual eminence. If, as his noble Friend seemed to think, these Orders were declining in estimation, why had the Order of the Star of India and that of the Victoria Cross been created? The diffusion of education and the general system of competitive examination had laid the foundation for a great intellectual hierarchy, of which the institution proposed would be the proper consummation. A considerable amount of knowledge and capacity had been made a requisite, perhaps in an exaggerated form, for the public service. If that were a sound policy, why should there not be a distinct recognition of mental eminence?

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he must contend that the recognition of literary and scientific men as a separate class was undesirable. To attach them to the institutions of their country they required no special honours or rewards as a class, as had been attempted by foreign countries, and with very poor success. He had no wish to create in them a class feeling, which would tend to diminish their feeling themselves to be fellow-citizens who were doing good work in their country, and resting their reputation on their merits alone. The Victoria Cross was the reward of an act of bravery as to which there could be no dispute; but a selection of literary and scientific men would be much more difficult; while the limitation of the number would involve serious heart-burnings, and temporary popularity instead of solid merit would be likely to gain the distinctions. The wisest course was, he thought, to leave matters in their present position, and instead of attempting to give to literary and scientific men a new distinction of doubtful value, to allow them to enjoy, as they had hitherto done, that unbought honour which sprang from the admiration and gratitude of their countrymen.

EARL GREY said, he was of opinion that if the object which it was proposed by the Motion to attain were to be effected at all, it would be better done by the extension of the Order of the Bath, than by the creation of any new Order. The Order of the Bath, he might add, was with a very few exceptions, given only as a reward for distinguished naval and military services; but in 1846, when the Government of his noble Friend Earl Russell came into office, the question of extending the Order to civilians eminent in literature and art was very carefully considered, and it was determined that it would not be expedient to take that course. He was at the time at the Head of the Colonial Department, and he could state that, in company with himself, some of the most distinguished literary men concurred in that view. The Government of Sir Robert Peel had, he believed, previously arrived at a similar conclusion. The reasons given by his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in opposition to the Motion, were in his opinion quite sound. The practical difficulties in the way of giving distinctions, such as those under discussion, to literary men in our existing state of society would, he had no doubt, be found to be most formidable, and he must, therefore, express his satisfaction at the decision which the Government had come to on the subject.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

AGRICULTURAL RETURNS FOR SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether in compiling the Agricultural Returns for Scotland in future years they will be enabled to introduce the following returns:—

"1. A return of the number of acres of land now under cultivation which would be susceptible of remunerative improvement by underground drainage:

"2. A return of the number of acres of land now classed as heath or mountain land susceptible of profitable reclamation and improvement in connection with underground drainage:

"3. A return of the number of acres of land now classed as heath or mountain land appropriated exclusively to the support of deer:

And, whether Her Majesty's Government will direct the Agricultural Returns for Scotland to be compiled in Scotland, and to be published in a separate volume with a distinct report? The noble Lord said, he trusted he might claim their Lordships' indulgence, while he explained the reasons which had influenced him in putting these Questions. The increase which had taken place in the price of provisions, and the great extent to which we had become dependent upon foreign countries for our supply of food, made it extremely important to ascertain, if possible, in what degree the productive powers of our own kingdom could be developed. Great difference of opinion existed upon this subject among even the most competent judges, and it was very desirable that there should be established, if the information could be arrived at, a more certain basis upon which opinion could be founded on this important subject. It was with a view of eliciting as much information as he could on the subject, that he had put these questions upon the Paper. He had limited his inquiries to Scotland, inasmuch as that portion of the kingdom appeared to be peculiarly open to the sort of improvement they suggested, and should the information be furnished, and the results found to be of a character that would demand further inquiries as to other portions of Great Britain, similar Returns might be obtained from the rest of the kingdom. If their Lordships would refer to the Agricultural Returns which were already in their possession, as coming from Scotland, they would find that the acreage of that country was set down as 19,639,000 acres. Under the head of arable and improved pasture land, there were stated to be 4,538,000 acres; and upwards of 15,000,000 acres were put down as heath and mountain land. In endeavouring to ascertain what was the margin of increase that could be obtained in the productive power of the country, attention should be first turned to the character of the arable and pasture land capable of improvement by drainage and in other ways; and it seemed to be the opinion of those who were best acquainted with the subject, that great results might be obtained from the improvement of this description of land already more or less under cultivation. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would give a promise that in future the number of acres of land which would come within the particular category of land capable of further improvement would be given. He had no doubt that that part of the information required could be obtained with tolerable correctness. It was within his own knowledge, that in the part of the country in which he lived, every farmer, land agent, and proprietor was well acquainted with the quantity of arable land to which the system of tile drainage could be profitably applied. It was also important in making these Returns that they should have as accurate figures as could be obtained as to the quantity of land that came within the category of non-pasturage or waste. It was found in the Returns that had been published, that by far the greater portion of the country was returned as heath and mountain land, and that Return had led in various parts of the country to a good deal of misapprehension as to the real character of the soil. Among the agricultural classes there was the strongest apprehension that a very large portion of the soil was purposely retained in an unproductive state, simply for the sport and entertainment of the upper classes; and he thought it important that some notice should be taken of the Return; that it should be analyzed and distinctly characterized, so that in some degree the different uses to which that large area of land was devoted might be known. The Returns he asked for also included the number of acres that were capable of being reclaimed and rendered productive to the extent of paying 5 per cent on the outlay which such reclamation would involve. There was no doubt that such a Return would hardly be a very accurate one in the first instance, but every year would help to make it more reliable and authentic. Then, again, he asked for Returns as to the quantity of land that was exclusively appropriated to the support of deer. Such a Return would be a very valuable one in the agricultural statistics of Scotland under any circumstances; but it appeared to him that the information was more than ever desirable at the present time with reference to a controversy, which had lately risen on this subject—a controversy that had been pursued with considerable heat on both sides—on the part of those who were the votaries of sport and the owners of deer forests, and also on the side of those who thought that those deer forests involved an unjustifiable use of property. It was stated on the one hand, that the maintenance of these deer forests involved a depopulation of the country to a certain extent, and the substitution of an inferior and unprofitable class of the community for a more industrious and intelligent class; that it also involved to some extent a limitation of area of agricultural produce, and a consequent limitation of the profitable employment of capital; that it was in some degree an unjustifiable abuse of the rights of property, tending to produce dissent and dissatisfaction between the various classes of the community; and that the abuse was so great that it ought to be restrained. Their Lordships were aware that these arguments had been vigorously met by arguments on the other side. Those who were in favour of the appropriation of land in the way under discussion, denied that it produced any diminution of population whatever, and affirmed that the order of people, gamekeepers and others, whom it substituted for the previous inhabitants, were as respectable in their social position as the shepherd was in his. They also said, that although there might be a diminution of the meat supply in one form, there was a substitution of another description of animal food; and that, even if there were some loss at home under that head, the production of meat coming within the class referred to was stimulated elsewhere, for they asserted that the farmers and shepherds who left the Highlands of Scotland carried their capital and their industry to Canada and Australia, where the identical commodities which they formerly produced in their own country were produced by them and sent to our markets in increased quantities, and to some extent of better quality, so that in reality there was no limitation of this sort of produce. Moreover, they affirmed that while the introduction of deer did no substantial harm, it led to a great deal of money being spent in the country that would not otherwise have circulated there, on the part of those who hired the deer forests, and that it led to society being sustained in remote parts of the Highlands which would otherwise remain unvisited and desolate. What was remarkable in the controversy was, that it proceeded from a very slight knowledge of the fact. It was not his purpose to express any opinion on the subject one way or the other. He was asking for information, and it would be inconsistent and illogical for him to offer an opinion; but he might be permitted to say that, in his humble judgment, that part of the question which had reference to the extent of the deer forests was a very important one, and that without a knowledge of the area of the land so occupied, it would be impossible to arrive at any very sound conclusion on the subject. It might be doubted whether it would be easy to make such a Return in the case of land occupied as deer forests as could be made as to the arable and pasture land; but he thought that the Return might be easily obtained on application to the proprietors and agents of the land. If the area were ascertained, there would be no difficulty in also getting at its productive powers, and the difference that would be made by the substitution of one class of produce for another. He also desired Returns of the amount of land absolutely unavailable for any productive purpose, and that Return was absolutely necessary in order to get at the future productive capacity of the whole country. It would probably be found that a very considerable area of the Highlands of Scotland came under that category. In the existing Returns upwards of 4,000,000 acres were set down as altogether unused for any agricultural purpose. He hoped that the Government, if these Returns were granted, would order that they should be printed in a separate and distinct form. It was undesirable that the Agricultural Returns for Scotland should be mixed up with those of England. The land in Scotland was held in a different manner from that of England—it was transferred in a different way; the inhabitants' customs of tenancies were all different from those of England. He also thought that the Returns should be accompanied by a Preface or Report, composed by some distinguished and intelligent Scottish agricultural authority, a task which might with great propriety be entrusted to the Secretary of the Highland Society, who would be enabled to frame such a Report as might be thought highly interesting, popular, and instructive.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in reply, said, he hoped his noble Friend (Lord Napier) would not think him an enemy to the progress of knowledge, and that he would excuse him, if he ventured to suggest that there were very serious difficulties involved in getting the Returns, so that they might be inserted in the manner wished by his noble Friend. He entirely agreed in the desirability of enlightening the public mind on the facts in respect to the tenure of land and the occupation and improvement of the soil, and also believed that many of the arguments used on both sides of those vexed questions implied the most entire ignorance of the whole state of those facts as regarded Scotland. He was anxious to supply such further information and knowledge as would be useful on that subject; but he would point out to his noble Friend that it must be knowledge of facts, and not knowledge of opinion. The noble Lord asked that in compiling the Agricultural Statistics of Scotland, they would introduce certain Returns, which he specified, but a Return in the Parliamentary sense of the term meant a Return of clear definite facts, easily ascertainable, and not of matters of opinion. Now, of the four heads included in his noble Friend's Question, only one referred strictly to a matter of fact, and he did not think the answer to it would be of much use to him. His noble Friend wanted—

"A return of the number of acres of land now under cultivation, which would be susceptible of remunerative improvement by underground drainage."

That involved all sorts of speculative opinions. Why, there was hardly a field belonging to any of their Lordships which would not be the better for being re-drained. Some drains got choked up, and some spots got damp, and there were a variety of circumstances to be considered. But his noble Friend not only said "susceptible of improvement," but susceptible of remunerative improvement." That was another thing, and involved another whole set of hypotheses. The question of remuneration or non-remuneration of agricultural lands was entirely a matter of local circumstances and demands, and depended upon the question of locality and markets. His noble Friend might as well ask for a Return of the number of acres of land in England capable of being turned into market gardens. Almost every acre would be capable of being so converted. Market gardens gave the maximum rate of rent—from £20 to £30 per acre—and its produce might amount to £40 or £50, or even £60. No, doubt, a large portion would be capable of being converted into a market garden; and perhaps at some future time, it would all be turned into market gardens; but it would be an absurd question to put, as to how much was capable of being turned into market gardens. That entirely depended upon the circumstances under which the land was let; and equally so, with the question of land being capable of remunerative drainage, that was entirely a question of opinion depending upon the local circumstances and local requirements. That was a Return that the Government were not prepared to make, and which no Government ought to be required to give, being one which to a great degree must be based upon speculative opinion. The next Return desired by his noble Friend was—

"A return of the number of acres of land now classed as heath or mountain land susceptible of profitable reclamation and improvement in connection with underground drainage."

He (the Duke of Argyll) had not the slightest doubt, that at some future period a very large part of the heath and mountain lands of Scotland which were not now occupied, would be reclaimed,

The Duke of Argyll

but that would depend upon the progress of society. But it was a speculative question how, when, and where the land could be remunerative. He could not see how such Returns could be given. The agricultural people of Scotland were intelligent persons, and very much alive to their own interests, and they were the best judges of when and where these lands were to be converted into arable lands. The process of reclamation was going on rapidly in the Highlands of Scotland, and wherever those interested locally were convinced that it would be profitable to so convert the land, it was done. He never went to the Highlands without seeing that such was the case; but he doubted whether information received from a Government officer on the subject would be a safe guide for public opinion in reference to it. Moreover, it would be absolutely impossible for any Government to say when a slope of mountain was to be reclaimed, and how it was to be done. As to the third question, namely—that was the only question of a matter of fact, and even that could not be given without some expression of opinion. No doubt when the surveys for Scotland were complete, they would get with more accuracy the acreage of the deer forests of Scotland; but what information would the public get from that? The land differed vastly in quality, and the number of acres would be wholly illusory as to the profitable occupation of the soil. There were thousands of square acres that would not support a sheep; therefore the Returns would be a fallacious indication of the real value of the land. If a Return were made of the number of acres of all the pleasure grounds and flower gardens in England, Scotland, and Ireland, in the vicinity of large towns, he believed its value would exceed that of the whole deer forests of Scotland. He then came to Question No. 4—

That Return, too, would necessarily be based upon speculative opinion. There were few spots, with the exception of stony ridges and peaks, on which an animal of some description—a goat, for instance—could not find something to live upon. Under all those circumstances, it was impossible to grant the Returns asked for, the duty of the Government being to furnish facts and not opinions. If they placed the obtaining of the Returns in the hands of one person, as suggested, it might prove to be a formidable engine for the dissemination of particular opinions. Their Lordships, doubtless, remembered that in one of his public speeches last winter, his noble Friend Lord Derby made a statement as to the occupation and cultivation of land in which there was, no doubt, a great deal of truth; but that statement had been seized upon by all sorts of persons, and twisted in the effort to make it support views wholly different from those which it was meant to illustrate. Under those circumstances, he thought it would be imposing upon them a task which they ought not to be called upon to perform, for if the Government were to place a duty in the hands of an officer, involving questions as to how land should be used here and there all over the country, it would be illusory in its nature and would inevitably lead to interminable controversies and misleading data. Under those circumstances, he could not hold out any hope of the Returns being furnished in the manner suggested in the Question of his noble Friend.

INDIA—DESTRUCTION OF LIFE BY WILD BEASTS.—QUESTION.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether the Government of India had under its consideration any measure for the prevention of the destruction of life and property in India by wild beasts?—said, the question was one which concerned the welfare and safety of a numerous, remote and defenceless order of Her Majesty's subjects, and he need, therefore, he felt, make no apology for bringing it under the consideration of their Lordships' House. The outlines of the Question had been furnished in a paper recently read in the Society for the Promotion of Social Science by a meritorious officer of the Bengal Service—Captain Rogers—who was favourably known by his services in connection with penal institutions in India. That paper had, he believed, been forwarded to many of their Lordships. While he did not adopt all the assertions made and conclusions drawn by Captain Rogers, he could not but recognize and acknowledge the service he had rendered in dealing with that subject. The evil was not general, but it was very serious where it existed; and it existed in its worst form in Bengal, the North-Western Provinces, and in central India. It appeared from a Return for three years, that the average loss of human life in the British provinces from the cause referred to was 4,138. The reports for those provinces were, however, in themselves, incomplete, and did not extend to the native states, and it was, in fact, calculated that the number did not fall far short of 10,000. The Returns as to the loss of live stock were far more complete. They showed that in Madras 60 live stock were killed for one human being. There were no Returns for six districts, but he thought he might say that 100 live stock were killed for one human being. So that if 10,000 human beings were killed, the number of live stock destroyed would amount to 500,000. The value of those domesticated animals was uncertain, but might be set down as between £250,000 and £500,000. But that was not all—the sufferings and losses were not confined to the actual destruction of human and animal life, for still greater loss and suffering were caused by the loss of labour and produce by the limitation of culture, the interruption of traffic, and the habitual terror produced by these animals. Everyone, therefore, would admit the importance of the subject, and the Government were bound in honour and in duty to do something more than had hitherto been attempted. The sufferings of the people from wild animals, moreover, were much aggravated by the disarmament which followed upon the Indian Mutiny, for in consequence of that step being taken, the Government had deprived the people of the arms which they were formerly allowed to possess, and there could be no doubt that the want of arms had made them more submissive to the ravages of wild beasts. The extension of culture in the woods and the protection of woods were also causes that had contributed to the increase of the evil. The Indian Government were bound as far as possible to protect the lives and property of

Her Majesty's subjects, and he would recommend that the whole question should be placed in the hands of the police. They should continue to make full and accurate Returns of the loss of life and property from wild beasts, and there should also be a continuance of the system of offering rewards for their destruction. In India, where everything was hereditary, there was a class of hereditary huntsmen. The native shikarries might be intrusted with a certain number of arms, for which they should be held responsible, and a special service might be organized in connection with these native huntsmen under English officers, such service adopting the use of a familiar name, but with an object in no way so atrocious as that applying to the former, might be appropriately termed "Tiger Thugs." He did not propose a settled general establishment; but experience had now shown, that to expect the wild animals of India to be destroyed by spontaneous efforts and under the existing system was hopeless. It might be supposed that in a matter affecting their lives and property, the natives might be trusted to defend themselves; but those who held such an opinion were little acquainted with the actual condition and character of the people of India. The people were incapable of undertaking the destruction of wild beasts, without the intervention of the Government; and they would go on for years, submitting to the infliction of their present sufferings. The active interference of the Government was not without example in India; and it was justified by the practice in France. In remote ages, the only method of preventing the multiplication of noxious animals was to offer rewards for the capture and destruction of wild beasts, and in France a regular department used to be kept up for the extinction of wolves and other destructive animals. The same question must be settled in India, and he trusted that the subject was either now occupying the attention of the Government of India, or that it would be brought under its consideration by the Secretary of State.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, his noble Friend (Lord Napier) had done a public service by directing attention to the loss of life among the natives of India by wild beasts. It was a matter of the greatest public importance, and he regretted that he was unable to assure his noble Friend that any particular or special means of preventing these losses and sufferings were, at present under the consideration of the Government of India. According to the latest Returns, the number of persons who lost their lives by wild beasts was alarming and extraordinary, and the casualties were of such a nature as to make it almost imperative on the part of that Government to turn their earnest attention to the subject. As long ago as 1864 a despatch was sent to India requesting the Government to look into the question, but no answer had been received to that despatch up to the present time. He proposed sending out another despatch, calling the attention of the Government of India to the first one, and urging the necessity of seeing after the matter. These Returns, however, for the future, would be systematically made, so that the subject would be kept in view. The last Return, which was that of 1871, showed that the extraordinary number of between 18,000 and 20,000 human beings in India lost their lives from wild beasts and snake bites, and that of these a very large proportion owed their deaths to tigers. It also appeared that there were extensive districts where cultivation was seriously impeded, and almost at a standstill, in consequence of the ravages of man-eating tigers. No doubt, the responsibility of the Government had been increased by the native disarmament which had followed the Indian Mutiny, but it was, notwithstanding, extraordinary that the people had not sufficient energy to go out and destroy these creatures. His noble Friend had made a suggestion that as there was a caste in India devoted to hunting, they should be formed into a corps who might be called Tiger Thugs. He was quite certain that if the Government announced its intention to form a hunting corps, for the destruction of wild beasts in India, they would be besieged with applications for enrolment in it. His noble Friend's suggestion, which was new to him, might be applicable to certain parts of India, and he would request the Viceroy to take the whole subject into his consideration.

LORD LAWRENCE said, that the Government of India had, of course, been aware that great numbers of human beings—men, women, and children were annually destroyed by wild animals, and that the evil had, to a certain extent, increased since the general disarmament of the population consequent upon the Mutiny, but he did not know that in any sense the Government of India could be said to be much to blame in the matter. For many years, handsome rewards had been allowed by the Government for the destruction of tigers, bears, wolves, &c.; but from some cause, which at present was not satisfactorily explained, it was clear that these animals were increasing in number. One point, however, deserved the attention of the Government. It was said, although he could hardly believe it, that in some cases English officers discouraged the extirpation of wild animals with the view of keeping the destruction of them in their own hands.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION.—MILITARY DEPOT AT OXFORD.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving for an Address for the production of Correspondence between the War Office and the Corporation of Oxford, or any other persons, concerning the purchase of a site for a Military Depot, said, that at the end of last Session he pressed strongly upon the Government that a military centre should not be established at Oxford until the Tutors and Professors had had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the subject, and he understood the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne) to agree that the decision of the Government should be put off until such an opinion had been expressed. In the autumn, as soon as the Tutors and Professors assembled, they drew up a Memorial, deprecating in the strongest terms the establishment of a military centre at Oxford, on the ground that it would interfere seriously with their work and increase the difficulty of maintaining efficient discipline. That Memorial, he presumed, the noble Marquess had seen. The signatures were headed by the names of Dr. Pusey and Dr. Jowett, and included those of eminent men of every school of thought in religion and politics, and probably so many men of such widely divergent views never before signed the same document, it being signed by 24 University Professors and 89 Tutors. When the question was last before the House, it was treated as if it were a comparison between the respective merits of military and academical men. He never desired to put it in that light, or to oppose the Government in any spirit derogatory to the excellence of the discipline or morality of Her Majesty's Forces. Their barracks might be monasteries; association with them might be the one thing needed to stimulate study; and the population surrounding barracks might be distinguished by all the virtues, and, above all, by chastity; but the authorities of the University were judges of what was beneficial and what injurious to it, and for the War Office to oppose its opinion, was like an Archbishop quoting the opinion of Convocation on a question of military discipline. He should have thought no Administration would wish to incur the unpopularity of setting at naught the opinion of the great national University; and the Secretary of State for War had other reasons for refraining from this course. The Inspector General had reported against the eligibility of the site, which would jam up the centre in an extreme corner of the district. It was also curious to observe how the War Office had met another class of objectors. There was local opposition to barracks being built near two roads containing villas; and that local opposition prevailed, while the authorities of the University were disregarded. When he (the Marquess of Salisbury) suggested last year that Oxford had been selected as a military centre because Mr. Cardwell was Member for the City, the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne) warmly repelled the suggestion. Last winter, however, Mr. Cardwell went down to the meeting of the Druids, and delivered his annual electioneering speech, and he actually put forward as one of the grounds for claiming the confidence of his constituents, that he had selected Oxford as a military centre, because of the connection of the regiment to be located there with the City of Oxford. It was done by the right hon. Member for Oxford in order to please the City of Oxford, and his Colleagues seemed to think that it was quite natural that an administrative power should be employed to purchase a constituency. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, if noble Lords opposite objected to purchase, he would say to conciliate a constituency.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The regiment is connected with Oxford.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Did the noble Lord mean to say that the 52nd Regiment cared about going to Oxford? However, that might be, he could not otherwise account for more importance being attached to the representations made by the right hon. Gentleman's constituents, to which he had referred, than to the united opposition of all the teaching authority of that great University. Some years ago, it was said—whether truly or falsely no matter, but falsely he believed—that a contract was given to conciliate the electors of Dover. A change of Ministry followed, and, by a strong departure from the ordinary practice, which was for a Ministry to regard the administrative Acts of its predecessors as sacred, the contract was revoked. On the same principle he believed that act of selecting Oxford as a military centre would not be respected by another Secretary for War, should there by any chance be a change of Government; and he for one should not deem himself precluded from asking the new Government to reverse the act of its predecessors. The University was, he thought, perfectly right in keeping the question open, and if any further opportunity should be afforded hereafter for obtaining a reversal of the policy from some future Minister of War, he wished it to be understood that he should not feel himself precluded from availing himself of it, by reason of his not taking further action under the existing Government.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for. Copies of correspondence between the War Office and the Corporation of Oxford, or any other persons, concerning the purchase of a site for a Military Depot.—The Marquess of Salisbury.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) appeared to have forgotten that the War Office, in selecting sites for these dépôt centres, was bound to search for certain conditions which were requisite to the carrying out of the scheme—conditions which were not easily found within a limited area. It was, in the first place, necessary that the site selected as a dépôt centre should be central in respect of the population from which the troops attached to the district were to be recruited; secondly, that the railway communication between it and the rest of the country should be ample; thirdly, that the locality itself should be healthy, and generally suitable; fourthly, that it should if possible be a place in which the head-quarters of a Militia regiment had already been established. In Oxford every one of those conditions had been satisfied. It was upon those grounds that it had been selected, and it was not until the arrangements of the War Office in the matter had been somewhat matured that the opposition of the University had to be encountered, for it was late last year when the Memorial quoted by the noble Marquess had reached the Government. Nothing could be further from his intention than to say a word which was disrespectful towards those who had signed the Memorial, but it was a fact that, out of 25 Heads of Houses, only five had appended their signatures to it; and he might besides add that if, as the noble Marquess said, a military officer could not be a good judge as to what was suitable to academic discipline, a Professor of Moral Philosophy would be likely to have very crude ideas as to the result of the establishment of a military dépôt under a system of which no experience existed, in a particular locality. As to the Report of Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, although he had pointed out various difficulties with respect to obtaining a good site within two miles of Oxford, yet he had said nothing against the selection of Oxford as a dépôt centre on general grounds, and the difficulties which had been raised in anticipation in the Report, with respect to the water supply and other matters, had been satisfactorily overcome, for the most part by arrangement with the Corporation of Oxford. He would remind the noble Marquess, too, that he had made no alternative suggestion as to where a dépôt centre for the district might be established on the present occasion, as he did on a former one, and that while disapproving Oxford he had not suggested to their Lordships another place in which the requisite qualifications were to be found. He had, he might add, no objection to the production of the Correspondence.

THE DUKES OF RICHMOND remarked that Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar had not to discharge the duty of reporting whether Oxford was or was not, in his opinion, a suitable site for a dépôt centre, but whether a suitable place for the purpose could be found in the neighbourhood, and he found himself unable to recommend any site in the vicinity of that city except one at Woodstock. As to the objections raised on account of the want of a proper supply of gas, water, and the absence of an outflow for sewage, he found that "provisional" arrangements were to be made to meet those objections; but provisional arrangements, when the case was one concerning a large body of men, were most unsatisfactory, and he hoped the negotiations on the subject would end in their being of a more complete character.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he felt it his duty to declare that there was no foundation whatever for the odious imputation which the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) had made upon his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War—that in his selection of Oxford he had been actuated by a desire to conciliate his constituents at Oxford, and that when a Conservative Ministry should be in office he would endeavour to obtain a reversal of the policy.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY explained that his meaning was, that whenever a Conservative Minister of War should be in office he should humbly approach him on this subject precisely as he would the present Minister for War. As to the odious motives spoken of by the noble Earl, they existed only in his own imagination. He did not impute any. Politicians did not generally regard it as an odious thing to conciliate their constituents. At the same time, he thought that a certain degree of reserve should be imposed in such a matter on a War Minister who also happened to be Member for the City of Oxford.

EARL GRANVILLE repeated his opinion that an odious and disgraceful imputation had been made on his right hon. Friend, in suggesting that it was to curry favour with his constituents, and unmindful of the duties of his position, he had made a selection of Oxford as a military centre.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he was of opinion that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) had taken his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) to task with undue severity. He understood his noble Friend to have spoken of that, which, after all, was not an uncommon practice—namely, the natural interchange of what were termed good offices between a constituency and the person who represented them. However, he deprecated a question of that kind, so important to the University, being diverted into that channel. Even assuming Oxford to be the best military centre, the Government were also bound to take into account the representations of those who were responsible for the teaching and the discipline of the University. There never was a Memorial, in which men representing so many different departments of learning concurred in expressing with one voice a more decided opinion, than that in which the conviction was stated that the establishment of a military centre at Oxford was calculated to interfere with the discipline and conduct of the University.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD, as a near resident, must say that the proposed military centre was a subject on which there existed the most complete unanimity, as far as he knew, among the University authorities against fixing its site so near to that great institution. He regretted that no pains appeared to have been taken to answer the objections made on behalf of the University. As a matter of common sense and ordinary experience, he thought the immediate proximity of a military centre was not, on the whole, favourable to morality, or to those interests which a great educational body had at heart.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE explained that the opposition to the establishment of that military centre seemed to be based on the idea that Oxford was about to be turned into a garrison town, whereas in fact there would be there only some 15 officers, 50 or 60 old soldiers, and about 200 recruits under severe training.

LORD REDESDALE held that a representation coming from either of two such great national institutions as Oxford or Cambridge ought to have received the utmost attention from the Government.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY pointed out that there were other Universities in the kingdom besides those of Oxford and Cambridge, which were near military centres, and no harm had come of the connection. He had never heard that Trinity College, Dublin, had suffered from the presence in the Irish capital of a garrison of even some 4,000 or 5,000. A more fantastic notion had never entered the head of any man than the misapprehension entertained by the learned Professors who had signed that Memorial, and he would remind their Lordships that not very many years ago the University of Oxford had an extreme objection to the making of a railway to that city, being persuaded that it would put an end to the discipline of the University.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 27th June, 1873.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [June 26] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (Nos. 4, 5, and 6) * [208, 209, 210]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Nos. 4 and 5) * [211, 212].

Committee—Juries [35]—R.P.

Third Reading—Canada Loan Guarantee * [159]; Court of Queen's Bench (Ireland) (Grand Juries) * [198], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA—RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate the establishment of a better system of retirement allowances for Adjutants of Militia, especially for those who were appointed before February 22, 1871?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (for Mr. CARDWELL) said: No general change is in contemplation with regard to the position of Adjutants of the Militia appointed before February 22, 1871. It is not intended in any way to disturb their position so long as they continue to discharge their duties. Under the Pay and Clothing Act, no adjutant under 60 years of age is entitled to a retiring allowance unless he is invalided. An adjutant who has attained that age is entitled to a retiring allowance varying from three shillings to six shillings a-day, according to his length of service in Army and Militia. This is an addition to any half-pay to which he may be entitled.

METROPOLIS—CHAPTER-HOUSE,
WESTMINSTER ABBEY—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE-COCHRANE asked the First Lord of the Treasury in the absence of the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is intended to complete the Chapter House at Westminster, and to carry out the original design of filling the windows with stained glass, and restoring some of the paintings on the walls?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that he could not at the present time give a complete answer to the Question of his hon. Friend. He could not say whether the representation implied in the question of the original design was a perfectly accurate one or not; but he would certainly admit that the present state of the Chapter House was incomplete, and therefore so far not satisfactory. But the question of the Chapter House, although the obligation of Parliament towards it might be considered distinct, was not altogether inseparable from that of the Abbey. The Dean of Westminster had recently made an explanation to him upon the subject of the Abbey in general, and all he could say to his hon. Friend was that when the Dean had sufficient time to make known to him the whole of his views the subject would receive the careful attention of the Government.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—OVER-LOADING—THE "WESTDALE."
QUESTION.

MR. CARTER (for Mr. PLIMSOLL) asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the case of the "Westdale," a large vessel which left West Hartlepool recently for Stockholm so excessively overloaded with railway iron that her scuppers were rather less than six inches only above the surface of the water as she was lying in the dock; and, if so, whether he intends to take any steps in the matter?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, that the Board of Trade had received no information respecting the vessel to which the hon. Member's Question alluded. It appeared that the crew did not make any complaint with regard to her being overloaded. Had they chosen to make any such complaint, they would have had a right to demand a survey; but, as they had omitted to do so, the Board of Trade had no power to stop the ship.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT.
UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS—THE "DRUID."
QUESTION.

MR. CARTER (for Mr. PLIMSOLL) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government intend to prosecute the owners of the "Druid" for sending that vessel to sea in a state which drew from the Court of Inquiry two expressions of their opinion that the owners were guilty of culpable neglect; and, if not, on what grounds they refrained from a prosecution?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that some time ago he had received from the Board of Trade a statement with reference to the Druid, and acting upon that statement, he had written to the Solicitor of the Treasury on the 11th of June last to direct that a prosecution should be instituted.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE FOLKESTONE MAGISTRATES—CASE OF "COLEMAN v.
SMITHSON."—QUESTION.

MR. F. S. POWELL (for Lord CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to a recent decision of three of the magistrates of Folkestone in the case of James Coleman versus Olive Smithson and her mother; and whether, considering the apparent miscarriage of justice involved in their decision, he purposes calling the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the matter?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that he had received various communications on this subject, including the depositions and reports of the magistrates, and it certainly did not appear to him that any case for his making a representation to the Lord Chancellor in respect to it had been made out. The magistrates, in deciding the case, had merely exercised the discretion which they undoubtedly possessed, and he was not prepared to say that they had exercised that discretion unwisely. If the inhabitants of Folkestone believed that the magistrates had acted unjustly or had shown partiality or gross ignorance in the matter, they could themselves make a representation on the subject to the Lord Chancellor.

DRAINAGE OF LAND (IRELAND)
ACT, 1873—DRAINAGE OF THE RIVERS
SUCK AND SHANNON.—QUESTION.

MAJOR TRENCH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is a fact that an application from proprietors and others, in the country traversed by the River Suck, to form the districts liable to inundation from that river into drainage districts under the Drainage Act of 1863, has been refused by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, acting under the direction of the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury; and, if such is the case, whether he will state to the House on what grounds this application by parties to be permitted to improve their river and drain their lands, at their own expense, has been refused?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER in reply, said, that the application referred to had been refused, upon the ground that the proprietors of the River Suck could only drain their land into the River Shannon, which could not be permitted until some scheme for the drainage of the River Shannon itself had been determined upon.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK rose to enter his protest against the mode adopted by Her Majesty's Government in reference to the Public Business of the House. One of the most important functions that House had to discharge was the voting of public money, and he had always understood the practice to be that Supply should be taken at those times only when there was likely to be a good attendance of Members. Indeed, when he first had the honour of a seat in that House, it rarely happened that Supply was put down for consideration at a morning sitting, and he felt satisfied that if the late Mr. Joseph Hume were now in the House, his voice would have been heard condemning the practice. The result of the present innovation was, that the ancient constitutional right of hon. Members to bring forward grievances on going into Committee of Supply had been altogether abrogated on Monday nights. He wished to have an explanation of the reasons which had led to the adoption of a plan, whereby the power of independent Members to bring forward questions of public interest on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply had been so considerably curtailed. He protested against the practice of putting Supply upon the Paper at a morning sitting, and doing so without giving reasonable notice. He appealed to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) and other hon. Members below the gangway, who professed to be the economists of the present day, whether they approved the plan of discussing questions of Supply in a thin House, many hon. Members being prevented attending morning sittings by professional and commercial engagements. At the present time, taking into consideration the decrepitude of Parliament, he did not think it necessary to take the opinion of the House on the subject, but he must enter his protest against a most objectionable practice.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, that whatever might be the decrepitude of Parliament, he was glad to see that there were no signs of decrepitude in the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, and who seemed to regard the question which he had brought up as a very great grievance. A brief explanation would, however, put the matter in a light different from that in which the hon. Gentleman had presented it to the House. Much that the hon. Gentleman had said, he had heard with great satisfaction. For instance, he had expressed the deep feeling of regret, longing, and reverence with which he looked back upon the memory of Mr. Joseph Hume, and he (Mr. Gladstone) recognized the debt they all owed to Mr. Hume for the patient and valuable, though irksome, work which he most ably and honourably performed in the service of the public. The hon. Gentleman then said there used to be no Order to take Supply at morning sittings, one possible reason for that being that at the time of which the hon. Member spoke there were no such sittings. The reason why Supply had been put upon the Paper was, that the Votes last night had not been taken after a certain hour, and had been postponed. The necessity for taking the Vote at present arose from the fact that the payment of money would be required at the beginning of next week, and it had been thought desirable that the money should be voted and paid regularly. The particular Vote was that relating to the Post Office Packet Service, from which would be omitted the item relating to the Zanzibar service, which had been referred to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—POST OFFICE PACKET SERVICE.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

(1.) £1,105,348, for the Post Office Packet Service; no part of which sum is to be applicable or applied in or towards making any payment in respect of any period subsequent to the 20th day of June 1863 to Mr. Joseph George Churchward, or to any person claiming through or under him by virtue of a certain Contract, bearing date the 26th day of April 1859, made between the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Admiralty (for and on behalf of Her Majesty) of the first part, and the said Joseph George Churchward of the second part, or in or towards the satisfaction of any claim whatsoever of the said Joseph George Churchward, by virtue of that Contract, so far as relates to any period subsequent to the 20th day of June 1863.

Mr. BOWRING asked, Whether it was not high time that the Notice which appeared on the Estimates, providing that no part of the Vote should be applicable to any claims which Mr. Churchward might have in regard to the contract entered into with him for the conveyance of mails, and bearing date the 26th of April, 1859, should no longer be printed?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was necessary to keep the Notice on the Estimates so long as the action which had been commenced by Mr. Churchward was pending in the Exchequer Chamber. It was a precaution which was needed for the protection of the Executive Government and the public interest.

MR. WHITE thought the House was indebted to Mr. Churchward for not withdrawing his action, as the continuance of the Proviso was a formal declaration of the undoubted right of the House to exercise its constitutional control over the Post Office Mail Contracts—a control which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had recently thought fit to treat with contempt. It was notorious that those contracts had been the occasion of much jobbery, much corruption, and needless expenditure. A part of the Vote—namely, £105,000, they were now asked to grant—that relating to the Cunard and Inman contracts, both of which were improvident contracts, made by the last Conservative Government—had been condemned by a Committee of the House, but retained for eight years in consequence of a technical difficulty due to a lack of vigilance and effective control by the House. He wished to know, whether the Postmaster General had given due Notice to the contractors of the termination of several of these contracts, with the view of rendering our ocean mail communication self-supporting; instead of, as now, carried on at a cost in excess of receipts of quite £500,000 per annum.

MR. MONSELL said, it would be possible to a large extent, to get rid of the subsidies for ocean postage upon the termination of existing contracts; and to that end the Post Office had been steadily working, so that within the last two years a gross reduction had been effected to the amount of £45,000 and a net reduction to the amount of £34,000. With regard to pending contracts, notice had been given for the termination of the service between Point de Galle and Sydney, costing £13,000. Notice also had been given with regard to the Brazil and River Plate service amounting to £33,500 a-year; the West India service, amounting to £172,914 a-year; St. Thomas and Puerto Rico, amounting to £1,000 a-year. It was also intended to give notice to terminate the following contracts:—The United States service (Cunard line), which cost £70,000 a-year; the Inman line, £35,000, though neither of those could terminate before December 31, 1876; St. Kitts, Nevis, and Montserrat, £490; and other smaller services. In point of fact, what was aimed at was to get rid of all postal subsidies except for the service to the East, with which it was impossible to dispense altogether. He thought, therefore, he had shown not only that he entirely agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White) as to the principles he had laid down, but that the Department had succeeded in effecting a considerable reduction, and would hereafter be able to make a much larger reduction.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he objected altogether to the restriction contained in the words with which the House of Commons accompanied that Vote. It amounted to a declaration that, whatever might be the decision of a Court of Law upon a certain action brought against the Government, the House of Commons would prevent the Government from paying any compensation which might be awarded to the plaintiff. Such a Resolution was most objectionable. If the Government had a good defence, why not make it?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that as the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General had announced that the Post Office expected to make a considerable saving on contracts for the conveyance of foreign mails, he hoped that some of those savings would be devoted to the improvement of the inland postage service in remote districts, some of which in Ireland were now very ill-served.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member for Galway county (Mr. Mitchell Henry) that the question before the House was the Vote for the Post Office Packet services.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole), said, the House of Commons, which voted the money, was perfectly justified in passing that annual Resolution, directing that the money should not be applied to that particular purpose. He knew nothing of the merits of the Churchward contract, but could not advise the Government to dispense with the condition.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOTE 11, PUBLIC EDUCATION (IRELAND.)

(2.) £452,222, to complete the sum for the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in moving the sum necessary to complete the Vote for National Education in Ireland, said, the House last year had assented to an increase in the Vote, which would amount eventually to £100,000 for increased payments to Irish school teachers, chiefly determined by payments for results. Upon the whole, the increase had given great satisfaction to the teachers, and though he had not yet been able to lay on the Table the Report of the Commissioners of National Education for the past year, which would show the working of the new system, yet he thought he might say that, in the opinion of all the officers of the Board, the results so far had proved highly satisfactory. One difficulty had been experienced in applying the new system. Parliament thought that, while improving the pecuniary position of the teachers, it would be well to put them in a position of greater independence, and greater security of tenure. The grant to a manager of a school was, therefore, made conditional upon his entering into an agreement with the teacher, whereby the latter could only be dismissed after three months' notice or payment of three months' salary, unless upon sufficient cause shown; and the sufficiency of the cause was to be decided by the National Board. Considerable hesitation, however, was shown by school managers in signing that agreement. It was represented to the Government, and with much force, that the National Board were not a body calculated for the exercise of judicial functions, and that their decision must depend mainly upon the report of the Inspectors, who themselves were hardly competent to exercise such functions, not being able to examine witnesses on oath or compel their attendance. An alternative form of agreement was therefore agreed to by the Government, omitting all reference to the National Board, and leaving the teacher, in case of dispute, to his ordinary legal remedy, which would be before the Civil Bills Court, in which the procedure was extremely rapid and cheap. Cases of summary dismissal of teachers were extremely rare in Ireland; but where they did occur, he thought the protection which was meant to be given to the teachers would not be in any degree impaired by the new form of agreement. This alternative agreement had been almost universally accepted by the managers, and the additional salaries payable to the teachers had therefore come into operation in almost every school in Ireland. The progress which had been observed for many years past in the number of schools brought into connection with the Board was still observable, the number now under the Board being 7,060, which was an increase of 130 for the year. There was one circumstance which interfered considerably last year with the efficiency of school instruction in Ireland. In the early part of 1872 the small-pox and other epidemics were very prevalent in Ireland, and many schools had to be temporarily closed, while in others there was a great falling off in the attendance. An unusually inclement season had also diminished the attendance of children. In spite of these influences, however, the decrease in the number of children on the roll was not very serious, amounting only to 11,000 out of 1,010,000, while the average attendance had been reduced by 8,000 out of an average attendance of 335,000.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked, whether any steps had been taken to provide the masters with a superannuation allowance when they became too old and too feeble to discharge their onerous duties and with suitable residences? The noble Marquess, in bringing forward the Estimate last year, promised that it should be taken into consideration, and he hoped something had been done to promote so good and beneficent an object.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was necessary to be cautious, in making another appeal to the liberality of the House of Commons, but he had not lost sight of the points mentioned by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The increased grant for the benefit of the teachers had been voted for a term of three years, and would cost £100,000 a-year, and the Government had expressed a hope that at the expiration of that time a larger contribution would be forthcoming from local resources in aid of national education. When that time came, the questions now raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman might properly be considered.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE thanked the noble Marquess and the Government for doing an act of justice to a deserving body of men, who would thereby be made more comfortable and more contented with their position. The diminished attendance referred to by the noble Marquess, in his opinion, was not only due to the causes mentioned, but in some degree to the decrease which had taken place in the population. He complained of the difficulty of properly considering the vote in the absence of the annual Report of the Board, and expressed his opinion that hereafter it would be impossible in Ireland to do without compulsory education.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £555, to complete the sum for the Office of the Commissioners of Education in Ireland.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee to sit again this day.

JURIES BILL—[BILL 35.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 45 (Overseers and vestry clerks to present their accounts to the courts of revision.)

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 6, to leave out from the word "Act" to the end of the clause.—(Mr. Magniac.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL observed that the matter under discussion had been fully considered in the Select Committee, the large majority being of opinion that the amount being very small it would be better to leave it in this way—if these charges were removed from the local rates this should go with them, and if they remained local burdens, it should remain with them. He did not in the least complain of the discussion which had been raised, nor did he wish to commit the House to the expression of any opinion on a matter which might be said to be sub judice. What he proposed was, to follow the precedent set in the 63rd section of the Irish Land Act, where a number of duties were imposed on existing officers, and it was provided that any additional expense incurred should be paid by the Treasury "out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for that purpose." If that proposal were assented to, and if the Committee would pass the clause in its present form, he would take care on the Report to bring up another clause carrying out that view.

MR. LOPES thought the hon. and learned Gentleman's present proposal was very satisfactory, and certainly much better than the original proposal to throw the expense upon the rates.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 46 to 49, inclusive, agreed to.

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Clause 50 struck out of the Bill.

Clause 51 agreed to.

Clause 52 (Jury in trials for murder to be of twelve).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that was the only matter on which he thought he should have occasion to trouble the Committee with any remarks. He proposed to amend the clause by adding, in line 28, after "jurors," these words, "of whom four shall be special and eight shall be common jurors." He would take that opportunity of remarking that the Bill, as it left the Select Committee, was, in his view, defective in one respect, and made certain alterations in the composition of juries in others. It did not provide what he had exceedingly at heart, that was, to ascertain the relative proportions of common and special jurors upon every ordinary jury. The Bill, as it left the Select Committee, did make this considerable alteration—it provided that so far as treason and murder were concerned there should be 12 jurors to try a case, but in other cases the number of jurors should be reduced to seven, and there were also some Amendments inserted on the subject of unanimity. He had not altered his own judgment as to having the number of jurors fixed at seven in ordinary cases. He believed that that number would in general be quite sufficient, and the labour of jurors would be much lessened by reducing the number to seven. Twelve might be an ancient number, and people were fond of old associations and traditions; and it was all very well for hon. Gentlemen in that House, and for Judges, to say that they preferred that the number should be 12; but then those Gentlemen had not the liability to serve on juries. To his mind it was of great importance that juries should consist only of persons who were willing to undertake the duty, and that it should not be so burdensome that they would try to escape from it. He had, however, received so many communications from different quarters against any change in the number of 12 that he was disposed to give way. He had also solicited the opinion of the Common Law Judges, and had received from the Lord Chief Justice a statement that they were unanimously of opinion, and strongly so, that there was no cause for diminishing the number of jurors constituting a jury, and, further, that there would be an objection to having 12 for one kind of jury and seven for the others. That being so, and having also heard strong opinions expressed to the same effect from various other quarters, he had thought it better to yield the point, and therefore he should himself move to amend the Bill by striking out that part of it which proposed to reduce the number of jurors to seven. It was with considerable reluctance he had yielded this point, because he knew how irksome it was under the present system for so many jurors to be required to attend. He had, however, thought it better to give way in reference to this matter, which was not of itself of vital importance, rather than to risk the success of the measure. He had also communicated with the learned Common Law Judges on the subject of the unanimity now required of jurors in finding their verdicts, and he had ascertained that although they were themselves unanimous with regard to retaining the present number of jurymen on the jury, they were divided on the subject of the necessity of unanimity on the part of the jurors in finding their verdict. He did not disguise his opinion that the time for requiring absolute unanimity on the part of jurors had gone by, and that it would be more reasonable to accept the verdict of a certain definite majority. It was not right that some unreasonable or ill-conditioned jurymen should have the power, by standing out against his 11 colleagues, to cause the whole expense of a protracted trial to be thrown away, or to enable a notorious criminal to escape from justice. Holding that view, therefore, he should take the opinion of the Committee upon the point, which, however, he did not regard either as being of vital importance to the Bill. He now came to a point which he had very greatly at heart, and on which, in his opinion, the value of the Bill very largely depended. In his view, it was most desirable that the special jury and the common jury elements should be represented in a certain definite and ascertained proportion on all juries. The main objections that he had heard raised against his proposition were these—that the different classes in this country would not like to be fused together in a jury-box; that there was a want of constitutional precedent for the proposed change; that the influence of the special jurors would dominate and overcome the freedom of will of the common jurors; that the result would be to create class antipathies in the jury-box, and that difference in the amounts paid to the jurymen would be to create an invidious distinction between them. The last objection he proposed to meet by rendering the payment to all jurors on each jury the same. As a matter of history, it was well known to every lawyer that up to 100 years ago all classes were fused together in cases where the sheriff was instructed to summon a "good jury," an expression that was equivalent to our present "special jury." The technical distinction between common and special jurors was a thing of yesterday, and during the last two or three years since the Act of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield) had come into operation, both classes of jurors had been placed on the same list, and in fact he had been informed by Mr. Erle, that on a recent occasion, in the Court of Common Pleas, for several days common-jury cases had been tried wholly, or almost wholly, by gentlemen who were special jurors. There was very high authority in favour of the fusion of the two classes upon juries. The Common Law Commissioners reported in that direction in 1853; there was a similar Report in 1860; and the Judicature Commission in 1869 approved what had been said in the two previous Reports. It was true that those bodies had expressed themselves in favour of an indiscriminate admixture of both classes of jurors, but it would be found to work much better if a definite and ascertained proportion of each class were placed on the jury. In fact, it would be almost impossible to insure that there should be a fair proportion of each class on every jury, unless something else than mere chance were to be relied upon. For instance, in Kent there were 15,200 common jurymen and only 400 special jurymen; and how was it possible under such circumstances that the presence of even one special jurymen could be insured in each jury if the jurors were taken by chance from a general list? In St. Pancras the proportion of special jurors was still less. On the other hand, in the City of London, the greater proportion of the jurymen consisted of merchants, whose time would be utterly wasted if 12 of them were required to determine some small common jury cause. In order that the tribunal should be one which would be most likely to do justice between persons of all classes and engaged in every variety of business who might appeal to juries in order to the settlement of questions at issue between them, it was of great importance that there should be a definite proportion of jurors in civil and criminal cases, and in some criminal cases—cases of felony—it was necessary that they should, as far as possible, have the higher class of mind to investigate and discriminate on the evidence. The prisoner, in cases of felony, had the right to challenge any man being placed upon the jury to try him for such reasons as he might be supposed to entertain. It might be thought that in some cases prisoners should be tried by a particular class of men, but in a butcher's case it would not be desirable to have a jury of butchers. He could not think how there could be any objection to making the standard of the jury certain and definite, instead of taking the jury haphazard. It had been said there were objections to his proposal. Now, what were they?

It was not impossible to have definite proportions in the composition of the jury. A jury composed of classes it was said would be discordant; but why should it be supposed that men going into a jury-box should enter into it with discordant feelings? He thought that class tests should be given up. If they would look at the jury list of the parish of St. Pancras, they would see that juries were indiscriminately entered in that list. He found in a page which he now opened haphazard the name of a photographer, that of a butcher, that of an artist, and those of men of the grade of society from which special juries were drawn. It was generally agreed, he believed, that it would be desirable to have a mixture of classes in the ranks of jurors, and he wished to know, therefore, why the relative proportions of the different classes should not be definitely fixed so that there might be one regular standard, as far as that was possible of attainment. He did not for a moment believe in the assertion that the fusion of classes would tend to discord in the jury-box, for it was a general aspersion upon all society to suggest that a jury would fail to do justice between litigants simply because they belonged to different ranks in society. The experience of three years had shown that none of the evils anticipated from the course he suggested were in the least likely to arise, and therefore he moved to amend the section by inserting words to provide that in all trials of civil or criminal issues the jury should consist of 12 persons, of whom four should be "special" and eight "common" jurors.

Amendment proposed, in line 28, after "jurors," insert "of whom four shall be special and eight shall be common jurors."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Mr. LOPES said, the question now before the Committee, as he understood it was, whether there should be composite juries, that was to say juries composed of mixed classes. Now, that was a most important question, and a proposal to which he was most decidedly opposed. The Bill had been most carefully discussed in a Committee upstairs, of which he had the honour to be a Member, and a division was taken on this question; and in his recollection of that division the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, who now brought forward this proposal, stood alone, every single Member of that Committee voting against him. Those Gentlemen were almost all of them lawyers, who had had much professional experience of the working of the law and its administration in Courts of Justice. The Judges, too, had had some parts of the Bill submitted to them for the expression of their opinions. Why had they not been asked to pronounce upon that particular part of it? [The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Bill was submitted generally to the Judges, but they had not expressed an opinion on this part of it.] With regard to the question of "unanimity" in the verdict of the jury, the hon. and learned Gentleman said the opinion of the Judges had been taken, and that the majority of the Judges were opposed to any alteration. The number of which the jury should consist, and whether the jury should be unanimous were questions of great importance. He understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that he had abandoned his desire to reduce the number of juries. Now, on that question he might say that he had often himself, in that House, expressed his opinion that while in criminal cases the number should be 12; in civil cases it would be more convenient both to the jurors themselves and the public generally that the number should be seven. They had precedents for the smaller number in the constitution of County Court juries which consisted of five members; but as the hon. and learned Gentleman had abandoned his proposal to reduce the existing number of jurors he (Mr. Lopes) should not say anything more on that part of the Bill. He came now to the question of "unanimity" of juries in their verdicts, and he, for one, was in favour of unanimity, because he believed that its abolition would never give satisfaction. With regard to a single juror standing out and no verdict in consequence being come to, he believed it to be a very rare case, and there were occasions when the single juror was right. But of this he was quite certain, the necessity for that "unanimity" led to a thorough investigation and consideration of the case by all the jurors, which its abandonment would fail to secure. He was aware that it was said that unanimity was not required in the Scotch jury system; but in Scotland there was an intermediate verdict of "not proven," which destroyed the analogy. With regard to the proposal of "composite" juries, he held that it was impossible that such a composition in a jury could give satisfaction. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that, in his opinion, such a composition as he advocated would not cause discord among jurors, but he (Mr. Lopes) believed the contrary. And he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he himself had not seen cases where a tales had been prayed, and common jurors called into the box to make up a special jury, in which discord was manifested in their deliberations, the special jurymen taking one side the common jurymen the other? Take the case of an action to enforce farming covenants in a lease; was it likely the special jurymen and the common would entertain the same opinion? They might take other cases—that, for instance, of a gentleman and his tenant serving on the same jury. Was it not likely that the gentleman might exercise an influence on his tenant; that a good customer sitting on the same jury, with his tradesman might also exercise some influence? He maintained that in the composition of such a jury they would have the elements of discord, and in many cases no verdict at all; and he was bound to say that, all through the profession the feeling was generally against the proposal of the Attorney General, which he hoped the Committee would reject.

Mr. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, composite juries were an innovation upon the constitutional doctrine that a man should be tried by his peers. If two classes were expressly empanelled upon a jury, in certain proportions, and if the four special jurymen were ticketed as men of superior intelligence, who were to enlighten the rest of the jury, the result must be antagonism between the two classes; nor would rating at £100 a-year be any sufficient test of the higher qualification which a special jurymen was supposed to possess. The real question was, did the present system of 12 men indiscriminately selected give confidence to the people that they would have a fair trial according to the laws of the country? He maintained that it did. In the case of the gas stokers, for instance, though there were complaints of the severity of the Judge and of the state of the law, there was no complaint of the verdict of the jury. But if we did anything to weaken the confidence of the people in trial by jury we would damage the law itself. He hoped that the Committee would reject the proposal by so large a majority as to show that these theoretical or speculative opinions of professional men had no influence on the House of Commons.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, his hon. Friend who had just sat down seemed not to be content with the lawyers, even when they agreed with him. With respect to the retention of 12 jurors, he (Mr. G. Hardy) agreed in it, because it was a tribunal that had given satisfaction to the people. He thought the principle of unanimity should be retained, because in criminal cases there was no appeal; but if that unanimity was abolished, the right of appeal must be established. It would be far better to retain unanimity than to introduce the difficulties that must arise in the establishment of majorities. In civil cases the parties were able by consent to try with a less number than twelve, and that right should be retained. As to the composition of the jury, what he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to propose was, that they should have two lists from which to select the juries—namely a common and a special list, and that eight should be taken from the common jury list and four from the special jury list.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL explained that there would be but one jury list; but that the special jurors would be distinguished from the others by having the letter S attached to their names, or in some similar way.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that was practically having two lists. But see what enormous hardships would arise from such a system. According to his hon. and learned Friend, in Kent there were 15,200 common, and only 400 special jurors; in other words, the special jurors were only in the proportion of one in 38 to the common jurors. Therefore, if four special jurors were chosen for eight common jurors, the former would have to serve 19 times oftener than the latter. Now, that was a great hardship, and very unfair. If a distinction such as that proposed were made, it would shake confidence in the mind of the people in the tribunal. He quite agreed that the more mixed the general jury list the better, but the selection of the jury should be left to chance, and not to the officer of the Court; otherwise, if there was a division of eight to four it would be said that the four were the gentlemen's jury and the eight the common men's jury. We all knew what "good juries," meant in former times, and if the attempt was made now to get "good juries," it would be said that it was done in order to get "good verdicts," which very often would be far from satisfactory to the people.

MR. WEST was of opinion that if they were to have a jury selected from the different classes, the effect would be to shake all confidence in trial by jury. He was unable to understand how the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General's proposal could be carried out, if the right of challenge was retained; because the four specials selected by the officer of the Court would in all probability be continually challenged. They were embarking by that Bill on a most dangerous course, and the Committee should well consider the proposition, before they adopted that which would destroy the confidence which now existed in trial by jury. They were trying to raise the standard of the jury; but in his opinion they were going too far. He had heard observations made about the poor man's feelings; one thing he would remark, that the poor man would not be "tried by his peers," but by a class above him; and if they did not take care in their legislation they would cause great injury. He wanted to know what was the object of this proposed change. Were the people of this country dissatisfied with the existing system of the trial by jury? He did not believe that they were, and he warned the House not to give way to such a proposed change as that now under consideration. It was already observed that the principle that the poor man should be tried by his peers was violated at present, and care should be taken lest dissatisfaction should be created in the poorer classes because they were tried by persons superior to them in wealth.

MR. GREGORY said, there could be no doubt they had arrived at a very important part of the Bill, and they should give it their most serious consideration.

With regard to criminal cases the feeling of the country was that the number of the jury should continue 12, as at present. He very much regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had departed from his original proposal, for with regard to civil cases, he (Mr. Gregory) was of opinion that a jury of "seven" would give satisfaction, and what the reason was for maintaining the number 12 he really could not understand. There was no doubt that there had been great scandals in the administration of justice from requiring unanimity in juries, the effect being to enable one or two obstinate men to stand out, and either to prevent a verdict being returned or enforce a compromise. He was of opinion that a jury of seven with a verdict of six would give general satisfaction as regarded the plan of mixed juries. With all respect for the hon. and learned Gentleman, he did not think that this scheme would work satisfactorily. He (Mr. Gregory) was in favour of maintaining the distinction between special and common jurymen, and he could not help thinking that in mixing the two classes together they would create feelings of jealousy, and that in many cases the higher class of jurors might use influence to induce the humbler class of jurymen to give a larger amount of damages than they might otherwise be disposed to award. There was another point connected with the subject which he wished to refer to. He was of opinion that in cases of murder the jurors should be selected from the special jury list. It need be remembered that there could be no reversal of the sentence in these cases after execution, and that they frequently turned upon circumstantial or scientific evidence of much nicety, and requiring much discrimination. The result was that an ignorant or incompetent jury was obliged to rely altogether upon the direction of the Judge, and the verdict became his instead of theirs.

Mr. GOLDSMID thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would do well to consider the suggestions made as to the composition of his proposed jury class, and the method of selection of the jurors; for, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford had pointed out, if the mixed system were adopted special jurors would in Kent be called upon to serve 19 times for every once that a common juror had to serve. This would aggravate many times the unfairness which was now complained of. Moreover, he (Mr. Goldsmid) saw no reason to alter the composition of the jury, for the tendency in this country at present was to raise the standard of education in the class from which common juries were selected; and that being so, there did not appear to him to be any occasion to change the form and character of the tribunal of trial by jury. He was inclined also to think it was often more through the fault of counsel than of the jurymen that the latter did not understand a case. He knew that in the county of Kent, common jurymen had shown that they understood the questions they had to try, and as to the hon. and learned Gentleman's remedy, it would be worse than the disease he spoke of. He felt that they would by the Bill create a class distinction which would produce bad effects, and he hoped for those reasons that the hon. and learned Gentleman would consider the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) and consent to the clause being withdrawn.

Mr. FLOYER was of opinion that if the clause were carried out it would be productive of great dissatisfaction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) had given special reasons why the clause should not be accepted, and his suggestions were worthy of the serious consideration of the Committee. He (Mr. Floyer) did not see any necessity for raising the character of the jurors. His experience in quarter sessions had led him to the conclusion that the present juries were on the whole satisfactory. He took exception to the proposed change in the composition of juries, and considered that the hardship which the fixing of definite proportions of each class must impose on the special jurors would be intolerable, while the line of distinction which it was proposed to draw between the two classes must prove seriously detrimental to the interests of justice.

Mr. WALTER was in favour of the standard of juries being improved, but not through the artificial method proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. He would put the matter to his hon. and learned Friend in this way. There was a great demand among certain classes of the people for the introduction of "working men" into the House. Nobody, he thought, would object to the presence of one or two working men in the House; but if it were proposed that a definite number, say 40 working men, should be Members of that House, could anything more fatal to such a scheme be proposed? Or suppose it was proposed that so many country gentlemen, lawyers, doctors, and merchants should be Members of that House, could anything be suggested more condemnatory of such a plan? He, therefore, hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press the clause, which would force upon the Committee to say that there should be an artificial proportion of what was called the more educated class to the ordinary class of jurors.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could answer the objections which had been made to the clause, but he would give way and not trouble the Committee. His fate before the Select Committee was to stand alone on the question, and it would seem that his fate had pursued him into the House itself.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JAMES pointed out that since the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General did not insist on the point, the object of the clause otherwise was already provided for by the Common Law, and he would therefore suggest that the clause, being superfluous, should be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Clause struck out accordingly.

Clauses 53 and 54 negatived.

Clause 55 (Special juries to be of special jurors only).

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS moved at the end of the clause the insertion of the words—

"Provided also, That the existing right of either party to pray a talies shall not be affected by this clause."

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, the proposed Amendment was unnecessary, since Clause 93 of the Bill already effected the same thing.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,"

MR. STAVELEY HILL moved its omission altogether, as its insertion would simply leave the law exactly where it was at present.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, but for some clause of the kind the law would not stand as it did now.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY pointed out that an inconsistency would arise if the clause were passed, since the Committee had already decided that there should not be a composite jury of special jurors with common jurors without the consent of both parties. Supposing the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General himself were to try the question with that Bill before him, and one of the parties prayed a talies. His hon. and learned Friend might then turn to the former part of the Bill and say—"You have no right to a special jury with a common juror upon it, without the consent of both parties. I, for one of the parties, do not consent."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Bill enacted for the first time that the ordinary common jury should consist of both common and special jurors. That being the case, he had thought that it might be said—now that special and common jurors were to serve in turn together on the same jury, that the old special jury was abolished; and therefore the present clause was required.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 165; Noes 110: Majority 55.

Clause 56 struck out.

Clause 57 (Courts empowered to order the attendance of jurors).

MR. WEST pointed out that the plan of selecting jurors from the list alphabetically would in large counties like Yorkshire and Lancashire have the effect of causing great inconvenience. The present plan was the best, as it enabled jurors to be drawn from the neighbourhoods in which the cases were to be tried, instead of absolute strangers being drawn from distant points at great and unnecessary personal inconvenience.

MR. STANHOPE agreed with the last speaker, and pointed out that in Yorkshire, the county from which he came, the operation of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General's proposal would produce endless confusion and inconvenience.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that even in large counties like Lancashire and Yorkshire there was but one Sheriff and one jury list, and he presumed that if his proposal was acceded to the particular jurisdictions would, as now, be carefully attended to.

MR. ANDERSON said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had dropped out of the Bill almost all of its provisions as far as they had gone, and in order to enable the Government to consider the propriety of dropping the measure altogether, he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Anderson.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Motion.

MR. LOPES hoped the Motion would not be pressed. There yet remained in the Bill excellent machinery for regulating the incidence of service upon jurors, and he hoped it would be proceeded with.

MR. ANDERSON said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich (Mr. West), that, under the Bill as it stood, considerable hardship might be inflicted on jurors in Lancashire and Yorkshire.

MR. LOPES expressed a hope that the machinery to be used in summoning jurors would be so constructed that the anticipated hardship might be avoided.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL reminded the Committee that the question did not arise under the clause they were considering.

MR. WEST said, that when he drew attention to the subject the other evening, he was told by the Attorney General that the question could be best considered under the present clause.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed that if better machinery than that proposed by the Bill were not provided, there would be so much dissatisfaction created by the measure that it would have to be amended next year.

MR. PHILIPS hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would take the suggestion thrown out by hon. Members into consideration.

MR. STANHOPE said, that under the Bill the three Ridings of Yorkshire would be treated as one county.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that such was certainly not intended to be the case. He would take the entire question raised into consideration so as to secure that the system of rotation might not in operation involve the hardship or inconvenience which hon. Members seemed to apprehend, but which he failed to see that it could. If any plan could be devised by which the issues to be tried at a particular place should be tried by juries drawn from around that place he should be glad to accept it.

MR. RYLANDS remarked that the entirely new system introduced by the Bill would be felt most onerous in its application to that part of the country with which he was connected, and would make the Government very unpopular.

MR. FLOYER called attention to the fact that this question would be naturally raised on the 65th section, which provided that the summoning officers should take the names as they appeared in rotation on the list. If the Committee discussed subsequent clauses beforehand, and then discussed them afterwards all over again, the House might sit till next year.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 58 to 60, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 61 (Cause may be made triable by special jury by order).

MR. GREGORY moved in page 17, line 29, at end add—

"and further, that the court or a judge in such case as they or he may think fit, may order that a special jury be struck according to the practice in force before the passing of 'The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852,' and such order shall be a sufficient warrant for striking such special jury and making a panel thereof for the trial of the particular cause."

A case of considerable importance might arise in which it might be desirable to have some commercial men upon the jury, and there might be no such men in the panel, and a discretionary power ought to be given to the Judge to strike a special jury under the old system in such an event.

MR. LOPES hoped the Amendment would be agreed to. The old process was preserved in the Act of 1870, and there could be no objection raised to it, as it could only be carried out, under the proposed Amendment, by leave of the Judge.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL thought it would be useful to preserve the power and therefore had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 62 and 63 agreed to Clause 64 (Jurors to serve in other courts than those for which they were summoned).

MR. GREGORY moved in page 18, line 15, before "Every," insert—

"No juror summoned in any civil cause shall be required to attend upon his summons for more than two consecutive days unless he shall have been sworn and empannelled upon some jury for the trial of a cause."

He was not anxious to keep to the two days; they might be two or three; but he thought a man ought not to be kept day after day without being empannelled. Unless he was empannelled within a reasonable time the juror should be discharged.

MR. LOPES thought such an Amendment would be very desirable, if it could be carried out, but there would be great difficulties in its way. If the Amendment were adopted and the first case in the list lasted for two whole days the Judge might find himself without a single juror left to try the remaining cases. The question was one which ought to be left to the discretion of the Judge and the associate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not assent to the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 65 'All jurors to be summoned by the sheriff only).

Motion made, and Question "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again;"—(Mr. Assheton), put and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

And it being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its sitting.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

CHURCH RATES (SCOTLAND).

RESOLUTION.

MR. M'LAREN, in rising to move—

"That the levying of local rates and assessments on lands and houses for the erection and repair of Churches and Mansees in Scotland, for the supposed benefit of a minority of the population, is unjust in principle, and the cause of great dissatisfaction amongst the people; and looking to the hopes held out by the Government on the subject, this House is of opinion that a Bill should be introduced by the Government during the present Session of Parliament, to remove the existing grievance."

said, that the Motion of which he had given Notice was to the effect, that the House was of opinion that Her Majesty's Government should during the present Session introduce a Bill for the abolition of rates for the building and repair of churches and mansees in Scotland. He should like the House to understand that the people of Scotland were asking no peculiar privileges. Similar rates were abolished in Ireland a very long time ago, and in England they were abolished within the last few years. In England, the rates were not exactly abolished out and out, but the power of distrainment in order to compel their payment was taken from the Church. In like manner, all the people of Scotland desired was to be placed on a footing of equality with their English brethren; not that church rates should be peremptorily abolished by Act of Parliament, but that the power of distraining for church rates should be abolished. The people of Scotland thought that in all parts of the Empire equal justice should be done, and that what was found a good law for England could not possibly be found other than a good law for Scotland. There was a distinction to be drawn between the church rates as they were levied in England and church rates levied in Scotland—namely, that although in England the burden of the church rates fell upon land, yet they were, in the first instance, paid by the occupiers. In Scotland, the rate was not disguised in that manner, because it was directly payable by the landowner. The hon. Member having read a Petition of the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, was proceeding, when—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after Nine o'clock till Monday next.

ARMY—RECRUITS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, before you proceed to the Business on the Paper, I beg that you will permit me to make a statement of a somewhat personal character. I am the more anxious to do so, because I think that in the interest of the public service it is right that no false impression should be allowed to exist for any length of time respecting any matter which affects the efficiency of such an important branch of the public service as that of the Army. Personally, a high official like myself feels some discomfort, when anything is publicly stated of a questionable character in his Department which is not explained as soon as possible. Under these circumstances, I venture to throw myself upon your Lordships' consideration, whilst I as briefly as possible state to your Lordships what really has occurred, and how far I am mixed up with it. Some little time ago the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) moved for Returns of chest measurements of soldiers recruited since 1870. That Return has since then been presented to your Lordships, and you have had it, no doubt, in your hands. A few days ago a letter appeared in one of the newspapers, in which reference was made to that Return, and a question regarding it has been asked in "another place." From that letter, and from what has occurred in the other House, it would appear that the Return had been designedly prepared, with the object of creating a false impression in this House and before the country. I do not for a moment suppose that any of your Lordships or the country imagines that I, or any officer in my Department, would wilfully put forward any erroneous Return; and I think, when I explain the circumstances, your Lordships will exculpate me, and the officers acting under me, of any intention of doing anything beyond carrying out the wishes and directions of this House. The preparation of all military Parliamentary Papers rests with the Adjutant General's department, and a branch of that department, under the authority of the Inspector General of Recruiting, was directed to prepare the Return. Several of the points connected with this Return were of sufficient importance to be referred to me, and I urged that no delay should take place in its preparation. The Deputy Adjutant General, General Armstrong, a most efficient and zealous officer, on whom, in the absence of my gallant Friend, Sir Richard Airey, the whole duties of the Adjutant General's department have for some time devolved, came to me one morning, and incidentally stated that in preparing the Return it had been found that several regiments had put down under one column, as not coming up to the proper measurement—men who, in his opinion, ought to have been given under another, because, as far as the records showed, they were of the proper measurement. He thought it incorrect that they should be returned as under regulation chest measurement, and for that reason he did not consider the Return as accurate. It was certainly irregular that men should have been passed as being of the regulation chest measurement who were now returned as not being so, and I at once said that if the Regulations had been properly carried out, I did not know how such a thing could have occurred, and that it was only fair and right that the Return should be prepared according to Regulations. From this, it followed that if the Regulations had not been observed, the Return could not be handed in, except with explanations. In fact, I never contemplated that officers when called upon to carry out the Regulations, should be asked to sign anything but what was strictly in accordance with them. Now, when recruits are enlisted—and I presume the reference is entirely to that—they are measured by the superintending officer in the presence of the medical officer, and that measurement has to be verified by the field officer in charge of a recruiting district. When the latter is satisfied that the two officers have taken the proper measurement, it is inserted in pencil on the attestation paper, which is sent down with the recruit to his regiment, and it is the duty of the commanding officer of the regiment to verify the measurement. If the recruit does not come up to it, he is bound to report it for my information, and to ask whether the man is to be retained; so that it will be seen that it is the commanding officer, and not the surgeon, who would be held responsible for the measurement. The Regulations require a special report of any deficiency in chest measurement to be made to the Adjutant General, for submission to the Commander-in-Chief as to the final disposal of the man. Nothing can be clearer than the Regulations; yet it appears that the men to whom reference is now made have been sent to regiments, and that the regiments now do not accept the chest measurement sent down with them, but have never reported the circumstance to the Recruiting department or the Adjutant General. Here, I venture to say, a great mistake has been made. I think I can assure your Lordships that nothing more than a mistake has been made. I do not think that there is any reason to suppose that intentional misrepresentation has been attempted; I do not believe that it is anything more than an ordinary office mistake. When the matter was brought to my knowledge, I certainly understood it was only a few men who had been irregularly accounted for in that way, and when, therefore, the Deputy Adjutant General told me he thought it was only fair they should be returned as of the proper measurement, on the ground that it was only just and according to common sense that men who might have been two years with regiments, without their measurements having been questioned, should not be disturbed, I acceded to it; but it was never expected or intended that officers should be asked to sign an incorrect Return, and if any officers chose to say men were not of the proper measurement of course it was our duty to inquire into it. It turns out, however, that a considerable number of men are of a different measurement from the proper one. I never saw the Return or the Circular that went out in my name on the subject, and I never intended any Circular to go out. I thought it was a mere ordinary correction, which must frequently occur in an office. Had I been aware how the Return was prepared, I should not have authorized what has been done. As it is, I must throw myself on the indulgence of your Lordships and the country. It is utterly impossible for the Commander-in-Chief to have knowledge of every detail, and until I saw the letter I had not the remotest suspicion that there was anything wrong in the Return. To show your Lordships how very delicate this measurement is, I may mention that I have seen a letter from the surgeon of a regiment, who says that in measuring recruits he is careful to get the minimum circumference of the chest, and measures after expiration, and before inspiration has commenced, and he always finds his measurement less than that pencilled on the attestation sheets by two, three, and sometimes even four inches. When measurements are reported as incorrect, we invariably send down and verify them; but if officers do not report, and do not attend to the details which ought to regulate these proceedings, an unfortunate mistake of this sort may occur. So far as I and the officers who made the Return are concerned, there was no intention of doing anything but what was in accordance with the facts, with the Regulations, and with the objects of the noble Duke in asking for the Return. I hope you will permit me to add, that if there is any subject which would specially attract my attention it is recruiting. Whenever recruiting is bad nobody is so immediately interested in the matter as the Commander-in-Chief, and I should be the last man to approve men being allowed to enlist who are not what they ought to be.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I am certain that you have all listened with much satisfaction to the straightforward statement just made by His Royal Highness. It is only what might have been expected from His Royal Highness, and it is not necessary for me, therefore, to say anything with regard to that statement. The subject to which the illustrious Duke has referred is, however, one of very great importance, and one upon which I should like to have an opportunity of saying a few words; but as no Notice has been given of the introduction of the subject, it is proper for me perhaps that I should give Notice that I shall to-morrow evening call attention to the Return respecting chest measurements which I have moved for.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(The Earl Russell.)

(NO. 147.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."

(The Earl Russell.)

[No noble Lord rising to address the House, the LORD CHANCELLOR put the Question, and declared that The Not-Contents have it. But it immediately appeared that Earl Russell had intended to make his address to the House on the Question and not on proposing the Motion, and was unconscious that the Question had been put and negatived. The proceeding was, by general consent, treated as a nullity, and is not entered on the Minutes or Journals of the House.]

EARL RUSSELL said, he wished their Lordships to consider seriously, not so much the Bill he had introduced, as the question to which it related. In 1851 he brought into the House of Commons a Bill for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantancy of Ireland, and the transfer of the duties to a Secretary of State, a measure which was supported by Sir Robert Peel and other distinguished men. The arrangement which then existed, dating from the Union, was that the Lord Lieutenant communicated with the Cabinet, especially with the Home Secretary, as to the state of the country, and the measures which appeared necessary. Afterwards an arrangement was made by which the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant communicated with the Home Secretary. That Sir Robert Peel described as a very clumsy arrangement, for it gave the Chief Secretary, who was naturally and properly a subordinate of the Lord Lieutenant, the power of consulting his Colleagues in the Cabinet, and in fact of transmitting orders to his superior. Moreover, the duty which would be performed by a Secretary of State in England, and which should be performed by a Secretary of State in Ireland, was not performed at all. In August last a riot occurred at Belfast in which 152 persons were wounded and received hospital treatment, one of the constabulary being killed and 73 members of that force wounded. 12 of them very seriously. Upwards of 250 houses, moreover, were wrecked or injured, 257 persons claiming compensation to the amount of £14,000, and 837 families were compelled by force to leave their dwellings. These facts were stated at the Assizes by Mr. Justice Lawson, who went on to say—

"Now, I have no hesitation in stating that this meeting constituted an unlawful assembly. A great number of men marching in procession, many of them armed, carrying disloyal and treasonable emblems, is calculated to create terror and alarm, and is an unlawful assembly, even though there be no opposing force with whom there may likely be a collision. It was the duty of those charged with the preservation of the public peace to take steps to prevent this procession from marching, to require them to disperse, and, if necessary, to disperse them, and to arrest the ringleaders and bring them to justice. This procession was, nevertheless, allowed to take place: it met at Carlisle Circus; its character was then apparent: even there, at 10 o'clock in the morning, the first indications of riot presented themselves; stones were exchanged between the processionists and those of the Protestant party. Nevertheless, the procession was allowed to march to Haughstown. A meeting was held there; fire-arms were frequently discharged, and one man lost his life by the accidental discharge of a pistol, according, at least, to the verdict of a coroner's jury; and this armed body of seditious persons was allowed to return in the evening to Belfast, to parade their emblems of disloyalty, and to flaunt their banners before the eyes of the loyal and well-affected subjects of the Queen. In the evening, on its return, an engagement took place. The spirit of evil was thoroughly roused, and then arose a series of riots and battles which raged for several days."

Mr. Justice Lawson added that the assembly was unlawful at common law, and that if, at the moment its unlawful character was placed beyond a doubt, it had been dispersed and the ringleaders arrested, the riots would not have happened. The omission to take this course was a serious neglect of duty. In England such a procession would have been dealt with summarily and by way of precaution. The parties intending to take part in it would have been warned that the proceedings were unlawful, troops would have been sent to prevent the procession, and the leaders would have been arrested and held to trial. That was the course pursued when he (Earl Russell) had the honour of being Home Secretary and the late Lord Campbell was Attorney General. Orders were sent to General Sir Charles Napier, who was commanding officer in Lancashire, where an illegal procession and riot were apprehended. Both were prevented. Sir Charles Napier told him afterwards that he always on such occasions ordered out twice as many troops as might be required. Had that been done at Belfast, the embittered feeling and the great mischief which followed the riots to which he referred would have been prevented. Had such a riot occurred in England, caused by similar neglect of duty on the part of the Home Secretary, loud complaints would have been made. He knew no greater duty of a Government than that of protecting life and property, and it was a serious thing if the Government of Ireland were unable to discharge that duty, and viewed it with indifference. He believed, therefore, that the substitution of a Secretary of State for the Lord Lieutenant would be a much more effective and satisfactory way of dealing with Ireland. Another evil prevalent in Ireland was the difficulty of convicting persons for murders and agrarian offences. In many cases the criminals could not be traced, and even when they were brought to trial there were generally on the jury one or two of their near connections and friends, who took care that there should be such disagreement that the offenders escaped conviction. In a recent case a man who, in the opinion of persons of sound and temperate judgment, was a murderer was acquitted, and immediately went off to America, though he believed it was not true that the Government gave him the means of doing so. In the clearest case of assassination there was very little chance of obtaining a unanimous verdict, and in one case a Judge, convinced by the evidence that two women had been guilty of murder, proposed to the jury to find them guilty of manslaughter. That conviction was secured, and they were sentenced to penal servitude for life. He proposed in his Bill that, when a jury tried a case which was not capital, the verdict of eight jurors out of the 12 should be sufficient. Certainty of punishment was far more effective than severity of punishment. There was also the question of education in Ireland, which required the attention of the Imperial Parliament. There was, in his opinion, no longer in Ireland that wholesome system of education which used to prevail. For instance, it was well known that the Protestant and Roman Catholic Archbishops of Dublin, Dr. Whately and Dr. Murray, agreed as to the piety and utility of certain books for the use of children; but the Board of Education had since excluded those books, and, according to Dr. Macaulay's Ireland in 1872, the whole power was vested in Cardinal Cullen and those who followed him, while, instead of books of a pure and simple religious character, many of the books used were pervaded with the grossest superstition. So far from wishing the Education Commissioners to retain office, he believed it would be a great blessing to Ireland, and more especially a blessing to England, if they all resigned. He had no doubt, as urged in defence of his vote by a Friend of his, the Chief Baron, that the Board had always replaced a parish priest who had been manager by another parish priest without inquiry, but such precedents involved the management of schools not by the men best fitted to be managers, but by the men whom the Roman Catholics deemed fittest to be priests. It was not the business of Parliament to consider who were fit to say mass, but when voting £400,000 from the money of the three kingdoms for Irish education they were bound to inquire who were fit persons to receive that money. One man might be fittest for parish priest and another for the management of a school. He proposed that any person who thought himself wronged might appeal to the English Committee of Council on Education. He next came to the question whether the Government of Ireland as at present conducted was a fit

Government for the Queen of England. His conviction was that it was a Government conducted entirely according to the orders and inspiration of the Roman Catholic Church. He did not regard that as a proper Government, and he therefore proposed to declare that no Pope, or any other foreign Sovereign, had any jurisdiction in these realms. Some of the opinions recently expressed by Irish Judges were not reconcilable with the English law. He did not believe any Papal Bull or Rescript could over-ride that justice to which every subject of the Crown was entitled. He thought his Bill would give Ireland a better Government than it now possessed. The Irish were distinguished by their love of justice and their strong sense of religion, but these good qualities had been perverted by the Government, whether conducted by the Lord Lieutenant or by Roman Catholic clergymen, and he wished to apply the principles which had long prevailed in England. He did not believe the badness of the Government was owing to the anarchy and disorder of the people. Compare it with the sister country, and they would find that Andrew Fletcher, writing in 1678, gave this description of Scotland—

“There are at this day in Scotland—besides a great many poor families very meanly provided for by the church-boxes, with others, who by living upon bad food fall into various diseases—200,000 people begging from door to door. These are not only no way advantageous, but a very grievous burden to so poor a country. And though the number of them be perhaps double to what it was formerly, by reason of this present great distress, yet in all times there have been about 100,000 of those vagabonds, who have lived without any regard of subjection either to the laws of the land or even those of God and nature. . . . Many murders have been discovered among them; and they are not only a most unspeakable oppression to poor tenants—who, if they give not bread or some kind of provisions to perhaps 40 such villains in one day, are sure to be insulted by them—but they rob many poor people who live in houses distant from any neighbourhood. In years of plenty, many thousands of them meet together in the mountains, where they feast and riot for many days; and at country weddings, markets, burials, and other the like public occasions, they are to be seen, both men and women, perpetually drunk, cursing, blaspheming, and fighting together. These are such outrageous disorders that it were better for the nation they were sold to the galleys or West Indies than that they should continue any longer to be a burden and a curse upon us.”

Earl Russell

The Scotch were now a moral, industrious and peaceable people, and that was largely owing to the wise measures adopted by statesmen in former times. Lord Chatham took care that £1,500,000 should be laid out without repayment in improving the roads of Scotland; but in Ireland large tracts of land were still annually flooded and their productions destroyed. In the case of Ireland, Edmund Burke and Henry Grattan had pointed out how Ireland should be governed; their suggestions, however, were treated with contempt, and he feared that if other great men were to recommend a similar policy their proposition would be regarded with the same indifference. He would, notwithstanding impress upon the Government the necessity of carrying out the recommendations of those eminent men, for unless a wise policy were extended to Ireland, it would never attain the peace and prosperity which it was capable of enjoying.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY rose to speak; but was called to Order by

THE EARL OF LONGFORD, who remarked that though the noble Earl who had introduced the Bill had, by the indulgence of the House, made an interesting statement, the Bill had previously been negatived, so that there was no Question before the House.

EARL GRANVILLE, admitting that the Question was put without the noble Earl (Earl Russell) being quite aware of what was going on, thought the discussion should be allowed to proceed.

EARL STANHOPE concurred in this, but wished Questions were put with a little more deliberation. On Friday night he was himself precluded from saying a few words in reply by the Question being put before he had an opportunity of rising.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR disclaimed any desire of putting the Question prematurely. As no Peer rose to speak he was bound to put the Question, but he did so as slowly as he could, and delayed as long as possible before saying “The Not-Contents have it.”

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND could quite confirm what the noble and learned Lord had just said. He had never heard the Question put with more deliberation. He agreed with the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that the noble Earl (Earl Russell) was probably unaware of what was occurring, and, considering the position he held, it would have been wrong to take advantage of that circumstance. He hoped, therefore, the discussion would proceed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY remarked that the noble Earl had commenced his speech by calling attention rather to the general state of Ireland than to the provisions of his Bill; but he (the Earl of Kimberley) proposed to direct his observations principally to the latter, for it was easier to point out evils in any Government than to propose satisfactory remedies. Indeed, his noble Friend had seemed conscious that the Bill was scarcely one which Parliament could accept; at all events, in its present shape. Beginning with the first portion of the Bill, he must deny that the Government of Ireland was dictated to by the Roman Catholic Church. It was vaguely said that Cardinal Cullen exercised too much influence on the Government of Ireland, an expression which might mean a great deal or very little. It might mean that particular measures taken by the Government might be too much in the interest of the Roman Catholic population; but the noble Earl should not have made such an accusation in that House without specifying the instances in which he deemed that the Government had not done its duty, in order that their Lordships might have had a better opportunity of judging whether there was any truth in the allegation. The noble Earl's remedy was a declaration that neither the Pope nor any other potentate had or ought to have any jurisdiction in this realm. Those were familiar words, which many of their Lordships had repeatedly uttered at the Table; but it could not be supposed that that form of oath, now abolished, made the Pope's authority, direct or indirect, less or more than it otherwise would have been. The law forbade the interference of any foreign authority, and no declaration was needed to make the fact clearer. Whether it would be a message of peace to Ireland, and would be likely to conduce to good government, might be a question; and that would be a singular time to make the declaration, when the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, which his noble Friend was chiefly instrumental in passing, had been recently repealed, because it had been found that declaratory laws of that kind, though easy to pass, were not of much effect. Turning to the more practical part of the Bill, he admitted that there were arguments of considerable strength in favour of the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantancy, but there were arguments which could not be overlooked on the other side. As his noble Friend had said, the proposition was not a new one, for it had been before the other House some years ago, when it met with some considerable degree of favour. His noble Friend's chief argument had been that riots would be better put down without a Lord Lieutenant; but he had always understood that the presence of a Lord Lieutenant in the country admitted of greater promptitude in dealing with riots. The argument of his noble Friend was not the strongest that might have been adduced in favour of his proposal. He might have recommended the measure on the ground of the incongruity of a high officer at Dublin with a nominal subordinate, but real superior—if the Chief Secretary was a Member of the Cabinet—and also on the ground of drawing England and Ireland more closely together. He submitted that a measure of this kind, which proposed to effect a very considerable change in the system of the administration in Ireland, should be introduced on the authority and on the responsibility of the Government of the day. It was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to accept the measure. He must further say that whenever the subject should be undertaken—if it ever was—various other measures would have to be introduced also. The Bill of his noble Friend went on to propose very serious changes in the present system of administering justice in Ireland. It was unfortunately the case that occasionally great crimes escaped unpunished in Ireland; but he did not think that the proposal of his noble Friend would remedy the evil. Offences which the law of the land ranked next to murder his noble Friend proposed should by some contrivance be reduced in degree and punished with penal servitude, and that convictions in such cases should be obtained by taking the verdict of the majority. He submitted that such a proposal, if adopted, would be equivalent to the abolition of capital punishment altogether. He could not understand why juries were likely to be unanimous in cases involving capital punishment, and yet were not likely to agree in cases involving a lesser punishment. There were many difficulties in the way of carrying out his noble Friend's proposal. Unfortunately, in Ireland the population was divided by a very marked line into Protestants and Roman Catholics, and a case in which a conviction was brought about by means of a Protestant or a Roman Catholic majority on a jury would lead to great dissatisfaction, and possibly to great danger. He did not believe that it would be possible to get a jury to do their duty under such circumstances. At the same time, the proposition to take the verdict of the majority deserved serious and fuller consideration. In deciding, however, upon the question it must be recollected that very strong excitement sometimes existed in Ireland in reference to certain particular crimes, and in such cases it would be exceedingly difficult to get a jurymen to expose himself by giving a verdict in favour of a conviction. It was, however, only just to say, as regarded Irish jurymen generally, and the administration of the law in Ireland, that with regard to ordinary crimes they did their duty admirably, and that it was only in the case of a certain class of crimes, where, owing to the peculiar social condition of the country, the feelings and passions of the people were enlisted on the side of the criminal, that there was any difficulty in obtaining a conviction where the guilt of the accused was satisfactorily established. The last subject with which the Bill of his noble Friend dealt was that of education, and he must confess that his noble Friend's suggestions did not commend themselves favourably to his mind. His noble Friend said that there was great reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the present Commissioners of Education in Ireland, and he passed upon them a sentence of very severe condemnation, such as honest and upright men, as the Commissioners undoubtedly were, did not deserve. Even admitting that all that had been urged against the Commissioners in reference to the O'Keeffe case were quite true, and that the Commissioners had erred in their judgment, he should submit to the House that those gentlemen had not deserved the censure which his noble Friend had cast upon them. The Commissioners had held an important position for a considerable time, and they had had to deal with difficulties of which but few of their Lordships could form an idea. Under their management the system of national education in Ireland had attained great success, and the public were much indebted to the men who, by means of a considerable expenditure of their own valuable time, themselves being unpaid, had reduced the system into such good working order. It was, perhaps, possible to conceive a system under which grants of money for the purposes of Irish education might be made direct from the Privy Council in London. Whether or not Ireland would willingly sacrifice her present system of separate national education might be doubted; but he felt quite sure that nothing could be worse than to have a body in Ireland administering such grants subject to the authority of the Privy Council in London, because the two authorities were certain to clash, and the authority of the body in Ireland would be so impaired as to render it powerless for good. Therefore, their Lordships would be just as indisposed to adopt that last proposal of his noble Friend as they would be indisposed to adopt his previous suggestions. His noble Friend had said that more weight should be given to the opinions of distinguished Irishmen with regard to the government of Ireland than had hitherto been the case, and in that view he (the Earl of Kimberley) entirely concurred. He was, however, convinced that if any Irishman like Burke or Grattan were to come forward, speaking with the eloquence and the authority of those great men, they would at the present day command the attention of Parliament and of the country. Ireland had no cause to complain that England had neglected her interests during the past few years. We had done our best sincerely and honestly to administer the affairs of Ireland impartially, and he trusted that the time was coming when the wishes of his noble Friend with regard to that country would be fulfilled, when she would feel better disposed towards this country, and the Three Kingdoms would be perfectly united. Indeed, the Government had reason to believe that much improvement had already taken place in Ireland in consequence of recent legislation.

EARL GREY said, that though he had long agreed with his noble Friend (Earl Russell) that the office of Lord Lieutenant for Ireland should be abolished, still he very much doubted whether that Bill was the proper mode for effecting that object, and, secondly, whether that time was the best for making the change. He would suggest whether it would not be a good arrangement if, instead of abolishing the office of Lord Lieutenant, they were to confer the office upon the Heir Apparent to the Crown; but, of course, Parliament would have to relieve His Royal Highness from all personal responsibility. Under such an arrangement there would be a real Court in Ireland. His chief object in rising, however, was to say that while he concurred with his noble Friend who spoke last, in believing it to be inexpedient that the Bill under discussion should pass into law, he could not forbear from expressing his disappointment that the Government had not evinced any sense of the grave situation in which Ireland was now placed. It was only a short time ago that in discussing another subject, he (Earl Grey) ventured to state that while that country showed in some respects gratifying symptoms of material improvement, there were other respects of a political and moral aspect in which her condition was far more unsatisfactory than it had been for a very long period. He made a comparison between the state of Ireland as it was admitted to be at present, and that which it was described to be five years ago by the then Chief Secretary, Lord Mayo, who, in a remarkable debate in the other House, gave a history of her position which was not contradicted. If that statement were compared with the existing state of things, no one could fail to be struck by the change which had since occurred. What he had said on the recent occasion to which he had just referred, there had been no attempt made to controvert; and he therefore remained persuaded that the condition of Ireland was such as to create a great sense of uneasiness, if not of actual alarm, and he believed some of the evils to which she was now exposed were the direct consequence of the policy in her regard which had been pursued during the last five years. He could not, that being the view which he took, allow the Bill before the House to be rejected, without saying that while disapproving the measure he heartily concurred with his noble Friend in the opinion that the state of Ireland called for the most serious consideration of the Legislature.

LORD O'HAGAN: My Lords, I am sure your Lordships will forgive me for trespassing briefly on your attention, when you remember that I am one of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland. I should feel myself unworthy of my position in this House, and unfaithful to my colleagues who have been so vehemently, and, in my judgment, so unwarrantably, condemned by the noble Earl (Earl Russell), if I did not offer some words in vindication of their conduct. But before I do so, I must shortly advert to the speech which has just been delivered by the noble Earl on the cross bench (Earl Grey). I do not deem it necessary, especially after the observations of my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) to enter on any discussion as to the general state of Ireland; but I am bound to say that, coming recently from that country, and having some knowledge of its actual condition, I have heard the statement of the noble Earl with the utmost surprise. That condition is not, in many respects, such as it ought to be; but I deny that it is greatly worse, or worse at all, than it was five years ago. I believe that it is better. I believe that the Irish people are advancing rapidly in the path of material progress. They are growing in wealth and the comforts which it brings. They have gained a stake in the soil from that wise policy so much denounced to-night, which, according to all our experience of humanity, will give them an interest in social order, and make them a law-abiding and loyal community. Popular education under an admirable system which, on the one hand, secures their religious rights, and, on the other, receives the liberal assistance and the wholesome inspection of the State, is spreading intelligence to every corner of the island; and if your Lordships will only consult our judicial statistics, you will find that Ireland, relatively to her population, is at this moment the most crimeless country of the world. These things should be taken into account when noble Lords are inclined to indulge in excessive lamentation as to the results of recent measures, which can only find, in the lapse of years, their true and full development. I have been astonished to hear the noble Earl institute a comparison between Scotland, as described by Fletcher of Saltoun, and the Ireland of the present day.

EARL RUSSELL: No, no!

LORD O'HAGAN: The noble Earl referred to the progress of Scotland from a miserable condition, as giving, at the time in which we live, hope of a similar progress for the Irish people. There is no analogy between the cases. If I remember rightly, Fletcher of Saltoun actually proposed the introduction of slavery into Scotland, as a means of rescue from her semi-barbarous state. Ireland needs no such assistance to advance her civilization. On another matter, I must say a word. The noble Earl has spoken of Irish Judges as having given expression to terrible opinions, with reference, as I understood him, to the temporal power of the Pope within these realms. On behalf of those Judges, I repel the imputation. It is founded altogether in error and misconception. There has been lately a discussion in the Irish Court of Queen's Bench as to a Statute of Elizabeth, affecting the validity of Papal Rescripts in these countries. The Judges differed—three of them holding that that Statute was still in force, and the fourth, as I believe, that for certain purposes, and within certain limits, the course of modern legislation must be held to have impliedly repealed it. But it never entered into his contemplation, or that of any of his brethren, to imagine that, however the spiritual power of the Pontiff might affect the subjects of the realm, submitting to it of their own free will and unfettered conscience, it could interfere, in the smallest measure, with the sovereignty of the Queen. For many a year, the Catholics of Ireland, clerical and lay, have repudiated and denied any temporal or civil jurisdiction of the Pope within these kingdoms; and there is no Judge on the Irish Bench who has not pledged his oath to that repudiation and denial. Parliament has wisely dispensed with official swearing, which was felt to be useless and an insult to those of whom it was required. And the attempt of the noble Earl to induce your Lordships to pass a declaratory Act is wholly unnecessary, as its success would be mischievous.

Lord O'Hagan

You declare the Law only when it is questionable. But here there is no doubt; and the declaration would be worse than idle. Why should you offend the Catholics of Ireland by making such a declaration. Apropos of what will you make it? How has their conduct rendered it necessary? How have they demonstrated any doubt of the plenary jurisdiction of Her Majesty in all matters temporal? How have they indicated forgetfulness of the multiplied oaths by which they have denied, in such matters, the jurisdiction of the Pope? The noble Earl once before unhappily initiated legislation of this description. For his purposes, the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was a dead letter, until it ceased to cumber the Statute Book; but it has had, and to this hour it has, most evil operation in severing socially the chief ministers of the religion of the masses of Ireland from the Executive Government, and depriving it of legitimate influence which might be often used for the most beneficial purposes. One word only as to the Lord Lieutenantcy. I am not of those who desire its abolition. I know that my opinion is, among politicians, unpopular; but I cannot cease to hold it, because I do not desire to increase the evils which Ireland has endured from excessive centralization; and because I believe that a strong Executive is, and will be, for many a day, most needful in her metropolis. I do not think that her interests can, without such an Executive, be as well protected from a parlour in Whitehall. The noble Earl once succeeded in carrying a measure for the abolition of the Vice-royalty through the House of Commons; but, in this House, it was encountered by the prescient wisdom of the Duke of Wellington, and it was rejected by your Lordships. Subsequent events have justified your decision. When the cattle plague raged in England, and threatened devastation to Ireland, it was repelled from our shores by the instant action and unwearying vigilance of my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Kimberley), who was then Lord Lieutenant. When Fenianism disturbed the kingdom, it was struck down by a like action and a like vigilance. And I more than doubt whether, in either of those cases, the same results would have been achieved by a Minister in London, without similar means of gauging opinion, of collecting information, and of guarding, with prompt decision, the great interests committed to his care. I have paused too long on topics on which I did not mean to dwell; and I pass to that which prompted me to address the House. The suggestion of the noble Earl as to the education of Ireland is, that the control of it shall be transferred to the Lords of the Council in England. I take leave to say, with all respect, that a proposal more uncalled for, more incapable of practical operation, or more gratuitously offensive in its character, has never been presented to your Lordships. It is not called for by the people whom it would affect. It could not work if it were adopted; for it would relegate to the English Committee of Council appeals against the acts of tens of thousands of patrons, managers, and teachers, and of the Board of Education itself. And it conveys the gross imputation of incapacity on a Commission which has established, with earnest effort and unexampled success, a great national system, vast in its proportions and beneficent in its results, and never so flourishing as at this moment. I do not think that such a suggestion needs much discussion; but I refer to it because it is connected with the charges of the noble Earl against the National Board. I trust your Lordships will bear with me when I tell you that not here only, but in a work printed for general circulation by the noble Earl, the majority of its Commissioners have been assailed with the greatest violence. Reckless accusations have been scattered broadcast against us—the worst fragments of the newspapers have been gathered together and embalmed in that curious work—We have been charged with “grievous wrong;” with “violation of the spirit of Magna Charta;” with “allowing an Irish Archbishop to proclaim the jurisdiction of the Pope, a foreign Prince, over the Queen’s Kingdom of Ireland;” and, finally, with “violation of Divine and human law.” These are grave charges, which should not have been lightly made against the meanest people in the community; but they have been launched without a shadow of justification, against the foremost men in Ireland—its chief Judges, Members of your Lordships’ House, and others eminent in various walks of life, who are engaged in a difficult and thankless task—without fee or reward, with great expenditure of time and labour, and often at the cost of obloquy from conflicting parties, maintaining a scheme of liberal and impartial education, which, under their auspices, has had signal and ever-increasing prosperity. And they have been made by the noble Earl not in the excitement of debate, or amidst the ringing cheers of your Lordships, but deliberately in the quiet of of his study. In such a case, surely, excessive strength of language becomes excessive weakness. As to the matter of Mr. O’Keeffe, which has been the subject of denunciation to the noble Earl, out of 20 Commissioners, seven only have adopted his views, and on the inquiry lately instituted by the House of Commons no single person ventured to impeach, as he has done, or to impeach at all, the motives of the majority. The Commissioners have simply done their duty, according to their convictions, with absolute freedom from all external influence, and in strict accordance with the precedents and practice which have governed their conduct for 40 years. If the imputations now made be well founded, they affect, equally, great and good men who have departed. Archbishops Murray and Whately, Baron Greene, and their co-labourers in earlier days—who marked out the course which their successors have faithfully followed—if they were living, would all protest against the slanderous injustice with which those successors have been assailed. Who, my Lords, are the Commissioners represented as subservient to the Pope and disloyal to the Queen? The staunchest Protestants and Presbyterians in Ireland—a learned Judge who has been the trusted adviser of the Protestant Prelacy in rehabilitating the Disestablished Church—noble Lords, the purity of whose Protestantism even the noble Earl will not venture to question—and the trusted representatives of the Irish Presbyterian clergy and laity. The charge is simply—I say it with all respect—absurd; and is it less absurd to say that such men as the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron, and Mr. Justice Fitzgerald—certainly not the least honoured members of the Irish Judicial Bench—have violated Magna Charta, and trampled on Divine and human law? For myself and on behalf of those distinguished persons, I enter my humble protest against the use of language so outrageous; and I have a right to utter that protest, as, for 15 years, I have laboured earnestly to sustain our system of national education in its integrity—sometimes in opposition to friends whom I esteem, and sometimes with unpleasant exposure to misconception and misrepresentation. I can speak with some authority as to the conduct and motives of those with whom it is my pride to have been associated in this great work. But they need not stand for defence only on their position and reputation. Their conduct in the matter for which the noble Earl has abused them has been in strict accordance with precedent and practice, and the purpose regulating that conduct has been perfectly sound. When Lord Derby wrote his famous letter—which, in itself and its consequences, will be one of his highest titles to the respect of posterity—he proposed that Ireland should enjoy a united secular and a separate religious education. He did not design to eliminate religion from the instruction of the people; and the Commissioners—acting in the large and liberal spirit of that letter—set themselves to avoid the lamentable failures of the Charter Schools and the Kildare Place Society by conciliating and comprehending the clergy of the various denominations; and, very much through their instrumentality, popularizing the novel system which was to be substituted for those abortive institutions. They have done so with perfect fairness and impartiality, and they have conquered difficulty, and removed obstruction of no common kind, until that system has attained its present great proportions and pervaded Ireland from the centre to the sea. And pursuing this course, they tacitly pledged themselves to all denominations—Protestant, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic alike—that those having the control of the schools should be of such a character as to make their management safe for the children of the several creeds in a religious point of view. And hence it came to pass that, to a very large extent, the clergy of the various churches assumed the direction of the schools, not from any absolute legal right, but because they were, for manifest reasons, the fittest to inspire the people with confidence in the instruction offered to them, and make them regard that instruction as sound and satisfactory. And hence, also, the parson, the priest, or the minister, who was so chosen, by reason of his peculiar position, has always been displaced, when that position was lost, on his degradation or suspension by the authorities of his Church. This has been the practice, uniformly and universally; and this the principle on which the practice has been founded. It was a practice essential to be maintained in a country, all of whose people, whatever be the variances in their forms of belief, are, in their several ways, essentially religious. It gave the guarantee relied on by the heads of the religious bodies, and the system could not have succeeded or endured, if that practice had not been honestly maintained. This was the simple ground of all the proceedings in the O'Keeffe case. They were taken at the bidding of no ecclesiastic, and they would have been exactly the same whatever had been the confession of the clergyman—Presbyterian, Baptist, or any other—who had been degraded. If they had been other than they were, in my opinion they would have exposed the Commissioners to the charge of a breach of faith; they would have shaken the system to its foundation, and perilled all the advantages it has conferred on Ireland, and, through the education of Ireland's masses, on the entire Empire. There may be controversy about the propriety of the practice; suggestions may be made as to attempts at its improvement hereafter, with full notice to all the world; but, as matters stood, the Commissioners were bound to enforce it as they found it, and they did absolutely nothing more. If they had done anything else, they would have destroyed the confidence alike of the Churches and the people, in the protection afforded for the purity of separate religious teaching by authorized clergymen; and the result would possibly have been the secession from the Board of myriads of children, and the establishment of inferior schools in no relation with the State, deriving from it no aid, and submitting to no inspection. Anyone who knows Ireland will not need to be told how gigantic might have been the calamity so inflicted upon her. Very many of those who rail at the Commissioners do not understand that the success of their efforts would establish that very clerical domination over the Irish schools, which of all things, I take it, they desire to avoid. I do not go into any detail as to the case of Mr. O'Keeffe, because on a former occasion I troubled your Lordships with many observations upon it. I have only now been anxious—the occasion having arisen—to defend my colleagues against charges which could never have been made, if their own high character, or the settled practice of the National Board, or the plain principle by which it is justified, had been duly regarded. I desire no conflict with the noble Earl. I lament some of the courses of his later life, but I have a grateful memory of the services which he rendered, in other days, to the good old cause of civil and religious liberty. I know how often he contended for that cause, and how of him and the Catholics of Ireland it may be said, that for it "In many a glorious and well-foughten field,

They stood together in their chivalry!"

I have sought only to vindicate those he has mistakenly assailed; and I trust your Lordships will, at least, believe they have striven to do their duty.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the noble and learned Lord who had risen to reply to the speech of the noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Grey) had left that speech virtually unanswered. Indeed, throughout the debate there had been no indication from any Member of Her Majesty's Government, or from any one connected with that Government, that the state of Ireland was such that it deserved the consideration of Parliament. On the contrary, the noble and learned Lord who had just spoken (Lord O'Hagan) stated that the state of Ireland was not only not worse now than it was five years ago, but that it was not so bad. But did their Lordships remember that at that moment the Press of Ireland was placed under the most extraordinary restrictions, and that a large proportion of Ireland was proclaimed and under a kind of military law? Did Her Majesty's Government forget that to be a supporter of the Government was a disqualification for Parliament in the eyes of the electors of Ireland—that the preference was given to Home Rulers who all but advocated a repeal of the Union? His noble Friend had been, therefore, amply justified in the remarks he had made upon the point. In his (the Earl of Carnarvon's) opinion that was a very serious state of things, and he must again express his disappointment that no one connected with the Government had admitted that the condition of Ireland was unsatisfactory. If it were in one sense better than it was in 1854, the improvement was due to military pressure and measures of repression. He agreed with the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) that the present was not a time to make great constitutional changes such as those proposed by the Bill, especially by way of experiment; but he must add his protest to that of the noble Earl on the cross benches against the condition of Ireland being regarded as satisfactory.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not wish to weaken that which he and his noble Friends near him regarded as the emphatic contradiction his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had given to the assertion that Ireland was a most crime-ridden country. He merely rose to correct the statement made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) that a large proportion of Ireland was under military law.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: What I meant to say was that large districts of Ireland were proclaimed.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had to give an equally strong contradiction to the statement that Her Majesty's Government favoured those who professed Home Rule principles.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had never made such an assertion. What he said was that the electors of Ireland favoured Home Rulers to the exclusion of Government candidates.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND assured the noble Earl that what his noble Friend said was, that Government candidates were rejected by Irish constituents, who accepted those who were in favour of Home Rule.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had also so understood the statement of his noble Friend.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD said, that in the Irish schools, as they were established by Lord Derby, Scripture extracts used to be read, although no child could receive religious instruction whose parents objected. Now, those Scripture extracts were no longer read, and Archbishop Whately's Evidences of Christianity was excluded from the school. He had had a school, and for 16 years neither parent nor priest had objected to the instruction given. Now the rule was, that no child should receive religious instruction unless his parent came forward and signed a paper that he agreed to the instruction proposed to be given. With regard to the loyalty of the people of Ireland under the present state of things, he asserted that it had not increased, but diminished. The Irish people thought they would be safer with the United States or with France than with England. Anything would be better than the existing state of affairs in Ireland, and if the noble Earl went to a division he should divide with him.

On Question? Resolved in the negative.

SIR SAMUEL BAKER'S EXPEDITION.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it would no doubt be gratifying to their Lordships if he stated the substance of a telegram from Mr. Vivian, dated Alexandria, that day—

"Sir Samuel Baker reports safe arrival, with all Europeans, at Khartoum. Country come under Egyptian dominion. Route opened to Zanzibar. Slave trade in process of being suppressed. El Zeraf proved navigable. Victory on June 8 of 105 men over army of Onieso. Country orderly and quiet. Mission quite successful."

A subsequent telegram from Mr. Vivian, dated Alexandria, 3 30 P.M., said—

"3 P.M. Telegram from Governor of Soudan to Cheriff confirms safe arrival of Baker and his expedition at Khartoum; but states that Mr. Higanbotham (sic) died at Gondokoro. Baker comes here at once."

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN BILL.

(The Lord Henniker.)

(No. 165.) REPORT OF THE AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Further Amendments made.

LORD HENNIKER said, he had endeavoured to carry out the wishes of their Lordships, expressed in the Committee of this Bill, in the clauses he had brought up. Their Lordships would find all the Amendments which had been made in the House of Commons to Clause 6, carried out by the words now before the House, and the clauses after Clause 7, he believed, carried out the expressed wishes of their Lordships' House. He wished to introduce words into the second new clause, to avoid any misapprehension as to the meaning of the clause, for it might be construed, as it stood at present, as if the Provisos affected the first part of the clause; and this was not intended. The first part of the clause respecting the exemption of children who were employed in harvest, hay harvest, and so on, was intended to be an absolute enactment; whereas, as the clause now stood, the Provisos might apply to the first part, as well as the second part of the clause. He (Lord Henniker) wished to say a few words in explanation of the clause relating to reformatory and industrial schools, which he had introduced, as he was bound to do on bringing up a new clause on the Report. He thought their Lordships would agree to this clause to exempt reformatory and industrial schools from the operation of the Bill; for the chief object in those schools was to teach habits of work, as well as to bring the children into a school of education, under the ordinary acceptance of the term. Suppose a boy, badly brought up, as most children were who came under these Acts, he would not, perhaps, settle down to school work for a time, but, by degrees, and by means of putting him to field work, he would do so. Then attendances at school, taken by the rules of the Education Department, was very difficult to calculate in this case; the two hours of attendance was seldom, if ever, made up in these schools in each school-time. The schooling was in almost every case ample, but the advantage taken of a wet day, and other reasons, made the attendance at school necessarily, and rightly, irregular. The children who came under these Acts were of a different class from those affected by the Bill, and the course of instruction was different, too. It must be wrong to put any obstacle in the way of the working of those schools. Financially, it would affect them; for in many instances, the labour of the children was let out in the neighbourhood, and in one instance, £100 a-year was gained in this way in Northamptonshire. Great power was given under the Industrial Schools Act, almost amounting to a stringent system of compulsion; and, surely it would not be right to put other restrictions upon such children. He (Lord Henniker) had imagined those schools would not come under the provisions of the Bill, as they were under special Acts; but he found on investigation, that although they were virtually under special Acts, they were not so actually; for no special provisions were laid down for the instruction to be given, and this fact would bring them under the Bill. They were really under special provisions; for they would not be certified schools unless they were under Government inspection, and the rules were sanctioned by the Secretary of State. He hoped their Lordships would consent to the introduction of the clause, as if these schools were brought under the Bill, it would very much interfere with the good and effective work they were doing in the country.

Amendment moved, at end of Clause 8 insert—

("Nor shall the said provisions apply in the case of any child for the time being detained in a certified reformatory school or in a certified industrial school within the meaning of the Reformatory Schools Acts, 1866 and 1872, and Industrial Schools Acts, 1866 and 1872 respectively.")—(The Lord Henniker.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that the Bill had no doubt been improved since it came up from the Commons, but he doubted whether the Amendment would not place reformatory and industrial schools in a better position than the parents of the children who were not permitted to go to work under a certain age. He understood that the noble Lord behind him proposed the addition to the clause because certain industrial schools in Northamptonshire earned not less than £100 a-year by letting out the children to farmers in the neighbourhood, and that if they were prevented by this Bill from doing so, they would suffer a considerable pecuniary loss. If that were so, he thought their Lordships ought not to agree to the clause at the present moment, as he objected to an industrial school letting out children to the neighbouring farmers.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON hoped his noble Friend (Lord Henniker) would postpone his Amendment till the third reading.

LORD HENNIKER said, he was quite willing to act on that suggestion.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Bill to be read 3^d on Monday next; and to be printed as amended.—(No. 185.)

CROWN PRIVATE ESTATES BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(No. 175.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its principal object was to make it clear that Her Majesty, or any future Sovereign, should have the power of transmitting her private estates to any member of the illustrious family that now ruled this country, and that they should continue private estates in the event of the person who held them succeeding to the Crown.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

MARRIAGES (IRELAND) LEGALIZATION BILL—(No. 94.)

(The Marquess of Clanricarde.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in moving, that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the disestablishment of the Irish Church had rendered such a measure extremely necessary.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the Government had no serious objection to raise against the Bill. There were however, so many inaccuracies throughout it that perhaps it would be as well for the noble Marquess to draw up a fresh measure, and introduce it next Session.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he entirely approved of the object of the Bill, but agreed that it was so faulty in several particulars, that it would be better it should be replaced by a more perfect measure. He would, moreover, suggest that it was not desirable to proceed with special legislation, especially when it was considered that the whole question of the marriage law of Ireland might well be dealt with.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock
'till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

IRELAND—LOANS TO IRISH RAILWAY COMPANIES.—QUESTION.

MR. MCCLURE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, How such Irish Railway Companies as may be disposed to avail themselves of the intimation to the effect that advances of money might be made by the State to Irish Railway Companies at low rates of interest should proceed in order to bring themselves within the scope of that intimation, and in what manner will the Government require to be satisfied that such advances will be attended with an adequate increased facility to the public and development of traffic?

MR. GLADSTONE: I presume, Sir, that the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast is founded upon a declaration made by me at an earlier period of the Session; but I wish he had adverted exactly to the character of that prior declaration. The Question appears to imply that I had stated on the part of the Government, that we were ready to deal with Irish Railway Companies individually and separately, if they asked for loans at low rates of interest. I have referred to the Report —for which I am not in any way responsible—of the prior declaration made by me in this House. I have no doubt it corresponds substantially with what I said, and I will venture to repeat my words on that occasion:—

"It was quite impossible, however," I said, "for the Government to take the initiative in such a matter"—that of dealing with the railway companies—"because it depended entirely upon the arrangements and upon the economical management of the railway companies themselves. The first and the most essential step would be that the Irish railway companies should agree upon some reasonable principle of amalgamation, and should arrange among themselves for the transfer of the debt; and when that step had been taken, the initiative would lie with the railway companies, because the security could only be accepted in the event of its being perfect."—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 1166.]

My hon. Friend will, therefore, perceive that combination and agreement among the companies themselves are of absolute necessity according to the declaration which was made by me.

ARMY—AUTUMN MANŒUVRES—HORSE BLANKETS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that horse-blankets are not to be supplied to the horses taking part in the Autumn Manœuvres at Dartmoor and Cannock Chase this year; and, if it is true, what are the reasons for the horse-blankets being refused?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, the experiment of not issuing horse-blankets to one regiment of cavalry was tried last year with perfectly satisfactory results. The opinion of the principal veterinary surgeon, as well as that of officers commanding regiments of cavalry and the deputy adjutants general of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, having been unanimously in favour of the non-issue of horse-blankets, the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief has concurred in the decision that they should not be issued.

GENERAL VALUATION OF IRELAND—THE DUBLIN AND KINGSTOWN RAILWAY.—QUESTION.

THE O'CONNOR DON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When and by whom, and in what form, the remonstrance was made on behalf of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway Company, which led to the reduction of the valuation of that line by more than one-half; and when did this revised valuation, amounting to £14,800, come before the Chairman of the county and the Recorder of the city of Dublin on appeal; and in what form did they express their sanction of it?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon has rather misapprehended the answer I gave on Tuesday last. As furnished to me, it was so long that I was afraid it would weary the House, and in my attempt to abbreviate it, I have conveyed an erroneous impression to my hon. Friend's mind. The remonstrance on behalf of the railway was made in 1861 by the Chairman and other officers of the Company at several meetings with Sir Richard Griffith, but the revised valuation which followed did not come before the chairman of the county and the recorder of the city of Dublin on appeal. It was the allowances then made which had the effect of reducing the valuation, which at a subsequent period came before these Gentlemen, and with some modifications received their approval in the form of a judgment of the Court. These allowances are still in force, but in consequence of the increased profits of the line the valuation has also been increased.

CRIMINAL LAW—OUTRAGE AT THE BATH ELECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any steps have been taken by the police authorities at Bath to discover and prosecute the persons who threw Cayenne pepper at Messrs. Cox and Adams on the 20th instant; and, whether he will take into consideration the advisability of a reward being offered by Government for their apprehension, in order that a stop may be put to a practice which has been repeated on several occasions?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have received a communication from the town clerk of Bath, stating that the police authorities of that city have done, and are doing, everything in their power to discover the perpetrators of the disgraceful outrage referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend. They have not been hitherto successful, but they have not abandoned hope, and are still pursuing their inquiries. With respect to the second part of the Question, I beg to say that rewards to those who may give evidence leading to the detection and punishment of offenders are only offered by Government in the very gravest cases, such as murder, and then only on the application of the magistrates; such rewards, if frequently given, having the obvious tendency to encourage important witnesses to withhold their evidence until they are assured of some pecuniary advantage. No such application from the magistrates has reached me. I understand, however, in this case, that rewards have been locally offered, and I trust that the efforts of the police may be successful, and that severe punishment may overtake those who have been guilty not only of a private injury, but of a public outrage, by this dastardly attempt to interfere with free discussion at a public meeting.

METROPOLIS—KENSINGTON GARDENS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that on the night of Tuesday the 24th instant there was almost a total absence of policemen from duty in Kensington; why the gates of Kensington Gardens were open till close on midnight; whether they were so owing to there being no policeman or other official to close them; and, whether it has been reported to him that several robberies were committed that same night in and about the neighbourhood of Campden Hill?

MR. BRUCE: I presume, Sir, my hon. Friend has not put these Questions without some grounds for believing that the statements they contain are well founded. If so, he has great cause to complain of his informant. The facts are these. The ordinary hour for closing the gates of Kensington Gardens is 9 o'clock. On the evening of the 24th vast numbers of carriages and great crowds of people assembled in Hyde Park to witness the return of the Shah from the Windsor Review, and it being necessary to preserve order, some few of the policemen from Kensington Gardens were withdrawn from their ordinary duties, and detained to a later hour than was expected, so that the north gates were not closed until 40 minutes past 9, and all the other gates between 9 and half-past 9. There was an ample body of police to preserve order, and no robberies nor any irregularities were reported to the Kensington police as having been committed during that night; and I am obliged to my hon. Friend for the opportunity of stating a fact very creditable to the vast population of the West End of London and its suburbs, that during the past week not a single larceny was reported to the police as having been committed between Westminster and Staines.

ARMY—ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY—OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If the War Office object to the First Captains of the Royal Marine Artillery having the same rank as the late First Captains of the Royal Regiment of Artillery; and, if so, if he would explain to the House for what reasons they object?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, a proposal was made to the War Office on the subject of the promotion of a portion of the captains of the Royal Marines generally to the brevet rank of major; in reply to which it was pointed out to what extent that particular proposal would have affected officers in the Army of the same standing, and an arrangement was effected, which it was hoped was satisfactory to both Services. No special reference has been made with regard to first captains of the Royal Marine Artillery.

NAVY—CAPTAINS OF THE ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY.—QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is not the case that the companies or batteries commanded by First Captains of the Royal Marine Artillery are of greater numerical strength (viz. 173 Officers and Men) than the average of batteries of the Royal Regiment of Artillery; whether the First Captains of the Marine Artillery have not a greater length of service than the late First Captains of the Royal Artillery; and, whether it is his intention to confer upon the former the same promotion as has been given to the latter; and, if not, if he would explain to the House for what reason he refuses?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, it was true that the companies or batteries commanded by first captains of the Royal Marine Artillery were generally of greater numerical strength than the average of batteries of the Royal Regiment of Artillery; and that the first captains of the Marine Artillery had generally greater length of service than the late first captains of the Royal Artillery; but it did not follow that the duties of the two corps were precisely the same, nor that the number of men generally commanded by officers of the rank of captain were the same in the same corps. With reference to the third Question, a proposal to grant the identical promotion to the Royal Marine Artillery which had been given to the Royal Artillery had never been placed before the Admiralty, and therefore he had never had any opportunity of consenting or refusing. The proposals made had reference to the whole Marine force, both Infantry and Artillery, and, in consequence of representations made to the Admiralty, an arrangement had been effected by which a certain number of captains, both of Artillery and Infantry, had been promoted to the brevet rank of major.

THE GENEVA AWARD—THE ARBITRATORS.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Why the proposed Vote for the purchase of Plate to be presented to certain of the Arbitrators in the Geneva Award has been postponed until this late period of the Session; whether he will inform the House as to the exact day on which he intends to bring forward this Vote; whether any steps have yet been taken with reference to the purchase or selection of the Plate in question; and, if so, what steps; and, further, whether a sum of £15,000 was not voted by Parliament last year to meet the expenses in connection with the Arbitration?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am extremely sorry, Sir, that I was prevented by an imperative call from being in the House when my hon. Friend the Member for Devon put the Question down before. The first part of the Question is very easy to answer. It is intended, as my hon. Friend knows, to submit a Vote for the purpose of purchasing plate, to be presented to the Arbitrators, and that Vote will be submitted at a convenient and proper period. [Laughter.] I mean to say it will be submitted at a period when it can be conveniently considered by the House, which I have no doubt is my hon. Friend's object; but it is not usual when charges of this kind, limited in amount and of secondary importance, have to be brought forward after the presentation of the ordinary Estimates, nor would it be very convenient to the House to present them one by one. It is more convenient, and certainly according to the usual practice, to wait till the Government can see its way tolerably clear to bring them up with any small group of such charges which it may be their duty to propose to the House, and very shortly we shall be in a condition to do that. I cannot name a day when the Estimate will be proposed, but it will be laid on the Table with certain other charges of no great importance at a very early period. Steps have been taken with reference to the purchase and selection of the Plate in question. This was a case in which, the proceedings not depending entirely upon the action of the Government of this country, we did not, as we should probably otherwise have done, take the opinion of the House of Commons before any step was taken in the matter. The initiative was, in fact, taken at a very early period, as I think the House was informed some time ago, by the Government of the United States; and it would not have been becoming, I think, that the Government of this country should say, in a matter of this description, that they could not make any answer till they had had an opportunity of submitting the proposal to Parliament. It was not necessary to reserve the judgment of Parliament expressly in such a matter; but, of course, the judgment of Parliament is perfectly free. However, I may say that steps have been taken for the selection of the Plate in question, and if my hon. Friend asks what step, I believe the usual step—namely, that of ordering it. With regard to the amount voted by Parliament last year in connection with the Arbitration, owing to some accident, reference has not been made to the proceedings, but no doubt my hon. Friend is correct in regard to the amount.

SIR THOMAS BATESON: Then, Sir, I beg to give Notice that on an early day I will ask the Prime Minister, Whether he, as First Minister of the Crown, considers it consistent with his duty to the constituency he represents, as well as to the Nation at large, thus secretly to expend sums of money unknown to Parliament, and without having previously obtained the sanction of the Representatives of the people?

FRANCE — THE NEW COMMERCIAL TREATY—BRITISH MINERAL OILS.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAGAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is being done to effect a settlement of the questions connected with British Mineral Oils in France, both as to claims and rates of import duty?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the question relating to British mineral oils, both as to claims and rates of import duty, would have been settled by the Protocol attached to the Treaty of the 5th of November last, and the inquiry into the claims had already been commenced before the mixed Commission at Paris. Her Majesty's Government are not yet informed of the views of the French Government with regard to the future proceedings of the Commission; but Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris has urged the settlement of these questions relating to mineral oils upon the attention of the French Government, in order that they may form part of any arrangement which may be come to in connection with the Treaty of Commerce of last year.

POOR LAW ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—FORGED VOTING PAPERS.

QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether application was made to the Local Government Board during the months of March, April, or May 1873, to institute a prosecution against any persons on a charge of forging signatures to voting papers at the election of a poor law guardian for the electoral division of O'Brien's Bridge, in the Limerick Union; and, whether the Local Government Board refused to undertake such prosecution; and, if so, what were the grounds of the refusal?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that a case had occurred in which the attention of the Local Government Board had been directed to a charge of forging signatures to voting papers at the election in question; but the Local Government Board did not consider that they would be justified in undertaking prosecutions at the charge of funds derived from the Imperial Exchequer in cases of this kind, which were merely of local interest, and when it was open to any person able to prove the facts to proceed before the justices at petty sessions for the penalty.

DRAINAGE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT
1863 — DRAINAGE OF THE RIVERS
SUCK AND SHANNON.

MAJOR TRENCH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that the state of the Shannon has been the means of preventing the undertaking of the drainage of the extensive districts bordering the River Suck ever since the year 1848, notwithstanding the frequent efforts of the persons affected to obtain the requisite permission to drain their lands; and, whether, having regard to the fact that there is no other outlet for the waters of the Suck except through the Shannon, and also that the latter river is under the sole control and guardianship of the Government, he will urge upon them the necessity which exists for taking such steps as may be necessary to place the river in a condition to fulfil its natural function; and, if not, whether he will state what steps should be taken, and by whom, to prevent the continuance of this dead lock?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not aware that the state of the Shannon has been the means of preventing the undertaking the drainage of those districts, and I am sorry to say that I am not prepared to urge upon the Government to take any steps in this matter, nor able to give any advice as to what other steps should be taken.

MAJOR TRENCH: I beg, then, to give Notice that on an early day I shall move for certain Papers, which may make it patent to the right hon. Gentleman that the substance of what is set forth in my Question is in accordance with the simple facts.

GENERAL VALUATION OF IRELAND.
QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government

The Marquess of Hartington

consider that no change of the present General Valuation of Ireland should take place until after the expiration of the twenty years for which the Irish Land Act was passed, and freedom of contract in certain cases prohibited?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am, rather at a loss, Sir, to understand what is the precise meaning of the Question, or whether it expresses the precise view of the hon. Baronet the Member for Londonderry County, but I will answer it as well as I can. Most certainly, I do not consider that no change of the present General Valuation of Ireland should take place, that is to say, that the present General Valuation should remain in force for all purposes till after the expiration of the twenty years for which the Act passed. On the contrary, we gave the opinion by the Bill we introduced this year, that some change should take place; but it is one question whether some change should take place for general purposes, and another whether it should take place immediately, or after an interval, for the purposes of the compensations under the Land Act. Perhaps the most interesting part of my answer will be that which has reference to the Valuation Bill now in this House. We were most desirous to proceed with that Bill, but there was a desire very generally expressed by hon. Members that it should be referred to a Select Committee. We undertook, therefore, to consider whether we could propose to refer it to a Select Committee during the present Session with the prospect of a satisfactory and sufficient investigation. We are bound to say we cannot, and under those circumstances, in conformity with the intimation given on a former evening, we do not intend to proceed with the Bill.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE—PENSIONS TO WIDOWS OF CONSULAR OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Office intended to do anything for the widow of the late Mr. Abbott, Consul General at Odessa? Mr. Abbott, who had been 32 years in the Consular service—27 in Persia and five in Odessa—had left his widow with nine children, totally unprovided for. As Mr. Abbott's health had been destroyed by his long residence in the East, he trusted that the case of the widow and orphan children would be made an exceptional one.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I am afraid, Sir, that the only answer I can give to my hon. Friend is, that there is no provision made in the Estimates whereby the Secretary of State could out of public funds give pensions to the widows and children of Consular Officers.

SIR SAMUEL BAKER—TELEGRAM.

QUESTION.

MR. CADOGAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can confirm the report that news has been received at the Foreign Office of the safety of Sir Samuel Baker?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I am happy Sir, to inform my hon. Friend and the House that two hours ago a telegram was received from Mr. Vivian, at Alexandria, dated this day, one o'clock. It is as follows:—

"Telegram just received from Sir Samuel Baker, dated Khartoum, yesterday, reports his safe arrival there in good health, with all the other Europeans. The country as far as the Equator annexed to Egyptian dominion; all rebellions, intrigues, and slave trade completely put down; country orderly; Government perfectly organized; and road open as far as Zanzibar; El Zaraf navigable. Victory on June 8, with only 105 men, over army of Onoso. This mission completely successful."

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL (Lords)—[BILL 154.]

(The Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had to offer a few remarks on the important subject mooted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and, if the statement he had to make should be conformable to the views of his right hon. Friend, it might save both him and the House some trouble. His right hon. Friend had proposed that whatever might be the final Court of Appeal constituted under the Bill, the same should be the final Court of Appeal for Ireland and Scotland. With reference to that Motion, it was right that he should recall to the recollection of the House the declarations of his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor and of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General in introducing the Bill respectively to both Houses of Parliament. They stated that it was obvious it could not be considered, in the abstract, a merit in a measure of this kind, that it should deal with the Court of Appeal for one of the three countries only, leaving Scotch and Irish appeals to be still decided by the House of Lords. On the contrary, it was their view, as it must be the view of all, that to establish one Court of Appeal for all three countries was a great object of policy in the improvement of our jurisprudence. That being so, they had to give to Parliament the reason which led them and the Government to think that it was better, as the circumstances then stood, to confine their efforts to the establishment of a Court of Appeal for England alone. That reason was of a simple character, because it relied entirely on the opinion stated to prevail in Scotland and Ireland. They founded themselves on what they deemed to be no uncertain indications of that opinion, for evidence had been taken before the Committee of the House of Lords, to the effect that the "profession" and the people of Scotland and Ireland would greatly prefer that the Appellate Jurisdiction should continue in the House of Lords. That was the reason which induced the Government to adopt the form of the Bill as it now stood. But his right hon. Friend having raised the question anew, the Government had thought it their duty to make new inquiries, under the altered circumstances of the case, for the circumstances of the case had greatly altered. The opinion of Ireland and Scotland, which was unfavourable to the transfer of their appeals, was founded on the supposition that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was to continue in its entirety, and that the House of Lords would not only have the machinery, but the habits and traditions of a Court of Appeal in pretty constant action; whereas, on the contrary, by the introduction of the Bill, the position of the House of Lords would be materially, he might say essentially, changed, not only with respect to the mass of English appeals, but likewise with respect to the residue of business from Ireland and Scotland which would still theoretically and legally remain to it. No one could suppose that if the Bill were to pass, the House of Lords could continue to possess and exercise the same legal force, or to enjoy the same judicial weight in the country. The question which the Government had to put, therefore, was whether, presuming the jurisdiction of the House of Lords to be taken away as far as regarded English appeals, Irish and Scotch appeals should still remain to be decided by it. The question of the removal of English appeals might now be regarded as concluded. In the first place, it had been proposed by the Government to the House of Lords. In the second place, it had unanimously, or, at least, with substantial unanimity, been voted by the House of Lords, there having been no division on the subject, and a Bill removing that jurisdiction had been sent from the House of Lords to that House. In the House of Commons a greater diversity of opinion had been expressed by individual Members; but, after long and interesting debates of a discursive character on various provisions of the Bill, no division had been taken on this subject; and that House, following the steps of the other House of Parliament, had voted the removal of the appellate jurisdiction in English cases from the House of Lords. That being so, those who represented Ireland and Scotland were not only willing but desirous that the jurisdiction as to Irish and Scotch appeals should be removed from the House of Lords, and that the Bill should be adapted to those altered circumstances, so as to give the measure a character of greater completeness and efficiency. The question, therefore, which arose was, whether it would be possible so to adapt the measure without endangering its passing during the present Session, for he need not say that to endanger a measure which had been the result of such prolonged labour and consideration, and which contemplated improvements of such great importance, would be entirely contrary to the duty and inclinations of the Government. Well, the Government had arrived at the conclusion that it would be quite practicable to introduce into the present measure the changes necessary for effecting the purpose his right hon. Friend had in view, as the Government understood it, without imposing upon Parliament any such additional labour or introducing any such great alterations into the structure of the Bill as would make it run any serious risk. He understood, however, that both in Ireland and in Scotland certain consequential changes might be found necessary owing to the transfer of Scotch and Irish Appeals to the new tribunal. He was not prepared, however, to say that it would be practicable to deal with these consequential changes during the present year, considering the point of the Session at which we had arrived. The question was, whether it would be possible to give the Court such a constitution and form as to make it a thoroughly satisfactory Court of Appeal for all these cases. That he understood was the object of the Motion of his right hon. Friend, and to that extent they concurred with him, and they would be prepared to propose changes, the precise form of which he could not now undertake to indicate, which, according to their views, and he hoped according to the judgment of the House, would have that effect. Now, as to the form of procedure, he would say one word. It would be possible to proceed in several methods for this purpose. It might be possible to introduce a separate Bill, introducing provisions so as to make the Bill applicable to Scotch and Irish appeals; but he did not ask the House to proceed in that method, because an element of uncertainty might be introduced with regard to the fate of that Bill which he was desirous to avoid. They might also proceed, by way of Instruction, to enable the Committee to change the Bill, so as to apply to Scotch and Irish appeals; but as no Notice had been given, that could not be done with regularity to-day, and though he believed it was not absolutely prevented by the forms of the House, it was not thought desirable to give Instruction to the Committee during the period when the Bill was in Progress. It was better that after the Speaker left the Chair and the House had entered on the details of the Bill, no change of that kind should be made at that stage. There was another course which was perfectly regular, and would be satisfactory to the House to pursue. What he should propose was this—to go through the Bill on the clauses as it stood, without touching in the Committee the subject-matter of the Amendment of his right hon. Friend; but while the House was in Committee, they would give Notice of the provisions they proposed to introduce to give effect to that Amendment, and when they had reported the Bill after Committee, they would propose to re-commit it for the purpose of giving effect to those changes. He hoped he had sufficiently explained to his right hon. Friend and the House the views they entertained, and the satisfaction with which they felt themselves able to accede to the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Dr. BALL said, he must express his deep regret that the Government had thought it desirable to abolish the hereditary Court of Appeal in the House of Lords, and he must say that a great opportunity had been lost for preserving that Court. It was a tribunal of high reputation, credit, and authority, and if it could have been retained, no one would have been a stronger advocate for its retention than himself. But, since it was to be abolished, he thought it most undesirable that there should exist several distinct Courts of appeal dealing with the same law, considering the danger of conflicting decisions on the same subject. It therefore became a matter of vital importance that the Representatives of Ireland and Scotland should consider how they would be placed by this Bill. The view taken in Ireland had been modified by the course of circumstances. The Judges there had come to an unanimous resolution, expressing the wish that Irish appeals should be heard by the same tribunal that heard English appeals. The Irish Bar had come to a similar resolution; they had also passed another resolution, that in the Court of Appeal the Irish Bench should have a fair representation in the constitution of the tribunal. With respect to the Statute and Common Law of Ireland, while the latter was the same as that of England, the former was not, in consequence of the legislation of the Irish Parliament, and also in consequence of the practice which had since prevailed of legislating exceptionally for Ireland; and, therefore, a fair representation of the Irish Bench was necessary. If, in the constitution of the tribunal, the Members composing it were small in number, of course the Irish representation would be proportionally small; but if, on the other hand, the tribunal was numerous composed, then the Irish representation should be increased and adjusted in proportion. Then, with regard to Scotland, whose laws were different in many respects from those of England, it would be necessary that Scotland should also have a fair judicial representation in the constitution of the tribunal. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, at the head of the Government would not think that they were making any extraordinary or extravagant demands. In asking what he did for Ireland, he felt he only asked what was fair, and that the Irish Judges should have the same salaries as the English Judges.

Mr. BOUVERIE thought the statement of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government must be satisfactory to all those who were disposed to support the Motion of which he (Mr. Bouverie) had given Notice. There was now no necessity for him to make that Motion, the course of proceeding indicated by his right hon. Friend being perfectly satisfactory to effect the object he had in view. On the part of his Scotch Colleagues, who sympathized with the object of his Motion, he would say that they also sympathized with what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Dr. Ball), that to make the Court satisfactory and efficient, it would be necessary to have a fair representation of the Judges of the two sister countries on the Appellate Tribunal. He was glad his right hon. Friend had acceded to his proposal. The Government had originally concurred in the object of the Motion; but they had been deterred from making the proposal by an apprehension that the Representatives of the sister countries would not concur in the change. The fact, however, was, that when English appeals were removed from the House of Lords, it would have been impossible to retain the Irish and Scotch appeals there, because such appellate jurisdiction was a mere off-shoot of the more ancient appellate jurisdiction for England. That jurisdiction, he believed, had existed before Parliament itself, for it was part of the authority of the Concilium Magnum. It might have been possible under other circumstances to have modified and retained the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. But that time had gone by, when the House of Lords themselves had abandoned all desire to retain the appellate jurisdiction; and it would have been impossible after that to have set it up again by legislation. He should give a hearty support to the Government in carrying out their plan. And with regard to the claim of Scotland and Ireland, he did not think that anyone could have any sound objection to it.

MR. DISRAELI: It appears to me to be not a very satisfactory proposition that the House should be called on to decide on this important measure upon bringing up the Report of the Committee. I agree that it is an inconvenient, even though it may be a legitimate course, to move an Instruction whilst we are in Committee; but it appears to me that there is a mode of proceeding that would get us out of the difficulty in a satisfactory manner; and that is that this debate should be adjourned whilst Mr. Speaker is in the Chair, and that before we go into Committee these Instructions should be put upon the Paper. Though I do not put my knowledge upon the subject in competition with that of many hon. Gentlemen who have studied it, yet I should feel—and I think the majority of the House would feel great difficulty in deciding upon the many points which we should have to consider without having the distinct propositions of the Government before us. It appears to me that no time would be lost by following the course which I venture to recommend to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, that he should not ask the House to proceed in the manner that he has indicated, which is, I think, unusual and unsatisfactory; but that he should adjourn this debate before Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair, and that then he should frame his instructions and place them before the House, in complete comprehension of the Bill on which we have to decide.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped the House would not assent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), which, though it sounded reasonable, would in truth postpone the Bill almost indefinitely. Although the subject was of importance, the absolute changes in the structure of the Bill suggested by the Government were really small in themselves, and would best be carried out in the manner proposed by the Prime Minister; as, if any other course were pursued, it would lead to a considerable prolongation of the Session. The Government did not propose to deal with the Courts of Scotland and Ireland as regarded First Instance, but so to deal with the question at present, as to make the Bill as short and simple as could be. He admitted that what was now proposed should be done upon full consideration by those whose interests were affected, with whom it might be necessary to have some communication upon the subject; but meanwhile there was plenty to do; the Bill might proceed; the full Notice would be given of the changes which would be necessary.

MR. BOURKE said, he was desirous to express his strong opinion in favour of the views expressed to the House by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball), in reference to a just representation of Ireland in the constitution of the tribunal. He was convinced that the further the House proceeded with the Bill the greater would be their conviction that they had committed a fatal error in abolishing the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. It would be almost impossible to constitute a Court of Appeal which would give the same satisfaction and be as economical; and never had a change of such magnitude been made upon such slight authority, for, excepting the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, there was not a single great authority, living or dead, in favour of the change. It was a great constitutional amendment upon which the country had had no opportunity of giving an opinion; and he believed that when the country and the various Law Societies considered this question they would come to the conclusion that there was no Court of Appeal so efficient and so economical as a properly-constituted House of Lords. Certain accidental deficiencies no doubt existed in that tribunal, but they might easily be remedied—for instance, by the appointment of three Law Lords with salaries, and by providing that the House should sit to hear appeals all the year round. It would be satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would state to the House what were the changes which he con-in reference to Scotland and Ireland, and speaking for Ireland, he said that the feeling in that country was strongly in favour of the maintenance of the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. Another point for consideration was the cost of the proposed Appeal Court. It was understood that the Court in its constitution would include the three Chief Judges of the Common Law Courts, and three Puisne Judges, and if so, the additional expense of constituting a new Court of Appeal, compared with the existing tribunal, would be very considerable. He hoped the Government would adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), and would see that, although the changes to be made were small, they would still require great consideration. Until the House knew what the changes were to be which were to result from the communications between the Law Officers for Scotland and those for Ireland, it would be proceeding in the dark if it passed a single clause of the Bill.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he did not wish to delay or imperil the Bill, but he saw great difficulties in accepting it as it stood. It was true the proposal to include Scotland and Ireland did not affect the question of Courts of First Instance, but it most materially affected the whole question of the Appellate jurisdiction; and he could not understand how they were to deal with the 6th clause, and the clauses which hung upon it, without ascertaining how they were to deal with the Irish and Scotch elements of the Appellate Court. It affected not only organization, but also the financial clauses, which had been little explained, and were unintelligible until they knew what the scheme was to be. He concurred in the announced intention of the Government to make one great Court of Appeal for the whole Empire. This ought to be a very great Court, and one with the most consummate authority, because it was to settle the law finally for a great people. He also concurred in the conclusion that the jurisdiction of the House of Lords ought to be abolished, but he had never concealed from himself the gravity of such a step, and that nothing could justify its being taken, except the substitution for it of a Court most carefully constituted. He concurred, too, in the abolition of the intermediate appeal to the Exchequer Chamber and the Lords Justices; but the very fact of intermediate appeal being abolished made it the more necessary to be extremely careful in considering the character of the new Court of Appeal. How was that Court to be constituted? What was wanted was a Court, homogeneous in its nature, and composed of the most eminent men that could be procured. Well, in the House of Lords we had a Court of a more or less homogeneous character; but that to be established by the Bill would consist of three separate elements, different in character, constitution, rank, and emolument. There were to be three classes of Judges—ex officio, ordinary, and occasional; and that, on the face of it, would be a grave defect in a Final Court of Appeal, and would diminish its authority. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, moreover, proposed to reduce the salaries of the Members to £5,000, and so put them on the level of the Court below, from which they were to be a Court of Appeal. Why, as the Bill stood, there was every element introduced which was calculated to throw discredit upon the Final and Ultimate Court of Appeal in this country. The ex officio Judges were to be the Lord Chancellor, the Chiefs of the Courts of Common Law, and the Master of the Rolls, who were also to be occupied as Judges of the Court of First Instance, where their principal and ordinary occupation would be. Of course, these ex officio Judges would not attend to their ex officio duties any more than other ex officio officers, except on show occasions, such as the hearing of ecclesiastical cases which excited the sectarian mind. How often did ex officio Members attend the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? What were termed the occasional Judges, the Law Lords, were to attend, if they gave their consent in writing; but there was to be no compulsion whatever as regarded their attendance. He (Mr. Harcourt), however, thought that functionaries, however high, if they received pensions from the State, ought to render services if they were able to do so. The unknown quantity of the equation was made up of the Irish and Scotch Judges, of whom they were to know no more until they got into Committee. The result would be,

we should have nine ordinary Judges left, and they would be the only Judges who would do work. There would be the three Judges of the present Committee of the Privy Council, who would have enough to do in hearing Indian and Colonial appeals; three more, the Lords Justices, with the Lord Chancellor, would have plenty to do in hearing Chancery appeals and the appeals which now went to the House of Lords; and there would remain to settle the whole law of England three Puisne Judges, who were to be substituted for the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords. He ventured to think that neither the country nor the profession would be satisfied with such an Appeal Court as that. Why, we might have three Puisne Judges in the Upper Court, over-ruling three Puisne Judges in the Court below; or we might have a greater number of Judges of superior ability in the Court below over-ruled by a smaller number of Judges of less authority. He could not part with the jurisdiction of the House of Lords and of the Exchequer Chamber for such a Court as that. The Court of Final Appeal ought not to consist of fewer than five Members under any circumstances, if there were to be three Members in the Court below. Ex officio Judges were also a mistake; we ought to have Judges whose attendance could be counted upon, and who could be required to attend. One of the great evils of the House of Lords was that there was no power of compelling noble Lords to attend, and, therefore, one never knew who would be there. His Amendment was directed against those distinctions in the Appellate Court, and to make it consist of Members whose attendance could always be relied upon. He would remove the present Chief Justices, the Chief Baron, and the Master of the Rolls altogether out of the Court of First Instance, and put them in the Appellate Court, and appoint as their successors the ordinary Judges of Appeal. In that way we should get a homogeneous Court of Appeal, of which the Lord Chancellor should be President, and the Lord Chief Justice of England Vice President. The Chief Justices, the Chief Baron, and the Master of the Rolls should continue in receipt of their present salaries, and their successors fall to the level of the rest of the Court. With them, he would associate four Judges of the Privy Council, two Lords Justices, and two Scotch and Irish Judges, and such of the ex-Chancellors as they could command the services of. That would form a fixed permanent tribunal, upon whose attendance we could count, and a Court which would command great respect. If they had three ex-Chancellors to attend, that would give them a fixed Court of 15; without them, it would be a Court of 12, and each division would never be less than five. Having offered those observations on the Court of Appeal, he would now proceed to say a few words with respect to the Court of First Instance, as proposed by the Bill. He apprehended that the object of the authors of the Bill was to do away with all distinctions of jurisdiction—to merge the Courts of First Instance into one homogeneous and harmonious whole, and give it universal jurisdiction, and in that he entirely concurred. That was done absolutely in the first four clauses of the Bill, but what he complained of was that in later clauses, that work of amalgamation was undone. It was like Penelope's web. A web was woven all night in order to be undone the next day. Why, in the name of common sense, were the Lord Chief Justice of Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, or the Master of the Rolls to be continued? It appeared if the Bill passed as it stood, the whole attempt which it made towards the fusion of Law and Equity would become in the end, a mere nullity. He was willing to agree to any arrangement of a transitional character to meet the present difficulties; but if they looked at the 5th clause they would find that it perpetuated and stereotyped the distinctions in the existing system. What was the object of these Divisions? The hon. and learned Gentleman said, very truly, that business must be distributed. Of course, it must; but to do that it was not necessary to stereotype Divisions of that character. They left the Court of Appeal to distribute its business according to time and circumstances, and why ought not the Court of First Instance to be allowed to act likewise? The reason for maintaining the offices of Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and Master of the Rolls appeared to be a matter of sentiment. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he did not like to change ancient names; but he was not so weak upon the ancient jurisdiction of the House of Lords. The fact was, the Bill had been spoilt by that desire of maintaining the dignity and the existence of these separate Chiefs in separate Courts. Looking at the measure from that point of view, it was not, he considered, that which the Government had originally intended to propose, but it had been modified to gratify the feelings of the Chief Judges of the Common Law Courts, and it was rather strange that there would be a Chief Baron without any Puisne Judges. The patronage clause would also show the spirit in which the measure had been framed. By the 80th clause the patronage of the Lord Chancellor, of all the Chief Judges, and of the Master of the Rolls, was to be exercised as heretofore, but the patronage of all the Puisne Judges was to be exercised in such manner as Her Majesty might by Sign Manual direct. Why was all the patronage of the Puisne Judges to be placed at the disposal of the Sign Manual? He ventured to suggest that all difficulty would be removed with reference to the maintenance of the dignity, emolument, and offices of the chiefs of the Divisions by removing them into the Appellate Court. These Chiefs of Divisions were of no use at all. Over whom was the Master of the Rolls to preside? By an Amendment he (Mr. Harcourt) perceived that the Master of the Rolls was to be made President of the First Division of the Court, but the Judges in Equity sat alone. The fact was that as the Lords Justices were going up to the Appellate Court, he would have to preside over himself, no doubt with great satisfaction to himself and the public at large. Why the thing was ludicrous in the extreme. To keep him to do the work of a Vice Chancellor, with no difference but in name, with a higher salary and dignity, savoured much of what might be called a job. A few words as to the financial results of the Bill. He ventured to say that the financial character of the Bill entirely depended upon keeping or doing away with these Divisions. If we kept these Divisions, we prevented that distribution of business to the best advantage, and that economy of labour which we could only get by having all the Judges on an equal footing without Divisions, so as to be able to distribute them to the best advantage. Moreover, if they could weld Equity and Common Law into a homogeneous whole, they would accomplish much, but that could not be done, if these Divisions were maintained. As to the consent of the hon. and learned Gentleman to provide for an increase of the Judicial Staff in Equity, he (Mr. Harcourt) regarded it as a sort of sop to the hon. Member the Cerberus for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). It was absurd to suppose that to enable a Common Law Judge to administer justice in a case in which an Equity question arose, it would be necessary for an Equity Judge to sit beside him to "coach" him in Equity. It was said, that the Common Law Judges knew nothing of Equity, and therefore it was supposed that by such a course, they would have to administer Equity under the guidance of an Equity dry-nurse, placing them very much in the condition of lay Lords in appeals in the House of Lords, who had a lawyer between them, who whispered in their ears what they were to say. The provisions of the Bill did not provide for what he called a fusion of Law and Equity, and the proposal of an Equity Judge for each of the Common Law Divisions was anything but a complimentary commentary on the scheme for legal education which was proposed last year by the present Lord Chancellor? He (Mr. Harcourt) did not admit that those who had received a good legal education were incapable of administering both Law and Equity. The hon. and learned Solicitor General, who was an Equity lawyer, and had never studied Common Law, never felt any difficulty in giving an opinion on rating or anything else, without a moment's hesitation, although sometimes he was not correct, as in a recent case, when he said that misdeameur was punishable with three years' imprisonment; but that, no doubt, was a venial error in an Equity barrister. The late Mr. Justice Willes, who had perhaps never been in a criminal Court in his life before his appointment as Judge, was enabled by a few months' study of "Russell on Crime," to become as competent to administer the criminal law as any barrister who had extensively practised at sessions. He, therefore, could not accept the statement, that a Common Law Judge was not capable of admininistering Equity without the assistance of an Equity dry-nurse. They had passed an Act to enable County Court Judges to administer Equity business, and yet Common Law Judges were not thought fit to do the same without having a "coach" beside them. If the Common Law Judges were incapable, who was to "coach" them? There must be some additional Judges to teach them their Equity lessons. How and when were the three Equity Judges who were to "coach" the Common Law Judges to be appointed? Were they to wait, until vacancies arose, in which case the public would suffer; or were they to be appointed at once, which would materially increase the working expenses? They could not arrange when the right man was to die, in the right direction, at the right time, to make a vacancy, and two things must happen: either they must create three additional Judges, or if not—four not being able to do the work of the country—the fusion of Law and Equity must come to an end. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire wished to have three additional Judges appointed in Chancery, but there was no provision to that effect in the Bill. If they made the whole of the Courts homogeneous they might do a great deal more work with fewer Judges; but before they proceeded much further with the Bill some estimate should be laid before the House of what was expected to be its financial consequence. He had looked at it very carefully, and he believed that, like all other measures of Law reform, it would only lead to an enormous increase in the Vote for Law and Justice. In all the Law reforms he had witnessed, he had invariably observed them accompanied with the creation of new offices. The same was the case here. The old places were kept up, new ones were created, and the expenditure enormously increased. If they wanted to establish a real fusion of Law and Equity, they must make a real fusion of the Staff as between the Common Law Courts and the Equity Courts. One great matter, which was at the bottom of all Law reform, was not dealt with by this measure at all, and that was the position of the Lord Chancellor. As long as they kept the head of the great judicial system in the position of a political officer, changing according to the vicissitudes of party, they would never have a judicial system worthy of the name. One of the necessary consequences of the passing of the Bill would be a reform in the office of Lord Chancellor; for it was impossible that one man could properly perform the duties of a Cabinet Minister, the Head of the Court of Appeal, a Judge of the First Instance, a man who had to look after clerical magistrates, to appoint clergy, and to see to lunatics, and all the miscellaneous duties which belonged to the office of Lord Chancellor. They were constructing a new system of Appellate Jurisdiction, with a weather vane at the top, changing with all the changes of party, and having decided on abolishing the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords there was no excuse for retaining the office of Lord Chancellor as a political office. The Bill had great merit in the object it aimed at, but it had great defects in its method of attempting to achieve those objects. He should like to remedy the defects of the existing system, but he was not at all disposed to accept the proposal that they should pass anything just because it was a reform. There was an attempt to deal summarily in getting through what might be said to be the only Bill of the Session; but that it was the only Bill of the Session, was the very reason why they should try to make it a useful measure, for the country had been 20 years getting a practical measure of Law Reform at all, and after this Bill passed it would probably be many years before the subject would be taken up again. It was said that the Bill contained powers of transformation, by which a great deal might be effected which the Bill did not do, because there were a number of influences at work which had deterred the Government from proposing to deal with them by the Bill. But would not these very influences prevent the Government from using the powers of transformation which the Bill contained? He wished the Bill had been framed with a bolder hand, and thought it was the duty of the House to strengthen the hands of the Government so as to enable them to make the Bill complete, and not to lose the best opportunity Parliament had ever had of passing a measure of Law Reform.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

Mr. HUNT believed that if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had been proceeded with, the defects of the measure would have proved so glaring that it would have been impossible for the Government to resist the proposal. He was never more surprised than when he heard the Prime Minister ask the House to go into Committee as upon an English Bill, with the understanding that when a particular clause was reached it should be turned into a Scotch and Irish Bill as well. There was some excuse for the faults of the measure in the part relating to the Appellate Jurisdiction, they had not the advantage of the same assistance from the Judicature Commission which they had enjoyed with respect to other portions of the Bill. He had always regretted that the question of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was not referred to that Commission. They had now arrived at the question—what they were to do? The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government invited the House to proceed with the Bill as it stood in Committee, with the intention of entirely altering it, as regarded the question of the appellate jurisdiction, on the Report. If they were to proceed on the assumption that the appellate jurisdiction was only to deal with English litigation, and were afterwards to deal with it as affecting Ireland and Scotland also, the House might just as well not have gone into Committee at all. The course proposed reminded him of a letter which, having given very minute instructions as to what was to be done, followed them up by a postscript saying—"Consider this letter as not written." The right course, as it appeared to him, had been suggested by his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli)—namely, to adjourn the debate now, so as to give the Government an opportunity of placing such Amendments on the Paper as might in their view make the Bill applicable to Ireland and Scotland, and then to instruct the Committee to alter the Bill accordingly. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government and the hon. and learned Attorney General did not appear at one with respect to what was to be done. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the necessary Amendments might be easily effected, while the Attorney General spoke of them as difficult and complicated. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: Important, but not complicated.] He was in the recollection of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman intimated that it would be necessary to have communications with persons in different parts of the United Kingdom as to the alterations to be made, and therefore that there would be delay. If the Amendments to be proposed were many and important the House ought to have them before going into Committee; on the other hand, if the Amendments were few and simple a very short time would suffice to enable the Government to put their views before the House. The greater part of the Bill was based upon the recommendations of the Judicature Commission, and therefore had his entire approbation; but he wanted to deal with the matter in a practical way. With regard to the 6th clause, for instance, which related to the constitution of the Court of Appeal, unless the House discussed it with reference to the appellate jurisdiction of that Court for all parts of the kingdom, it would be utterly impossible to deal with that clause at all. The clause dealt with three classes of Judges—ex officio, ordinary, and additional. The number of which the Court was to be composed must have reference to the business to be transacted, and if the appeals from Ireland and Scotland were to be added to the appeals contemplated when the Bill was drawn, Her Majesty's Government would have to state whether that additional business would not in their opinion require additional Judges. It was proposed that there should be five ex officio Judges of the Court of Appeal—the Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Master of the Rolls, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron. Then came the question how many ex officio Judges the Court was to have from Ireland and Scotland. If the number of ex officio Judges was increased, then the point would be raised whether their number would not be out of proportion to the number of the ordinary Judges. There was also an important clause, the 50th, which provided that the Court might sit in sections. Now, great difference of opinion existed as to whether the Court should sit in sections; but if it were determined that it should, the question would arise whether there should be a Scotch and Irish Judge in each section. There were no fewer than 26 Amendments on the 6th clause at present, but with the views announced by the Government he ventured to predict that several other Amendments would be added by Scotch and Irish Members. He felt it would be so utterly a waste of time to go into Committee until they had the Amendments of Her Majesty's Government on the Paper, that he begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Hunt.)

Mr. HENLEY wished, before the question of adjournment was decided, to call the attention of the House and the Government to one part of the Bill which seemed to be unfair and unjust to the Common Law Judges, and he had reason to know that those eminent and learned persons had that feeling themselves. By the Bill the Government constituted a High Court of Justice, and it was evidently their intention that those who composed it should be on an equality with regard to salary, because the Government bringing into that High Court of Justice one eminent person who received a much lower salary than the others, had raised his salary to the nominal amount which the other Judges received. The Common Law Judges attached to that Court, however, instead of being in receipt of £5,000 a-year, would, after paying certain necessary expenses, be in the inferior position of receiving only £4,500 a-year. The circuit business was daily increasing, and it was of the greatest importance that the Judges should be the most able and eminent men that could be got; but it was not likely that the services of the best men of the Bar could be obtained for that low sum. Another matter ought not to be lost sight of—namely, that these Judges would have to bear the circuit expenses, not only personal, but of the necessary staff. The salaries were fixed 40 years ago, and had relatively decreased, whilst the business cast upon these Judges had vastly increased. It would be most unfortunate that this experiment in its first trial should be attended by heartburnings, or any sense of unfairness on the part of any of the Members of the new Court; and he would appeal to the Government to consider that for a very small additional expense they might put all the Judges of the High Court upon an equal footing.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL observed that the reason why his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had objected to the adjournment of the debate was, that he apprehended it would interpose no inconsiderable delay in the progress of the Bill, and he hoped he was expressing the opinion of both sides of the House when he said that was not their desire. The sole reason for delay was that it was said, or supposed, that the alterations that would require to be made in the Bill would be of a structural and extensive character, and could not be readily adapted to the Bill after it had passed through Committee. That was not so. His right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate had gone carefully over the Bill; he had himself done the same; he believed only four clauses would require any alteration, and in these four a very slight amount of alteration was all that would be necessary. The Bill dealt largely with alterations in the constitution of the present English Courts of Appeal and First Instance, but the Government did not propose to interfere in the slightest degree with the judicature of Ireland and Scotland. All that was proposed to be done in acceding to the terms of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) was to transfer to the new Appellate Court the appellate jurisdiction now exercised by the House of Lords with regard to appeals from Ireland and Scotland. Two or three lines would be sufficient for that purpose; and the other alterations, which were simply with regard to the number of persons and the qualifications of the persons who would have to be added to the Court of Appeal, could be effected by a stroke of the pen. Perhaps the House might be in possession of the views of the Government by the time it arrived at the 6th clause, but even if it were not, it would be perfectly practicable and easy to settle the principle of the clause. It was suggested that there was a difference of opinion as to the Appellate Court sitting in sections, but it would be quite impossible for a single Court to dispose of any reasonable proportion of the business without sectional sittings. Nothing would be easier than to determine the number of the Judges of the Appeal Court having reference to England alone, and, afterwards to decide what addition should be made for Scotch and Irish appeals. There were to be provided for the present English appeals to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords. It had been said that in the case of the Scotch appeals, a Scotch Judge must be attached to the section which would have to hear those appeals. The number of appeals to the House of Lords each Session did not exceed 25, and it would be easy to place a Scotch Judge in the section before which they would be brought. If the House would go into Committee, they would not find any of the difficulties which had been suggested, insurmountable or even serious. He purposely abstained from replying to the long speech which the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) had evidently prepared for the second reading of the Bill, both because time would not allow of his doing so, and because he intended to deal with some of its criticisms in Committee. He hoped the House would not delay the Bill merely for the sake of ascertaining beforehand the exact terms of the Amendment the Government wished to make.

MR. NEWDEGATE protested against such extensive changes being made in the principle of the Bill, without due Notice having been given. The Amendments which were spoken of as only requiring a stroke of the pen would be essential alterations in substance, as much as substituting the name of the American President for that of the Queen in an Oaths Bill. He hoped the House would not consent to proceed any further with the Bill, at all events, until it should be seen what was the scheme of the Government with respect to the constitution of the Final Court of Appeal, that being the point upon which everything turned.

MR. MATTHEWS protested against proceeding with the Bill until the scheme of the Government should be placed upon paper. The hon. and learned Solicitor General would not deny that the Amendments of the Government were important; and surely the Government were not going to alter our whole judicial system without having a scheme of their own. Did they know what changes they were going to propose? If so, why need any time be lost? Were Scotland and Ireland to retain their intermediate Courts of Appeal—for they had them—while those of England were swept away? Was it intended to do away with the Irish Court of Exchequer Chamber? [THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I stated that we proposed no such alterations.] In any case, what was the use of discussing Amendments on the subject of the number of Members of the Court of Appeal, if the number must be altered when the whole scheme of the Government was produced? If intermediate appeals were to be retained in Scotland and Ireland, it was manifest that English rules would not be applicable to Irish and Scotch appeals, and the Bill would have to be remodelled in a great measure. Time ought to be allowed to hon. Members to consult their constituencies on the subject. Before the Committee of the House of Lords the Lord Advocate had said—

“In my opinion, taking into account all I have heard from others upon the subject, to allow an appeal from the Scotch Courts to any tribunal other than the House of Lords would offend the sentiment of the Scotch people.”

He believed that the Irish people would also object strongly to appeals from the Irish Court of Exchequer Chamber going to any such Court of Appeal as that proposed in the Bill.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 170; Noes 192: Majority 22.

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. RAIKES said, that, having had no opportunity of expressing his views on the second reading of the Bill, he wished to make a few remarks with regard to the Amendments which he had put on the Paper, as well as on the position in which the House had been placed by the course which the Government had taken with respect to the measure. He presumed from the course which the Government had taken that they were prepared to revolutionize the system of procedure, not only in the English, but also in the Irish and in the Scotch Courts of Law, otherwise we should be placed in the extraordinary position of having new rules which would have effect under the Court of Appeal in England, but would not have effect in the Irish and Scotch Courts of First Instance, so that decisions in the latter would often be quashed in the former. The Bill also provided for an alteration of the law which had hitherto prevailed in the Admiralty Courts. In fact, upon that subject a change of law was proposed, largely affecting international questions, and at variance with the rules generally recognized by civilized nations, so that there was danger of our getting involved in all sorts of international difficulties. In like manner if they were to make the new Court of Appeal the Court of Appeal for Ireland and Scotland, they would also have to make the 22nd clause extend to the proceedings which had to be taken in all the inferior Courts of both countries, and that would necessitate the re-modelling of the whole Scotch law of which that House was profoundly ignorant. Another point required careful consideration. There was a general opinion that a Minister of Justice was required in this country, and there was an almost equal consensus of opinion that the Lord Chancellor should be that Minister. But that duty could not be imposed upon him when the Bill burdened him by making him President of the Court of Appeal and of the High Court of Justice. In his opinion, it should have been the object of the Bill gradually to withdraw the Lord Chancellor from judicial functions, and concentrate his attention upon his political duties. He had, therefore, given Notice of an Amendment to take the Lord Chancellor from the High Court of Justice, and leave the Lord Chief Justice of England as President of that Court. In the course of time, the Lord Chancellor might probably come to be as little connected with the Court of Appeal as the Chancellor of the Exchequer was with the Court with which he was nominally connected. One anomaly would strike most hon. Members. The Court of Appeal was to supersede the Privy Council for Indian Appeals, and yet it was to be so constituted that Her Majesty would be unable to call to it any Judge who had been a Judge in India until there had been a death vacancy among the first Members of the Court. He therefore proposed that it should be competent to Her Majesty to nominate as additional Members any Judges who had held judicial offices in India qualifying them now to be Members of the Judicial Committee. Another anomaly in the Bill was, that it ignored the head of the Common Law in Ireland, and made him ineligible as a Judge of the Court of Appeal. That slight ought not to be cast upon him. He submitted that in addition to the Judges named, the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland should be appointed to take part in the judicial proceedings of that tribunal. He was glad to see that the Attorney General proposed to remove the business of the Court of Bankruptcy from the already overworked Court of Chancery; but he regretted that it should have been transferred to the Court of Exchequer, instead of to the Fifth Division, which might be made a much more useful body than it would be under the Bill. The Fifth Division would consist of the Judges of the Probate and Admiralty Courts, whereas each of the other Divisions would consist of five Judges. He proposed to transfer three Common Law Judges to the Fifth Division, and assign to it the Bankruptcy business and the trial of Election Petitions, as well as the Probate and Divorce cases. That Court would then have to decide upon the personal status of parties; it might almost be called a Correctional Court. He had taken this opportunity of explaining his Amendments en bloc, hoping that they might thus be more clearly understood and better considered.

Mr. BOURKE said, the questions in issue were of great importance, requiring consideration, and he would therefore move the Adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said, the Question before the House was, that he do now leave the Chair.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble postponed.

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Commencement of Act).

Mr. BOURKE, in proposing as an Amendment, that the Act should commence in November, 1875, instead of 1874, said, he thought the Bill could not be satisfactorily framed, unless the House knew exactly what was going to be done with the County Courts. The question of the County Courts had been considered by the Judicature Commission, and dove-tailed into the larger question of the Supreme Courts. The Bill proposed to introduce great changes with regard to the circuits. The arrangements recommended by the Judicature Commissioners with reference to the County Courts would materially interfere with the circuits. Therefore, he thought no alteration ought to be made in the circuits until those arrangements had been considered. By the Bill Law and Equity were to be fused in the Superior Courts; but the County Courts were to continue to sit as Courts of Law and as Courts of Equity. If, however, the jurisdiction of the County Courts was to be changed, that would alter the opinion of hon. Members as to the necessity of appointing additional Judges. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had recommended that commercial cases should be tried by Tribunals of Commerce in connection with County Courts. He should like to know whether that recommendation was likely to be adopted, because if it were adopted, the number of County Courts would have to be doubled, and the necessity of appointing additional Superior Judges would be diminished.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, to leave out the words "one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four," and insert the words "one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five;"—(Mr. Bourke.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that with the greatest respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman, he could hardly think he was serious in proposing that the operation of the scheme for the improvement of the Superior Courts should be delayed until an alteration was made in the County Court system.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 25; Majority 40.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Union of existing Courts into one Supreme Court); and Clause 4 (Division of Supreme Court into a Court of original and a Court of appellate jurisdiction), agreed to.

Clause 5 (Constitution of High Court of Justice).

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY proposed as an Amendment in page 2, line 12, after "follows," to leave out the words "the first Judges thereof," and insert "there shall be five ex-officio and eighteen ordinary Judges thereof; the ex-officio Judges." The object he had in view in proposing that and other Amendments, to follow in the same clause, was in the first instance to define the constitution of the Court, and then to declare who should be the first Judges appointed to it. This was the course proposed to be adopted in Clause 6, with reference to the Court of Appeal, and it was desirable that there should be uniformity. If the Amendments were carried the Court would include the additional Vice Chancellor provided for in the Bill as it came down from the House of Lords.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, in opposing the Amendment said, that as to the appointment of an additional Vice Chancellor, the Government were of opinion that it would not be expedient to make such an appointment. No mention was made of it in the Bill as it originally stood, and the provision with regard to it was made on an Amendment moved in the other House of Parliament by Lord Cairns, under a misapprehension by that noble Lord of what was intended to be done as to the Master of the Rolls. He had since looked into the question very carefully, and he was quite prepared to admit that if an additional Vice Chancellor were needed, considerations of the mere saving of money ought not to be allowed to enter into the matter. The cost was, at the same time, by no means an immaterial element in the question, and he found that an additional Vice Chancellor, including his staff of clerks, secretary, train-bearer, and other officers, would cost £15,815, besides a charge for pensions which would not be immediate, of about £4,000, making a total of nearly £20,000 a-year. The next point to be considered was, was the new Vice Chancellor wanted? For, if so, even £20,000 a-year ought not to be allowed to stand in the way of his appointment. Lord Cairns gave several reasons in favour of his proposal, alleging, among other things, that there was a large accumulation of business and very large arrears, which were increasing, in the Court of Chancery. He thought, however, he should be able to satisfy the Committee that the business of the Court had not increased, and the arrears were not increasing. In a letter to The Times from a practising solicitor, it was stated there were 507 cases standing for hearing before the Court of Chancery, and that it would take three years to get through them. Now, at the average rate of proceeding, the Court of Chancery disposed of upwards of 1,000 long causes in each legal year, or nine months' sittings, and instead of occupying three years, the 507 causes in question would occupy only four months and a-half. In proof that there was no increase of arrears within the last five years, the Master of the Rolls had twice to his certain knowledge, and he believed thrice, risen for want of business; and Lord Hatherley's experience when a Vice Chancellor was of a similar character, for he had also risen during that period from the same cause. Again, the Government intended to appoint three lawyers acquainted with Equity to the Common Law Courts, and if there was any accidental pressure, it would therefore be possible to relieve it by sending an additional Judge to the Chancery Division. Another objection raised, was that when evidence was taken vidæ voce, this would necessarily lengthen the time occupied by causes, and therefore they would not be able to dispose of as many causes in the Court of Chancery as they had been in the habit of doing. But he was not at all certain of that. The great causes which took a long time in hearing were generally of two or three classes, such as infringements of patents, obstruction of ancient lights, and the like. These, however, were properly Common Law actions, and ought never to come into Equity at all. Under the new Bill, they would be tried in the Common Law Courts, and he did not believe, when they took away from it all the Common Law actions, that the business of the Court of Chancery would be at all increased by introducing vidæ voce evidence in the rare cases where it was wanted in an Equity suit. Moreover, the Chancery Division was not meant to be permanent, but merely transitional; and it was hoped in a short period, perhaps about 10 years, to obtain this result—that both practitioners and Judges would have become sufficiently familiar with the principles of Equity to administer it in a satisfactory manner in all the Courts. Something might be done in the meantime to diminish the arrears. Even now the whole number of causes ready for hearing could be disposed of in about four months. The number of arrears must be distinguished from the number of causes set down for hearing, and if the Judges sat six weeks more, in two years he believed they could dispose of the whole of the arrears. The Court of Chancery sat 27 weeks, and it would be no great hardship if it sat three weeks more in each year. The Return which he had obtained would bear out his statement that the business of the Court of Chancery was not increasing. The total number of causes set down for the five years ending Michaelmas, 1871, averaged about 2,000 a-year. The number set down for 1867 was 2,108, and for 1871, 2,194. Of those about three-fifths were long causes. The average number disposed of each week was 82, of which 50 were long causes. Then, again, the Petitions filed, and which were what was called Attendable—that was to say, not Petitions of Course—amounted in 1863 to 2,673, while in 1871 they amounted to 2,430, being 600 below the highest number reached in any intervening year. The total number of special orders of all kinds made on Motions, Causes, and Petitions in 1862 was 5,753; in 1871 it was 5,853; and it varied between those figures from 1868 to 1870. The Return as to bills filed further bore out the assertion that the business of the Court had not increased. In 1862 the number of bills filed was 2,177, whereas in 1871 it fell to 2,015. He might be told that, although the work to be done had not increased, there were at the beginning of Easter Term 46 causes more in arrear, but that had arisen from the fact that one Judge had retired from failing health, and another was, unfortunately ill. The Returns showed that there had been no increase worth mentioning in Chamber business during the five years from 1868 to 1872. The Court of Chancery had been for some years oppressed by orders for winding-up public companies, but that business also was slowly wearing out. The result of his statistics was that in no branch of Chancery business had there been any increase, and that there had been no increase of arrears except during the last five months, and no increase even then when compared with the commencement of the previous five years. There had, therefore, been no increase in the total business in Chancery requiring the aid of an additional Judge. The increase in the last few months had been partly owing to the painful circumstances which he had already mentioned, and partly to accidental causes and the great complaints had arisen from the fact that at Trinity Term this year there was set down for hearing the largest number of causes that had been known for some years, being 74 more than at Trinity Term last year. He did not believe there was any great Court of Judicature in the world which could give so good an account of itself with respect to arrears as the English Court of Chancery. A single cause might from various circumstances get behind; but the average length of time a cause remained in that Court was not six months from the time it was set down—an interval which his learned friends in the Common Law Courts told him would compare very favourably with the progress of business there. He submitted, then, that no case had been made out for the appointment of an additional Judge. He was satisfied, with Lord Hatherley, that with ordinary industry on the part of the Judges, and with the ordinary run of causes, there would be no necessity for this additional Judge. And he saw no reason to doubt the possibility that by the time this Bill came into operation as an Act—namely, by November, 1874—the Judges might rise before Christmas in that year for want of business. For these reasons he trusted the Committee would negative the Amendment.

MR. GREGORY said, he was very much surprised at the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, and he had no doubt the public would be equally surprised. That was said to be a Bill for the fusion of Law and Equity, and for the relief of the suitor, by saving him from being bandied about from one Court to another. But was that a Bill for the fusion of Law and Equity? It could not for a moment be thought so. For what did the hon. and learned Gentleman say? That we were to hope that, by means of the Bill, in the course of 10 or 12 years the practitioners would be so educated in its principles that they would be able to carry them into effect. Therefore, that was a Bill for the education of Judges at the expense of the suitor, who in the meantime would be bandied backward and forward, as it was said he was now. He ventured to think that the discussion which had occurred that evening would give the public a very different opinion regarding this Bill from that expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General with a feeling of astonishment. It appeared to him to be an apt illustration of the saying that there was nothing so fallacious as figures except facts. He had undertaken to prove two propositions—first, that there was no present block in the Court of Chancery; and secondly, that the business of that Court had not sensibly increased of late years. Now, in the Court in which he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) practised—that of Vice-Chancellor Wickens—they had not touched a single new cause since Easter, having been occupied for the last two months and a half in disposing of Motions, Petitions, and Further Considerations. During the same period the Court of Vice-Chancellor Malins had been occupied in hearing nothing but Motions, Petitions, and Summonses. The fact was, there never was such a block in the Court of Chancery as at present. The number of causes set down for hearing last Term were no fewer than 600; 150 more than were ever set down for hearing at the same time of the year before. With regard to the increase of business in the Court of Chancery, his hon. and learned Friend had quoted Returns for five years only, beginning with 1867, which was an exceptional year. But a wider area should be taken. During the last nine years the number of causes set down had steadily increased from 1,844 in 1863 to 2,275 in 1871—an increase of 431, or 23 to 24 per cent. Such an increase would justify an increase of the staff to the extent proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Surrey (Sir Richard Baggallay). But it was in Chambers that the chief pressure of business had been felt during the last few years. The amount of business transacted there had increased between 60 and 70 per cent, and it was obvious, seeing that there had been no increase in the staff of officials, that the same amount of care and time could not have been bestowed on the work done. The Judges were worn out with Court work before they went into Chambers, and the rapid way in which the work done there—sometimes quite as important as that which was transacted in Court was disposed of—had given rise to a wide-spread belief that business in Chambers was being “scamped.” The business had increased to so great an extent that some of the Judges had absolutely broken down under it—they could not go on any longer under such a terrible strain. Under these circumstances, he thought it a most reasonable demand that the strength of the Court should be re-inforced in proportion to the increase of business.

MR. C. E. LEWIS, after referring to the sweeping character of the changes made in 1852 in the Court of Chancery, said, that Bill went to the opposite extreme, crystallized the present system in its worst possible form, kept everything in the old groove, and even aggravated matters by allotting to Equity, causes in which Courts of Common Law exercised an effective jurisdiction—such as the rectification and cancellation of deeds and cases of specific performance of contract. If the 31st clause were to stand, moreover, no case was made out for the appointment of an additional Vice Chancellor. Three classes of cases were mainly chargeable with delays in the Court of Chancery—namely, patent cases, air and light cases, and cases connected with the sewage arrangement of large towns. He wished to refer to one scandal connected with the transaction of Chamber business in the Court of Chancery. Few hon. Members were aware of the way in which Vice Chancellors were driven to conduct their business. They had to dispose of it at 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon, after a heavy day's work, and some of the business was really important—such as the custody of infants and the maintenance of wards, and it ought to be transacted by a Vice Chancellor sitting in Chambers one day a-week. He, therefore, hoped that some provision would be made for compelling Judges of the Chancery Division to sit regularly in Chambers, not at the fag end of the day's work in Court, but separately, on certain days throughout the legal year. He was not impressed with the statistics of the hon. and learned Solicitor General. At least, it would be a novel experience to find 507 litigated causes disposed of in four months and a-half. Neither did he agree with him that they ought to congratulate themselves upon the speed with which business was disposed of in the Court of Chancery. The fact was, that the state of business in that Court was most unsatisfactory, though no doubt there were now exceptional causes for that state of things. Unless the 31st clause was altered in Committee—and he did not anticipate it would be—he could not vote for the appointment of an additional Vice Chancellor.

MR. HINDE PALMER wished to know whether the House of Commons ought to reverse the decision of the House of Lords, with respect to having an additional Judge of the Court of Chancery? He believed that an additional Judge was absolutely essential to the fair working of the measure; and in order to get rid of the arrears which had accumulated; and, therefore, although he was strongly opposed to any unnecessary expenditure of the public money, he should vote for the addition, believing that the expense of delay in the Court of Chancery was of more importance than the expense of the additional Judge.

DR. BALL said, he should support the proposition in favour of the appointment of an additional Judge, because he thought if two changes were made in other parts of the Bill, everybody would perceive that there ought to be an additional Judge in the First Division. There were six Judges in the Chancery Division, whereas the other Divisions only had five. Now, he would remove the Lord Chancellor from the First Division, because he held a strong opinion that the Appellate Judges ought not to sit in the Courts of First Instance, from which the appeals came. Under the present arrangement, the Lord Chancellor of England would actually be liable to have his judgment reversed in that Appellate Court by three Puisne Judges taken out of the Law Courts, and appointed to the office of Lord Justice. He maintained that the Lord Chancellor ought not to be brought into so humiliating a position, and consequently he would take him out of the First Division. There was another change which ought to be made. The 14th section excluded from the operation of the Bill the Equity jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster. Now, if the business of that Court were transferred by the Bill to the new Court, there would be an increase of business which the hon. and learned Solicitor General had not alluded to at all, and if the business were not transferred, why should it not be? [The SOLICITOR GENERAL said the original jurisdiction remained.] If that were so, the 22nd section made ten changes in the law which would not operate in the Palatine Court. Why should the exceptional jurisdiction of that Court be preserved? He submitted to his hon. and learned Friends, that they would promote justice by making the changes he had indicated, and they might then leave the additional Judge who had been introduced by the Lords.

MR. W. FOWLER thought the taking of all the evidence in Chancery vid. roce would involve a large amount of additional work in the Court, and strongly condemned the proposal that actions might be directed to be tried at Law after proceedings had been commenced in Equity. Having listened to the statistics of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, and to the practical argument of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. E. Lewis) he was decidedly of opinion that the additional Judge was necessary. The bankruptcy business would require another Judge unless the present block in that part of the business was to continue, and if business which properly belonged to a Judge was no longer to be transacted by Registrars. He was informed that the Government had a new plan in reserve by which Chamber business was to be conducted by gentlemen perfectly competent to discharge the duties, although they were not so highly trained as were the Judges, and he trusted that some legal authority on the Treasury bench would explain that plan to the Committee. In his opinion, the present state of the Chamber business of the Court of Chancery was discreditable to the country; and, unless something was done to effect a satisfactory clearance of that business, more Judges must be appointed. He would suggest that it would be better if the vote were taken on the proposal of the hon. and learned Attorney General, instead of on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Raikes).

MR. F. S. POWELL hoped that the Equity jurisdiction of the County Palatine of Lancaster would not be abolished. As a native of the county, he could assert that its abolition would be regarded with dismay.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, much might be said in favour of the retention of the Court of the Counties Palatine of Lancaster and Durham; but at the same time, if there was to be a fusion of Law and Equity, he could not see why these Courts should be preserved. As to making an additional Vice Chancellor he did not see the necessity for that if the Bill should pass in its present form.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY, in reply, said, that nothing could be more delusive than the hon. and learned Solicitor General's statistics. In opposition to those statistics, he submitted the actual number of cases in arrear on the same day in the years 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, and they were respectively 302, 461, 431, and 536. A Court of Equity, disposing of 50 cases a-week, with the evidence already taken, and a subsequent reference to Chambers to take voluminous accounts, was altogether a different thing from a Court of Common Law taking evidence and disposing of a matter once for all. The Judges ought to spend more time in Chambers, and they ought to do work which was now done by the chief clerks. He thought that the course which the present discussion had taken showed the inconvenience of proceeding with the consideration of the constitution of the High Court, before the Committee were in possession of the views of the Government with regard to the Court of Appeal. It was proposed that the Master of the Rolls should be made a Judge of the Court of Appeal, as well as a Judge of the High Court of Justice. In that case, either the Court of Appeal would lose the services of one of the Equity Judges, or they would have one of the Equity Judges shorn of the proper amount of time necessary for dealing with Equity cases in the first instances. With regard to the suggestion thrown out by some hon. Gentlemen, it certainly did appear to him that it would be more convenient to take the decision of the Committee on the specific proposition of the hon. and learned Attorney General than upon his own Amendment. Accordingly, if the Committee deemed it desirable to decide the question upon a subsequent Amendment, he was willing to withdraw the Amendment. He did not himself desire to do so, but he placed himself in the hands of the Committee. ["No, no!"]

MR. VERNON HARCOURT hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. and learned Member was prepared to withdraw it; but the head of the Government had expressed his determination to prevent him withdrawing it, and so a division must be taken.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he thought it would be highly inconvenient that the division should be taken on the Amendment, because some hon. Gentlemen, who might be disposed to go with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Surrey (Sir Richard Baggallay) on the general proposition, would not be able to vote with him. At the same time, if the Government preferred that course, which was not generally considered the most courteous course, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would allow his Amendment to be negatived without a division.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was much obliged to the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) for the construction he put upon the motives of the Government; but there was no discourtesy in any hon. Member objecting to an Amendment being negatived, and there might be good reason for exercising the right on this occasion. The Business of the House would be seriously impeded, if a proposal was to be debated at great length and then withdrawn, without any opinion being expressed upon it.

Amendment negatived.

MR. RAIKES proposed, as an Amendment in page 2, line 12, to leave out the words "Lord Chancellor," with a view to restoring the Bill to its original form, in which the Lord Chancellor was not named as a Judge of the High Court of Justice. To save the salary of a Vice Chancellor by requiring the Lord Chancellor to sit in the Court below, was like saving the salary of a Secretary to the Treasury by requiring the Prime Minister to discharge the duties of a Secretary. He thought it would not be conducive to the dignity of the Lord Chancellor to occupy the position of a Judge of First Instance, and be liable to have his judgments overturned by Judges of inferior dignity. The inconvenience of such a state of things might be seen in the practice of the existing Lord Chancellor who combined the function of Judge of a Court of First Instance and also of Appeal, for at present he was also acting Master of the Rolls, and by the present Bill there was a possibility of perpetuating such a system.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could take no exception to the Amendment, as the Lord Chancellor was placed in that position by an Amendment proposed by Lord Cairns, in the other House, with the object of preventing the Lord Chancellor from being a stranger in his own Court. It was not an important matter, and although he preferred the Bill as it originally stood, it would in its altered shape, only leave the Lord Chancellor in the position he now occupied. At present, he exercised an original jurisdiction, and was liable to have his judgments appealed against to the House of Lords. There was nothing derogatory in the clause, and he thought it would be better to retain it as it was.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN suggested that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and that the hon. Mover should wait until the Committee had decided how the 28th clause was to stand.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT pointed out that the Lord Chancellor, as the Bill stood, was not made President of the High Court of Appeal; but there was only a clause that the Lord Chief Justice should preside in his absence. He thought the original proposal of the Government was a far better one than the alteration made by the other House.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL remarked that there existed a power in the Bill, by which the Divisions could be done away with by Order of Council. The Divisions were only temporary, and were intended to bridge over the time till the Act got into full working. There were several reasons why they should retain the Lord Chancellor in the clause.

DR. BALL supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chester (Mr.

Sir Richard Baggallay

Raikes) holding that it would be well to keep the Appellate Judges in their own sphere, and leave the other Judges in theirs.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that although he desired to defer as far as possible to alterations in the original Bill, made on the recommendation of so high an authority as Lord Cairns, he was not prepared to oppose an Amendment which agreed with the original view the Government took of the matter, and which met with the general concurrence of the Committee.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 13, the omission of the words "the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer." If the Committee adopted the clause as it stood, they would maintain and perpetuate Divisions of the Court which would virtually leave matters just as they were at present; for the clause not only referred to the high judicial functionaries in question now in office, but also to "their successors." It was, therefore, no temporary provision, but one that might be, and he believed would be, continued. His object was to make the Court of First Instance a homogeneous Court, and to strengthen the Court of Final Appeal by removing to it entirely, the Judges named in his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, to leave out the words, "the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer."—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

MR. SERJEANT SIMON supported the Amendment on the ground that if the Divisions were retained, they would simply result in a change of name. The principle of the Bill was the so-called, or he should say mis-called fusion of Law and Equity, and that object would be defeated, if its provisions were not altered in the direction which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) had pointed out. If the proposed Divisions were established Equity and Law would be as distinct in the future as they were at present, and the Bill, if it became law, would simply be a delusion. For who would commence an Equity suit in any of the Common Law Divisions whilst there was the Equity Division subsisting with its Judges specially versed in Equity learning, with all its officers and administrative arrangements adapted to Equity purposes just as at present? He differed from the Solicitor General in his interpretation of the 29th section. Under that section Her Majesty in Council it was true might, on the Report of the Judges, increase or diminish the present number of Divisions; but the same section gave power to increase as well as reduce the number of Judges attached to any Division, and there was nothing to limit the increase of appointments recommended by the Judges. It was said that in the course of time the Judges of the Common Law Courts would acquire such a knowledge of Equity as would qualify them to administer it; and, on the other hand, that the Judges of the Equity Courts would become equally competent to administer the Common Law; but he denied that the objects which the advocates of this part of the Bill had in view would be attained. He was willing that the Bill should have a trial, but if it passed in its present shape, he believed that all the hopes and aspirations which had been so long entertained of bringing Law and Equity under one common jurisdiction would be disappointed. He believed that the Bill, unless it were amended in this respect, would prove inefficient, and would fail to fulfil the purposes which it purported to effect. For these reasons he should support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, his hon. and learned Friend who had just addressed the Committee had fallen into a great mistake in the views he had expressed on the question of the fusion of Law and Equity. He had, with others, erroneously argued as if the transitional state of things under this Bill would be permanent. Many attempts in the nature of a fusion of Law and Equity had been made during the last 16 or 12 years, but there was a broad distinction between the Bill and all previous legislation. The object of the Bill was to bring about a fusion of Law and Equity, so that the suitors might have complete justice done to them in any one of the Courts to which they might go, and to have one Court of Appeal so constituted that all the most learned and eminent of the Judges should be members of it. Let the House consider what the fusion of Law and Equity meant. It was a system of jurisprudence under which any Court should administer complete justice from the beginning to the end of a suit or cause. The meaning of keeping up these Divisions was, that in the state of transition it would suit the convenience of the suitor to go to a certain Court for one species of relief and to another Court for another species of relief; but it mattered nothing whether the proposed Divisions remained, or whether the number of Judges would be diminished, because if any suitor went into the Common Law Division to ask for some equitable relief the Court would be bound to give it, and if he went into the Equity Division for relief at Common Law the Court would be bound to administer the Common Law, or else it would be set right by the Court of Appeal. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) would by depriving the Appellate Court of the presence of the Chief Judges weaken its authority. The object, however, of the hon. and learned Gentleman was, that the services of the Judges of the Appellate Court should be confined to that Court; but that, in his (Mr. Walpole's) opinion, would impair the influence of the Court instead of increasing it. The two important elements of a Court of Appeal were that the Judges should be independent of the Court below; and, secondly, that they should be familiar with the practice of those Courts; and to take away either of those elements would impair the whole. Entertaining those opinions he could not concur in the views of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, or in those of the hon. and learned Serjeant who had just spoken.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN also opposed the Amendment. It was acknowledged that the present number of Courts of First Instance were not sufficient to transact all the business, and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman would cut the staff down still further. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University had stated two reasons why the attempts which had been hitherto made to bring about a fusion of Law and Equity had failed; but there was a third reason, and that was that we had not men who had been trained in the principles of both Law and Equity, so as to enable them to deal with the questions of Law and Equity that came before them. During a period of transition the Judges must be taken as they were. By degrees both the Bench and the Bar would obtain the necessary training, to enable them to deal with all questions indiscriminately, and perhaps by the time the hon. and learned Gentleman obtained his seat on the Woolsack the Judges themselves would be able to carry out, what in the abstract he would admit to be the true and correct scheme—namely, the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. HINDE PALMER observed that the Amendment was directed to sweeping away all distinction between Law and Equity by getting rid of Divisions in the Court. Now, if these Divisions were to be in any sense permanent, he should be inclined to agree with those who thought it would be a great disadvantage to sanction them, but he looked upon them simply as necessarily of a provisional character. He did not think that without those Divisions, by way of initiation, they could possibly get such a scheme as this to work at all. He pointed out that the Divisions offered no obstruction to the general principle of the Bill—namely, the concurrent administration of Law and Equity, for the Bill expressly provided that the suitor should have full relief given to him by whatever tribunal to which he might resort. For those reasons, he could not support the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) proposed to omit the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer from the operation of the clause. In doing that he would destroy the divisions of which he complained. As far as that matter was concerned, the Bill represented no more than the direct recommendations of the Judicature Commission, carried into effect by the present Lord Chancellor, and sanctioned by Lord Cairns, Lord Hatherley, and Lord Chelmsford, none of whom could be called bunglers in legislation. It was in vain, he supposed, for him to say over and over again that the Bill regarded these Divisions as only temporary, for the purpose of bridging over a period of transition. The Bill was to come into operation on the 1st of November, 1874, and at that time there would be in existence the Court of Chancery, the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, the Court of Exchequer, the Court of Admiralty, and the other Courts, all having business brought to a certain state of completion, and a number of suitors pressing to have their causes brought on. To talk of the fusion of Law and Equity was to talk ignorantly. Law and Equity were two things inherently distinct, and the distinction was not capable of being destroyed by Act of Parliament. All they could do was to secure that the suitor who went to one Court for his remedy should not be sent about his business without the relief which he could have got in another Court. Would the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) wish that, without regard to common sense and the nature of things, one single Court should be made into a sort of hotchpot, and all property should be handed over, without respect to the nature of the business, now to one Judge now to another? What was intended was not to destroy the Courts of Equity or the Courts of Law, but to take care that in every Court, whether of Law or Equity, if the Equity case raised legal questions they should be there decided, and if the legal case raised equitable questions they should be there decided. In fact, the 21st section laid down in the plainest terms what was to be done if the Bill became law, and showed that the object was not that Law and Equity should be fused, but that they should be concurrently administered. Her Majesty in Council was to be empowered to reduce or increase the number of Divisions, or the number of Judges in any of the Divisions; and it was also provided that all causes commenced in or transferred to the High Court should be distributed among the Divisions in such a manner as might be from time to time determined by rules of Court, or orders of transfer made under the authority of the Act, in such a manner that there should be no longer conflicts of opinion upon the subject. Then came the section which enacted that subject to the rules of Court, the different Divisions should have those matters assigned to them which common sense would assign to them. This was not bungling, but simple, intelligible, common-sense legislation. There were different matters to be dealt with, and they were to be assigned to the Courts which were eminently fit to deal with them, subject only to the great improvement that there should not be a conflict of jurisdiction, but that the Court should yield a perfect remedy to everybody who had recourse to it. It was said no change was made in the names of the Courts; but what necessity was there for doing so when the nature of things was changed and an entirely new jurisdiction introduced to prevent a great waste of time and money and acute suffering to suitors? Then, again, it was of greater importance than people generally supposed that there should be places which would tempt the more eminent men in the legal profession to leave the Bar and go to the Bench; but the Amendment for the gain of £2,000 a-year to two people would sacrifice historical positions which were among the most valued prizes of the profession. Under the influence of those opinions, he could not accept the Amendment.

MR. JAMES cordially supported the Amendment, which he regarded as of great importance in the public interest. The demand for reform in the judicial system arose not so much from the cost as from the delay of the present procedure; and unless they could increase the judicial strength by numerical addition, or by economizing the power at their disposal, the evils the Bill professed to remedy would remain intact. They had at present 18 Judges; but their respective duties were so arranged that their legal business was in a most unsatisfactory condition. He could see no necessity for insisting upon dividing the Court into three Divisions and perpetuating the distinction between the different Courts of Common Law. His hon. and learned Friend put his objection to the Amendment, on the ground that if it were to be adopted in that transition state of things, a chaotic condition of affairs would be produced. But we should have this chaotic condition of affairs of which his hon. and learned Friend was so much afraid whenever the change was made. The Bill was one of transition, and time was given for effecting the change, for the Act would not come into operation until 1874. The hon. and learned Attorney General also said that the Bill simply introduced a transition state of things; but if the Committee looked to the 80th clause, the effect was quite otherwise; it was to perpetuate the patronage of the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron to all time, while the same consideration was not shown to the Puisne Judges. Higher salaries were to be retained for these inferior Courts, while no allurements were held out for members of the Bar to join the less adequately paid, though superior Appellate Tribunal. He quite admitted that the members of the legal profession would be in favour of retaining those high names to which the Bill gave its sanction; but the Members of that House, when passing a measure of legal reform, ought to put the interest of the public before that of the legal profession. He would prefer the Amendment to apply to the Court of Chancery rather than to the Common Law Courts, and in that sense he hoped it would be pressed to a division.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he should like to know what right the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) had to arrogate to himself the monopoly of public spirit among the members of the legal profession? What right had he to tell hon. and learned Gentlemen that they preferred the interest of their profession to that of the public? What right had he to insinuate that they were influenced by greed, by avarice, by desire of personal aggrandizement, and were not desirous as far as in them lay to legislate in the interest of the public? He altogether denied the right of the hon. and learned Gentleman to make any such insinuation. If he believed that any Member of the Committee would impute to him any such motives, he would never have the face to address the House again. The hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harecourt) had said that certain things to which he objected were put into the Bill to please the Chief Justices. But what was the answer that the Attorney General gave him? Why, that it was contrary to what he ought to have known to be true; these things were put into the Bill simply to carry out the recommendations of the Judicature Commission. His hon. and learned Friend had, on a former occasion, proposed that there should be two Chiefs, one with £8,000, and the other with £7,000 a-year. But he had since abandoned that proposition, and now he wanted only one Chief. Was it for his hon. and learned Friend who had changed his own opinion so often, to reproach those who had shown some little deference to the Report of the Judicature Commission? If his hon. and learned Friend was at liberty to change his opinion twice in the course of 12 months, they could not be accused of wilful blindness if they adhered to their first opinion. Now as to the public, he had always held that the legal profession existed for the benefit of the public—for the effectual economical and speedy administration of justice. He believed that, even taking the lowest and the most avaricious view of the matter, it would be found that to improve the administration of justice would increase the gains of the profession by causing an increase of litigation; but taking a higher view—namely, the interest of the public, it was of the utmost importance that the seats on the Bench should be placed in such a condition as to attract the very best legal talent. Besides, they must have the rule of seniority, unless they had Chiefs, and that meant that as a rule the most aged and not the most efficient Judge should preside. The Judges must have a president, and by retaining the Chiefs they secured the most successful advocates, that was the largest experience and the greatest talent for the administration of justice. There could be no greater mischief either in the interests of justice or of the public, than to agree to the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford.

MR. R. N. FOWLER moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Robert Fowler.)

MR. GLADSTONE hoped the Motion would not be pressed.

Motion negatived.

Mr. James

Dr. BALL said, he adhered to the opinion that the Master of the Rolls might be left out of the Appellate Division. He objected strongly to the Bill as tending to aggrandize the Members of the Court below, and to place them in a higher position than that occupied by the Members of the Court above. He would have the great places in the Appellate Court. He regarded it as injurious to the Judges themselves that they should have their minds confined to any one particular branch of inquiry. He thought that the Equity principle should be kept separate in respect to testamentary questions—at all events, from the merely legal one. With regard to the Court of Admiralty, his opinion was, that shipping cases, commonly tried in that Court, might be tried on circuit instead of being confined to the Court of Admiralty.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT said, in deference to the appeal which had been made he would not insist on excluding the Master of the Rolls, and would confine his Amendment to leaving out the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer.

Proposed Amendment amended accordingly.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 13, to leave out the words "the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer."—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt).

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 152; Noes 96: Majority 56.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

BLACKWATER-BRIDGE (COMPOSITION OF DEBT) BILL. [BILL 177.]

(Mr. Baxter, Mr. William Henry Gladstone.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. HUNT asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury for an explanation of the object of the measure. A similar Bill was brought in two years ago, but was withdrawn. No reason had been assigned why the former settlement should be disturbed.

Mr. BAXTER said, the right hon. Gentleman had himself objected to the Bill introduced two years ago, because it was a Private Bill, and in his (Mr. Baxter's) opinion, the objection was a very proper one. The present measure was proposed as an Amendment of the Act passed in 1867. It had been found impossible to obtain the sum of £2,500 mentioned in that Act, and the bridge was falling into decay. The object of the present Bill was to enable the Treasury to sell the bridge and its approaches for such sum under £2,500 as they might decide upon.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

MILITARY MANŒUVRES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary CARDWELL, Bill for making provision for facilitating the Manœuvres of Troops to be assembled during the ensuing autumn, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary CARDWELL, Sir HENRY STORKS, and Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 215.]

MILITIA (SERVICE, &c.) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary CARDWELL, Bill for extending the period of Service in the Militia; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary CARDWELL, Sir HENRY STORKS, and Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 216.]

PUBLIC RECORDS (IRELAND) ACT (1867)

AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Bill to amend "The Public Records (Ireland) Act, 1867," and to make provision for keeping safely certain Parochial Records in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The Marquess of HARTINGTON and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 217.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

TITHE COMMUTATION ACTS AMEND-MENT BILL. (No. 171.)

(The Earl Fortescue.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL FORTESCUE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the provisions of the measure, which had come up from the other House, had been approved of by a Select Committee of that House. There were 32,937 acres of market gardens in the kingdom, the increase of tithes upon which would amount to £333. The necessity for the measure had been occasioned by the attempt in seven cases to impose an additional tithe rent-charge on land newly cultivated as market-gardens—an attempt which had been viewed with much odium and apprehension, while it had been attended with very slight advantage to the tithe-owners compared with the costs of the litigation it had involved. The Bill directed that the powers of the Tithe Commissioners in this respect only to a parish in which an extraordinary charge for market-gardens was distinguished at the time of the commutation.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl Fortescue.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that as the Bill had been referred to a Select Committee of the other House, and that there had been a difference of opinion respecting the Bill by the Committee, it would be as well, after the second reading, to postpone its Committee stage till after their Lordships had an opportunity of looking over and considering the Report of the Committee of the other House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not understand why the Bill should make a distinction between hop-gardens and market-gardens. The Bill applied to market-gardens but not to hop-gardens. He failed to see why that should be so.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, there was a marked distinction between land cultivated for hops and land cultivated as market-gardens. There was no difficulty with regard to land cultivated for hops; but it was sometimes difficult to distinguish, and more especially so as regarded farms in the vicinity of the metropolis, and large towns where vegetables, &c., were grown, between high farming and market-gardening, so that a question might arise as to whether a field was a market-garden or not.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he could confirm the statement of the most rev. Primate, and intimated that he had no objection to delaying the Committee as suggested by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond).

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ARMY RECRUITING.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in rising to call attention to the Return as to Chest Measurement of Recruits (presented to the House on the 28th of April last), and to the state of the Army as regards recruiting generally, said, he would not discuss the details of the Return for which he moved some time since, respecting the measurement of recruits, inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had admitted it to be inaccurate, and on the part of the Government had undertaken to present another, in which the error should be corrected. There were, however, one or two points which deserved attention in reference to it. That Return, which had achieved some little notoriety, had thus been commented upon by an hon. and gallant Member of the other House—

"The Returns in some cases disclosed the fact that a certain laxity existed somewhere, and that men had been enlisted under regulation measurement. Where this was found to be the case, the Returns were sent back from the War Office with orders to the commanding officers to transfer the men enlisted under the regulation measurement from a column in the Return noting that fact to a column which showed them to be over the regulation measurement, and in such altered form was the Return presented."

It was not surprising that such a letter, appearing in The Times, and signed by his hon. and gallant Friend, was not allowed to pass unnoticed. Accordingly, Sir John Pakington put a Question, in answer to which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said—

"When the Duke of Richmond's Return was moved for, it appeared that in some regiments recruits had been accepted, without any application for that special permission, who were below the regulation measurement. When this became known at the Horse Guards, the following memorandum was issued:—

'Horse Guards, War Office.

'April 16, 1873.

'His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief directs that the accompanying Return be amended in the following way—viz., all the men shown therein as under 33 inches chest-measurement to whom no objection was raised by you or by the officer commanding at the time being, on their being finally passed into the service, must be accounted for as of the regulated chest-measurement of 33 inches.

'C. A. EDWARDS.'

"It cannot be disputed that this was a grave error. The matter in question was the preparation of a Parliamentary Return, and the actual fact alone ought to have been looked to. Directions have been given which will prevent a recurrence, and for the amendment of the Return."

Now, that language was, to say the least, most unfortunate; for though he did not impute to the right hon. Gentleman any intention of casting an imputation on the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, the answer conveyed to himself, and he believed to many others, the impression that it was His Royal Highness by whom the fact had not been looked to in the preparation of the Return. He was therefore extremely glad that His Royal Highness took the earliest opportunity of explaining in that House his part in the transaction, and of showing beyond all question that though as the head of the Department he was responsible for everything that went on in it, he could not be held responsible for that Memorandum. His Royal Highness said last night—

"I never saw the Return or the Circular that went out in my name on the subject, and I never intended any Circular to go out. I thought it was a mere ordinary correction, which must frequently occur in an office. Had I been aware how the Return was prepared, I should not have authorized what has been done."

That was only consistent with His Royal Highness's conduct upon all occasions. It was obvious that a great deal must be left to subordinates, and that it was impossible for any one at the head of a Department dealing with a multiplicity of details to go into the minutiae daily dealt with. His Royal Highness added that he considered it merely a breach of discipline on the part of officers commanding regiments, that he understood the number of men in question was very small; and that he dismissed the subject from his mind, as one not requiring further thought. Now, he desired to know whether the Returns sent in to the War Department were confined to those of officers who had accepted the men under-measurement, and had thus as it were condoned the offence; or whether the Department had not Returns, showing that a great number of men in certain regiments, of 31 and 32 inches chest-measurement, had been objected to, in some cases by commanding officers, and in others by generals commanding districts. If the Department, as he believed, possessed such knowledge, they ought not only to have refrained from issuing the Memorandum, but to have communicated the information to the House. His Royal Highness having proved that he was not answerable for the error acknowledged by the right hon. Gentleman to have been committed, some one in the War Department must be responsible for it. The recruiting department was the department which must have had the information at the time the Return was made, and the Inspector General of Recruiting was responsible for all these Returns. That was shown by the 25th section of the Queen's Regulations, No. 1,330, which was in these terms—

"The Inspector General of Recruiting is charged with carrying out all orders and regulations on subjects connected with the recruiting service, and attending to the details of that department."

He would ask, therefore, whether within the knowledge of the Inspector General, and within reach of the Department, there were not the names of men undoubtedly under the prescribed chest-measurement? He would now pass on to the larger and higher subject of recruiting generally, as it was now carried out; and respecting which it could not be denied that anything that tended to deteriorate the high character of the personnel of the Army was a thing to be deprecated and stopped. In an earlier part of his political life he (the Duke of Richmond) used to hear a great deal about "the sliding scale;" the sliding scale, however, so much talked of in former days, vanished into empty air compared with that adopted of late years in recruiting. On the 1st of February, 1868, the recruits were 5 feet 6 inches to 5 feet 8 inches in height, and 33 inches chest-measurement, 5 feet 8 inches to 5 feet 10 inches, and 34 inches, and 5 feet 10 inches and over, and 35 inches, the minimum height thus being 5 feet 6 inches. In March, 1869, when reductions were made in the Army, the height was raised to 5 feet 8 inches. In June, 1869, it was reduced to 5 feet 6 inches. In October, 1869, the chest-measurement was altered, it being taken with the arms hanging down instead of raised. In February, 1870, when there were again reductions, the height was raised to 5 feet 8 inches. In March, 1870, all recruiting was suspended. In July of that year, with prospects of war on the Continent, the minimum height was reduced to 5 feet 6 inches, while in September it was further reduced to 5 feet 5½ inches, and by special authority to 5 feet 5 inches. In December, 1870, an order was issued directing that the measuring tape should not be drawn so tight as to compress the surface, and in July, 1871, the minimum height was reduced to 5 feet 5 inches. Thus, since July, 1868, a uniform standard had scarcely been maintained for four consecutive months. The fact was, that the system of short service without pensions was distasteful to the people of the country, and was obliging them to take what men they could get, and those who were of little use to them after they had got them. That was shown by the only accessible authority, the Reports of the Inspector General of Recruiting for 1871 and 1872, which set up one set of theories and arguments on one page and contradicted them on the next. The only conclusion, however, which he (the Duke of Richmond)—and he thought anybody else—could come to, who examined the Reports independently, was that the whole recruiting service of the country was in a most unsatisfactory state. In 1871, there was a deficit of 1,783 men—the deficiency in 1872 was nearly the same—on which the Inspector General remarked—

"The number shown proves that at present the supply of men has not been quite sufficient, and the time possibly may not be far distant, if the increased rate of wages, the demand for labour, with the lessened number of working hours continue to affect the labour-market, that the present inducements to voluntary enlistment will be found to be insufficient. There is good reason to believe that the physique of the recruits taken during the last year gives promise of these men becoming very effective soldiers."

The Duke of Richmond

He would ask whether these were men of 33 inches, or 32 inches. The Report continued—

"In nearly every case commanding officers have expressed themselves satisfied with the description of recruits sent to join their regiments."

That was quite at variance with what he had understood to be the case, and he should like to know to whom such satisfaction had been expressed, and whether there was any objection to produce those letters. As to the working of the system, the Report remarked—

"There is a fear that short service without a claim to pension, may become distasteful, and that men should give up six years of their lives, with only the prospect of 7*l.* a year for six years afterwards, while serving in the reserve force, is a condition that cannot be generally expected. Recruits still look to and inquire what pension they will get, whilst they see the majority of discharged soldiers enjoying such retiring allowances. Although against this uncertainty as to pension the recruit may feel the advantage in some cases that he is only bound for six years instead of a much longer period."

Now, in the face of that Report he wanted to know whether the noble Lord meant to go on with short service without pensions? He believed that if they were to issue a Circular to competent persons throughout the country, inviting them to express an opinion on the present system of service, it would be found that it was one that could not long be carried out consistently with the interests of the country. He wanted to know whether they intended to go on with the system of short service without pensions? He did not think that the system could be carried on practically for any length of time. In an extraordinary paragraph the Inspector General went on to say—

"The standard in height has been nearly all the year 5 ft. 5 in., and great attention has been paid to chest measurement, and careful medical examination before approval, so that the reports of the physique of the men are most favourable. As short service becomes more general, it may be questioned whether this stringency of medical examination may not be a little relaxed, as a man having slight blemishes, which now disqualify, will be fit for home service, and afterwards well qualified for service in the Reserve forces, and quite capable of meeting the exigencies of any emergency that may then be required of him."

If that observation meant anything it meant this—that in the present system of recruiting for short service they were recruiting under the idea that the men would never be called upon to serve abroad, and therefore they might take an inferior class of men—first, for short service with the flag, and afterwards, to use a railway expression, in effect to shunt them into the Reserve force. It had often been said that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had been very lenient with foreign Powers on more than one occasion, when he ought to have sent an army abroad. That might be accounted for if the Army was recruited on the assumption of its services never being required abroad. The Report went on to say—

“it may be fairly surmised that the present inducements to enlist on these conditions will not hereafter be sufficient to meet the increasing demand, and in face of the constant rising of the rate of wages in the labour market.”

That was precisely his own view, that unless there was long service with pension there would not be sufficient inducement to enter the Army for the class of men such as had for years been our pride. Turning to the Report for 1873, he found a remarkable paragraph—

“The Autumn Manœuvres of 1871 and 1872 have elicited the fact that the physique of the Royal Artillery and cavalry has been such as to excite unqualified approbation; and, by a careful observer, it has been remarked that the nation may be assured that the infantry are such as could be desired, and have maintained their long-established character of efficiency.”

A distinction was thus drawn between the artillery and cavalry and the infantry, conveying a suspicion that the physique of the latter was not such as should be desired. The “careful observer” clearly was not His Royal Highness, whose Reports, to use a Scotch expression, did not condescend to these particulars, but dealt in more general terms. He understood the Secretary of State for War was out in the Manœuvres, and took as prominent a part as a civilian could do in them. It had occurred to him that he might be the “careful observer.” If so, that right hon. Gentleman had shown his care not to praise the infantry except in the most qualified terms, whilst he placed the artillery and the cavalry in the front for his emphatic eulogy. The Report also contained a paragraph in which the Inspector General of Recruiting took this modest view of his position—

“The appointment of Inspector-General of Recruiting, as recommended by the Commission of 1867, has been attended with the great advantage of allowing every circumstance connected with the recruiting service throughout the kingdom to be minutely and carefully inquired into.”

He suspected that in the next Report, after the disclosures as to recruiting and the preparation of Returns, there would be some ground for modifying that opinion. The Report gave the number of recruits passed into the service last year as 17,371, and the casualties as 18,779. There must be something wrong in the system which produced such results. It would appear that our forces were diminishing in numbers year after year, and that, so far as he knew, no steps had been as yet taken to remedy such an unsatisfactory state of affairs. According to the Report—

“The casualties for the year 1872 have been increased above the average by a greater number of invalids, an increased discharge of men of bad character, by a facility of obtaining discharge by purchase and free, and by many desertions—the two last having been occasioned by the great demand for labour.”

That fact might lead to the inference that those had been enlisted who were unfit for the service, and ought never to have been enlisted—an inference which was further borne out by the statement of the increased number of men of bad character who had been discharged. In reference to that subject, a report was current in military circles that a confidential Circular had been issued to courts-martial, directing them to dismiss with ignominy men found guilty of desertion or absence without leave, if physically unfit for the service. In other words, every opportunity was to be taken of dismissing as of bad character men who had been improperly enlisted. He now came to the last paragraph, which the Government ought to regard with considerable apprehension—

“contemplating the greatly increased number of men which will be required in the year 1876, and subsequent years, when the discharge of men enlisted for short service will affect materially the number of men required to be raised to replace them, and knowing that all these men must be taken by a system of purely voluntary enlistment, the increased inducements to enlist are for the consideration of statesmen; and, without such increased inducements, it is more than probable that the present system of the recruiting service will fail to supply the necessary demand.”

He knew that he had wearied the House by the length at which he had addressed them, but he trusted that their Lord ships would think that the statement he had made would justify him in their opinion for having brought this subject under consideration. He believed that the present system was radically wrong, and that, practically, it was an utter failure; and that it could only be improved by increasing the inducements to men to enlist, and he maintained that the responsibility for this failure rested, as it ought to rest, upon Her Majesty's Government. He was satisfied that Her Majesty's Government would be assisted in everything that could conduce to the improvement of the service by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he had hoped that when His Royal Highness the illustrious Duke on the cross benches closed last night a statement which the noble Duke opposite himself characterized as satisfactory, the last had been heard of the unfortunate mistake as to the measurement of recruits. He thought that, under the circumstances, the supplementary defence of the illustrious Duke which had been undertaken by the noble Duke opposite might have been dispensed with upon the present occasion. What was the reason which had been assigned by the noble Duke for undertaking that supplementary defence of the illustrious Duke? The noble Duke said that he had felt compelled to undertake it, because he regarded the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War's statement in the other House as casting blame upon the illustrious Duke. He begged to protest against that interpretation of the right hon. Gentleman's statement. His statement was a mere recapitulation of the facts of the case.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was anxious that he should not be misunderstood in this matter. He had made no imputation whatever against the Secretary of State for War. What he said was, that the right hon. Gentleman had expressed himself in words that might convey the impression out-of-doors that blame was to be attached to the Commander-in-Chief in the matter. He had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman had expressed himself in perfect good faith.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he had in no way misapprehended the meaning of the noble Duke, who had complained of the Secretary of State for War's statement as calculated to give rise to the impression out-of-doors that blame was to be attached to the illustrious Duke. The right hon. Gentleman could not do otherwise than read the exact words of the document which had been sent out by the Adjutant General's department, and the illustrious Duke himself had not detracted in the least from the responsibility attaching to that department. The noble Duke had asked whether it was within his personal knowledge that there were in the department of the Adjutant General other Returns from officers commanding regiments which disclosed the fact that there were in their regiments men whose measurements did not come up to the regulation standard. All he could say was, that if Returns meriting this description existed anywhere, he had no personal knowledge whatever of their existence, although he believed that there was one regiment in which some doubt had arisen as to the sufficiency of the chest measurements of the men. In that case, an officer had been sent down to examine and report upon the case. The noble Duke had proceeded to speak of the position of the Inspector General of Recruiting, and perhaps the House would permit him to point out that Colonel Anson, in his letter which had appeared in The Times, and several other of our military critics, seemed to be under a misapprehension with regard to the position of that officer. It was clearly indicated in the Regulations with respect to recruiting, that far from being a mere War Office official, the Inspector General of Recruits was an independent officer. The present tenant of the office was moreover appointed by the Commander-in-Chief before the present Government came into office, and therefore there was no excuse whatever for supposing him to be the screen of the present Government.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND remarked that he had made no such statement.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that this was at all events the impression produced on the mind of the House by the noble Duke's observations. The noble Duke having dealt with the Inspector General of Recruits, passed on to consider the subject of recruiting generally. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) was anxious to say a few words with regard to the effect of the changes which had been introduced into the recruiting system by the present Government. The noble Duke said that any deterioration which had occurred in the quality of the recruits was traceable to the system of short service, which he most severely condemned. He was not about to discuss the relative merits of long and short service upon the present occasion; but he was convinced that, in a country where neither compulsory service nor the cost of a large standing Army would be endured, a system of short service with Reserves was the only one that could be carried out. With regard to the quality of the recruits who had enlisted under the short-service system, he wished to point out to the noble Duke one or two facts which appeared in the Report to the Adjutant General by the Inspector General of Recruits, dated January, 1872, on the recruiting for the year 1871. The Report stated that commanding officers had expressed themselves satisfied with the description of recruits sent to join their regiments. The noble Duke challenged that statement in the Report, and desired to know what means the Department had of ascertaining whether this satisfaction was the case. The noble Duke had placed him in a rather embarrassing position, because he must know that the Reports of the commanding officers were confidential, but he could assure the noble Duke that before the Inspector General of Recruiting had made his Report, he had access to authentic information furnished by commanding officers themselves. Further on, in the Report appeared a statement founded on medical statistics, which was of considerable importance. It was as follows—

"Inquiry has been made to ascertain how many of these men have not completed their first year's service, and it is found that the number invalidated in that period is 13·19 per 1,000; which, allowing for such diseases as develop themselves at that age, for the change of life on first joining, and the necessary drill, is very small, and will bear favourable comparison with the corresponding state of health of men in civil life of that age . . . as far as can be ascertained, the recruits of this augmentation have not, after one year's trial, proved less efficient than those taken in former years, at the ordinary rate of recruiting, to supply the usual casualties."

Considering that it was necessary to have recourse to the lower stratum of the population for recruits, the best authorities believed that they were likely to find more healthy men, and therefore men who were likely to make the most efficient soldiers, among those from 18 to 19 years of age, than among older men, who would join the Army probably because they found themselves unfit for any other profession or trade. That opinion was well expressed in the Report of General Edwards, who said—

"Between the ages of 18 and 19 years many youths have not acquired regular employment. If these men enlist, they are at once well clothed and cared for, and by the time they have acquired the age of 20, there can be no doubt are worth in physique in strength of constitution more than the man who though enlisted above that age, had till then existed on very uncertain means."

There were also passages in the Report with respect to recruiting in 1872, the tenor of which was very similar, but he would not trouble the House by quoting them. He wished, however, to be allowed to add that the noble Duke was under a misapprehension, when he stated that the standard of height was lower than it had ever been before. He could assure him that at different times in 1864, and, he believed, again in 1868, the height was not greater than 5ft. 3in., which was the present standard. Having said thus much with respect to the quality of the recruits, he would add a few words with reference to their quantity. The noble Duke was not perhaps aware that we had now between 2,000 and 3,000 over our full establishment, and it was therefore obvious that it was not necessary that we should obtain the full number of recruits. The real working of the system could not possibly be tested before 1876, by which time the short-service men would begin to pass into the Army Reserve. He was far from wishing to convey to the House that the Government regarded the problem to be solved as one which was certain or easy of solution. The views of General Edwards on the subject were very clear, and the War Department were perfectly alive to the possibility that the inducements now held out might in the face of the continually increasing competition of the trade at no distant day be found inadequate to obtain the necessary supply of men. But something, it must be borne in mind, had been done to increase these inducements. The pay of the Army had not long ago been increased; and it was proposed in the present year, to make a change with reference to the pay of the soldier which would it was hoped have the effect of increasing the attractions of the Army to the class of men who were likely to join it as recruits. He need only add that he shared the opinions of the noble Duke as to the great importance of recruiting, and that the Government had no intention whatsoever of looking upon the existing system as incapable of improvement.

LORD DE ROS thought there was no good reason for regarding the Reports as to the number of recruits as confidential as the noble Marquess seemed to suppose; consequently, all the Reports which had been referred to might be laid on the Table of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that if the illustrious Duke on the cross benches thought there was no objection to the production of the Reports in question, he should not be disposed to throw any obstacle in the way.

EARL GREY said, he was sure their Lordships and the country would feel that they were under a deep obligation to the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) for having brought the subject under their consideration. It was a subject of extreme importance, and no one could have listened to the statement which had been made with respect to it without coming to the same conclusion as he had—that the state of things connected with the Army was altogether unsatisfactory. Many years would, he was convinced, not have elapsed before we should have come to lament the ill consequences which would flow from the virtual abolition of the system of pensions in the service. It was true pensions were not nominally done away with, but practically such was the case, and soldiers enlisting for a very short term had now no means of winning a provision for their old age. How could it then, he would ask, be expected that men would give up the six or seven best years of their lives to military employment, and give up the opportunity of obtaining the skill necessary for civil employment, if at the end of that period they found themselves without the means of obtaining a livelihood, and turned adrift to make what provision they could for old age? It was unreasonable to expect men to enter freely into the Army under conditions so discouraging, and he was happy to hear his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War say that the Government were not entirely satisfied with the present system, and that they contemplated the probability of having to revise it. What was wanted was not so much increase of pay, as that the soldier should be placed in a position in which he could make tolerably sure of a provision for life. By that means, too, would success in the policy of creating an Army of Reserve be best attained. Hitherto the Army of Reserve had been a failure, it could not be relied upon to come up when required; and the best course to pursue, he maintained, was to let the men serve for a short time in the active Army, to take the utmost pains during that time to give them the highest training, and having done that, to encourage them to enter the Reserve, allowing them to count their service as a means of ultimately obtaining a pension. The consequence in troublous times of the course which was now being pursued might be serious. If they trained large numbers of men to arms and then turned them adrift with no assured means of subsistence, they might in troublous times become a serious danger to the country, whereas the system of pensions had this advantage—that when they dismissed pensioned soldiers they continued to have a hold over them, and knew they were not likely under any circumstances to be arrayed against the established authorities of the State.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL maintained that the observations of the noble Earl who had just spoken could not be sustained by the facts. The plan of the Army Reserve must necessarily take some years to come into full operation. The new scheme of short service could not come into full operation until 1876; so that when the noble Earl spoke of it as a failure, his opinion could only be regarded in the light of a prophecy, which might or might not be fulfilled. As to the present system of recruiting, the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) had quoted from the Reports only those passages which told in favour of his arguments, while he had omitted those which were opposed to them. That the present system of recruiting did not lead to complete failure as to the physical qualities of the men enlisted was shown by the last Report of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, in which the power of marching and of bearing fatigue displayed by the infantry, the mainstay of the Army, was spoken of very highly.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE maintained that the short service system had fairly broken down. When the system was first proposed in the House of Commons, the difficulties that would attend it were pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. Among them was this one—that after the expiration of the first period of service, the men would go back to their parishes, and, being selected from a low stratum of society, they would have the greatest difficulty in finding employment. In answer to that, the right hon. Gentleman said he would get quite a different and superior class of men, such as village tradesmen and persons who could easily turn their hands to profitable industry when they went back to their parishes. Now, from all the information he could collect, that anticipation had not been realized. Under the short service system they still got the waifs and strays of society, and as far as getting a superior class of men went, it was all moonshine. He hoped the amended Return of chest measurements would be produced, and also the letters from the officers commanding regiments. They were much indebted to the noble Duke for bringing that question forward; for the more the short service system was discussed, the more its difficulties would become apparent.

EARL FORTESCUE found, from the Army Medical Report presented in 1872, that about 6,000 out of every 10,000 men examined were under the age of 20, and of the recruits about two-thirds were between 18 and 21. When the short service system became the rule a great proportion of the Army would consist of boys instead of seasoned soldiers.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he could not help regarding the system of chest measurement now adopted as very fallacious. A high authority in gymnastic matters, whom he knew when a young man, used to hold that the circumference of a man's chest measured with a tape did not give a fair idea of what his constitutional powers and his amount of wind might be, because a man with a narrow and a flat chest, if he had a very great deal of muscle in his chest, would measure many inches in circumference, whereas a man with a deep round chest, although he had not the same quantity of muscle, and measured fewer inches, would be the stronger man of the two. The depth and not the mere circumference of the chest should be taken with callipers with which the diameter of trees was measured, if they wished to test a man's strength of constitution and power of bearing fatigue.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was perfectly satisfied with the course of the debate; but he wished to point out one thing to the noble Duke who sat opposite (the Duke of Argyll). The noble Duke took the noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Grey) to task for having ventured to prophesy on this subject, and in a manner, he said, which was not unfrequent with him. The noble Earl did not indulge in a spirit of prophesy, but merely followed the example of the Inspector General of Recruiting, who said—

“Without such increased inducements, it is more than probable that the present system of Recruiting Service will fail to supply the necessary demand.”

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL maintained that the scheme of founding the Army of Reserve on short service had not been sufficiently tried to entitle anyone to say that it had failed. There was a disposition manifested by some noble Lords to regard the result yet to be attained as a foregone conclusion, instead of looking upon the system in a philosophic spirit and as an experiment in course of trial, and one which had certainly not failed.

SLAVE TRADE (EAST AFRICAN COURTS)

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for regulating and extending the jurisdiction in matters connected with the Slave Trade of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Aden, and of Her Majesty's Consuls under Treaties with the Zemingers of Zanzibar, Muscat, and Madagascar, and under future Treaties—Was presented by The Earl of CAMPERDOWN; read 1st. QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the alterations in the pay of the Honorary Colonels recently appointed to Cavalry regiments under the Royal Warrant of 27th December, 1870, is legal, no Royal Warrant having since been issued authorizing the change?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that the Question did not supply him with sufficient materials for forming a judgment upon the point. But even if all the facts were before him he doubted whether it would be his duty to answer the Question, because it was one upon which the opinion of the Law Officers might be taken by the Government, and it was to the Government that their answer should be given.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL—(Lords).—[Bill 154.](Mr. Attorney General.)COMMITTEE. [Progress 30th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 5 (Constitution of High Court of Justice).

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, to leave out from the word "one," to the word "mentioned," in line 18, inclusive.—(Mr. Attorney General.)

DR. BALL said, this was a question of very considerable importance. It was neither more nor less than whether there should be an additional Judge in the Equity Division. He distrusted judicial statistics. Twenty ordinary causes might not be equal to one such case as was now before Lord Westbury and Lord Cairns. Was it proposed to maintain these exceptional tribunals, with Judges exceptionally paid to deal with exceptional cases, referred to them by special legislation? The worst economy in a public point of view was economy in judicial power; and he preferred on this question the opinion of the Equity lawyers. He was not of opinion that a Common Law Judge was incompetent to deal with Equity cases. In Ireland, the Bar practised in all the Courts, without detriment to the suitors; but this was not the question before the Committee, for there was not even a Common Law Judge to spare. He feared that on this point of additional Judges the Law Officers of the Crown spoke from their briefs rather than their convictions. Like "the power behind the Throne," the influence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was felt, though he himself was absent, and it was his views which led to the Amendment in the Bill on this question.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID was not convinced by the Solicitor General's argument of the previous evening, that an additional Vice Chancellor was not required in order that the business of the Court of Chancery might be satisfactorily disposed of. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) however, had not risen for the purpose of further arguing this point—which, in his opinion, had been already sufficiently discussed—but to give an entirely distinct reason for retaining the words on the omission of which the Committee was about to vote. Even if the additional Judge was not wanted as Vice Chancellor, he would be most useful in helping the Common Law Judges who were now for the first time to be, not merely authorized, but required, to decide on equitable matters. It would be remembered that on the second reading, the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), had most ably argued for the necessity of adding a Judge instructed in Equity to each of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and that the Attorney General had admitted that the Judges of those Courts themselves recognized the need of such assistance, and desired that it might be given; and although he had added that this could not be done at once, he had intimated that advantage would be taken of the first vacancy in each Court, to supply the aid required. But now this hope was to be indefinitely postponed. Having, in order to strengthen the equitable element in the Court of Appeal, given up the idea of transferring three Common Law Judges to that Court, he was left with 15 Puisne Judges instead of 12, and therefore proposed to add, at the end of the clause now under discussion, a Proviso that there should be no fresh appointment until after four vacancies. Thus the Courts of Common Law, when for the first time required to administer Equity, would, during that very period of transition which involved the principal difficulty, be left without the equitable aid which the Attorney General admitted that they needed and desired. Now, although we did not regard the Common Law Judges as heaven-born geniuses, who were able to decide equitable questions to which they were not accustomed, as satisfactorily as if they had studied them all their lives, we did consider them to be extremely learned, intelligent, honourable, and estimable individuals. Were we then to make by this Bill such arrangements that we should be compelled to look upon the early deaths or resignations of four of these highly esteemed personages, as events to be anxiously desired for the benefit of the public, and even for the ease of mind of their own colleagues? Hon. Members would doubtless recollect that in narratives of shipwrecks, of returns from unsuccessful voyages to the Polar regions, or of the adventures of men lost in pathless deserts, they had been horrified by reading that the unfortunate adventurers had sometimes been driven by approaching starvation to decide by lot which of their number should be sacrificed in order to save the rest from perishing by hunger. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) was not without apprehension that this measure would lead to some calamity of an analogous character. He almost feared that on some gloomy morning—not of Michaelmas Term, for Terms would have been abolished—but of that dull season which we had hitherto designated as Michaelmas Term, our feelings would be harrowed up by the intelligence that Her Majesty's 15 Puisne Judges, unable any longer to bear the burden of deciding equitable questions without the help of an Equity colleague, had met and determined by lot, not which four of them should be put to death, but which four should undergo that official extinction which we term resignation, in order to obtain for the rest the aid which all of them already felt to be absolutely indispensable. Supposing them not to be capable of such an act of desperate heroism, most serious impediments to the administration of justice during the transitional period must be the result of the ill-judged parsimony of the Government. If, then, the Attorney General meant inexorably to insist on his Proviso prohibiting the filling up of any vacancy until four vacancies should have occurred, let him at least consent to retain the words on the omission of which the Committee was now about to vote, so that there might be one Judge trained to Equity, who might be kept en disponibilité, and whose assistance a Court of Law before which an equitable point should arise might be entitled to require.

MR. W. FOWLER asked how the bankruptcy business was to be managed under the new arrangement? At present it was, to a great extent, blocked, owing to the condition of business in the Court of Chancery. The present position of the Chamber business in that Court was also most unsatisfactory. Were the Judges to be relieved from this business? The Committee ought to know how this was to be arranged before deciding against the appointment of an additional Judge. A vast increase of work and of the time absorbed in the work done in the Courts of Chancery would certainly ensue if voir dire evidence were to be largely taken there, and this fact would increase the necessity for an additional Equity Judge. The present mode of examination of witnesses in Chancery had been treated with contempt on all sides, but the proposed change could not be made with the present staff of Judges. He would oppose the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that if on an Amendment like that which was moved to appoint an additional Judge, the provisions of the whole Bill were to be discussed, they should never be able to get through with it. Both his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had felt that where well-grounded complaints were made as to the construction of the Court, considerations of expense should not be allowed to stand in the way. Nor was there any pretence for saying there was "a power behind" the Law Officers of the Crown which prevented necessary appointments on economical grounds. But he altogether denied that the large appointment of Equity Judges which had been suggested was necessary; the staff of Common Law Judges was quite sufficient to do the work that had to be done without the necessity of three other Equitable Judges to help them. The question now before the Committee, however, was as to the necessity for appointing an additional Vice Chancellor. On this point the figures quoted yesterday by the Solicitor General clearly showed that whatever arrears of business in Chancery now existed were due to melancholy personal causes of an exceptional character. This charge was one which the Government thought would impose a wholly unnecessary burden upon the public. He must, therefore, oppose it.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that having many years since left the Bar, he would not be suspected of being biassed by any personal interest, and that he was convinced that he was furthering the interests of justice and therefore of true economy in voting for the Amendment.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he thought there was no case whatever for the appointment of an additional Equity Judge. What was wanted was not greater judicial force but a better distribution of it. As the Common Law Judges were hereafter to decide equitable points, it must follow that pro tanto the Equity Judges would have less to do than they now had. Yet there was upon the Paper an Amendment that the Courts of Equity were to be at liberty to send an action to be tried elsewhere—a power which seemed fatal to the principle that suitors were to receive complete justice in the one Court in which their case was first heard. He should vote for the proposal of the Attorney General.

The Attorney General

Question put, "That the words 'one other Judge to be appointed by Her Majesty' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 141: Majority 68.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL proposed the first of three Amendments, which was the insertion, in line 22, after "such," of "if any," the others being in line 23, to leave out "transferred to," and insert "appointed ordinary Judges of." Same line, after "appeal," to leave out to end of clause.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, who had given Notice of his intention to move, in line 22, to leave out from "except such," to "this Act," in line 24, contended that the proposed Amendments of the Government would give them power to create three additional Judges and to incur an annual expenditure of £15,000 for which there was no justification. This was the result of the original error of the Government in introducing their divisional system. The demand was not made in the House of Lords, which was not likely to have overlooked the alleged claims of Equity jurisprudence, which it was professedly designed to meet. He should certainly take the sense of the Committee upon this Amendment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he thought that nothing could be more inconvenient than, when they were discussing the constitution of the Court below, they should be called upon to debate questions relating to the Court of Appeal. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Harcourt) would wait until they came to the 6th clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL explained the scheme as it originally stood and as it was now submitted, contending that there was a difficulty which could be solved only by the temporary appointment of three Judges, and referring to a later Amendment which would limit the total number of Judges, and which would bind the Government in the future against the abuse which the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Harcourt) contemplated in the permanent appointment of three additional Judges. The temporary difficulty was that of finding the requisite number of Equity Judges for the Court of Appeal.

DR. BALL said, he understood that the Government merely proposed to extend the range of the power of selection. He was in favour of extending the area of selection, and therefore would support the Amendment of the Attorney General. The necessity for any such Amendment showed that the Lords had been rather slovenly, and that misunderstanding further evinced how requisite it was to exercise vigilance in reviewing their Lordships' work.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, the point of his objection to the Attorney General's Amendment appeared to have been somewhat misunderstood. What he took exception to was not that the area of selection should be extended, but that the number of the Judges should be increased. There was one point in reference to the Appellate Court to which the Attorney General had not alluded, and that was with regard to the Law Lords and the ex-Lord Chancellors. The Committee was called upon to vote £15,000 more money because the the Law Lords were not to do any work in the new Court of Appeal. The Amendment to which the Government had consented the day before absolutely denuded these Lords of any judicial occupation. How was the Government to justify this demand for an additional expenditure of £15,000 on the assumption that five noble Lords, each receiving £5,000 a-year, were to do no work in the Appellate Court? If Lord Cairns, Lord Westbury, and Lord Hatherley sat in the Court of Appeal there would be six Judges of the highest character and competence to do the Equity work, and he could not therefore see the necessity for empowering the Government to appoint three additional Judges. For his own part, he would never admit the principle that men in the prime of life, and in full possession of their faculties, should receive pensions and not serve their country. He did not mean to say that these noble Lords would refuse to serve; but their work was to be abolished. This was an extraordinary proposal, a departure from the original intention, acquiesced in by the House of Lords, that no additional Judges should be appointed, and the Government had not till now given any indication that they would make such a proposal. On these grounds he maintained that this claim for additional Judges failed altogether.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was true the Government were asking the House of Commons to give them a very considerable extension of their discretionary power. Whereas the Bill as it now stood, in providing for the addition of three members of the High Court of Appeal, bound the Government to choose those three members from the existing Common Law Judges, and precluded them from putting any one into the place of the three Judges so transplanted, the Government were asking power to select them on the responsibility of the Crown from any quarter, subject only to this limitation—that the reduction of the number of Common Law Judges which was now contemplated to take place immediately must, by the Bill as proposed to be amended, take place upon the termination of three existing Judgeships. That was a very great responsibility, no doubt, which the Government proposed to undertake; but they were not asking Parliament positively to enact that these three additional Judgeships should be created for the moment. They were asking Parliament to give them power which might for a time entail the maintenance of one, two, or three additional Judges; but they were not thereby relieving themselves from responsibility with respect to the appointment of those additional Judges. If arrangements were made after this Bill became law, the effect of which was to add to the number of Judges, it would be in the power of the Government to say to Parliament not that the Legislature had directed them to make such addition, but that Parliament had placed it in their power to do so if they should find it necessary; and so far only as they found it necessary would it be competent for them to make such additional appointments. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Harcourt) asked why the Government should seek to assume that discretion. For two reasons. One had been referred to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Dr. Ball)—namely, with the view of enlarging the area of selection. The Attorney General had given additional force to the proposition by pointing out the necessity of having a sufficient amount of Equity power in the High Court of Judicature to be created under the Bill. He (Mr. Gladstone) quite admitted that the services of ex-Lord Chancellors should be available for the country, and he had a strong expectation, from the high position of those noble and learned Lords, that they would be ready to give the public the benefit of their valuable professional assistance; but he doubted very much whether they would be more likely to obtain that assistance by asserting in too positive a form their title to receive it. They could not give legislative form to their expectation, because they could not assure Parliament that it would be fulfilled. The only course they could take was to ask Parliament to invest the Government with a discretion, to be used upon their responsibility and in the face of proved necessity, which would enable them to make sure of having a sufficiency of Equity power. But there was another and very sufficient reason for the Amendment. It was intended to constitute one High Court of Appeal for the three kingdoms, and he did not think the just claim to have Irish and Scotch Judges upon the Court would be adequately met by the simple addition of ex officio Judges; it would therefore not be wise to make it binding to transfer all the three Judges at the moment into the Court of Appeal from among the Common Law Judges. He did not say what proposal it might be the duty of the Government to make as to the number of persons to be put into the Appeal Court; but the earliest opportunity would be taken of announcing their decision upon that matter to the House.

MR. GREGORY said, he was desirous to know whether the transference of Vice Chancellors to the High Court of Appeal would leave vacancies to be filled up, or whether the judicial representation of the Court of Chancery was to be reduced as a result of appointments to the High Court of Appeal?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, if the hon. and learned Gentleman would look at page 19 of the Amendments he would see an Amendment which provided that any deficiency in the number of Judges in the three Vice Chancellors' Courts that might be caused for the purposes of this Act might be supplied by the appointment of new Judges—that was to say, whenever the office of a Judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice became vacant a new Judge would be appointed. He would remind the Committee that when these Amendments were put upon the Paper they had no right to expect that the ex-Lord Chancellors would serve regularly upon the Court of Appeal, because Irish and Scotch appeals were at that time reserved to the House of Lords. Now, however, that the Government had acceded to the proposal of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), there would be no necessity for having Law Lords in the House of Lords at all; and if, as there was a reasonable expectation, some of them would agree to serve in the Court of Appeal to that extent, the deficiency of Equity power could be supplied. Of the five ex-Chancellors who received among them pensions amounting to £25,000 a-year, one, Lord St. Leonards, was over 90 years of age. His health was remarkably good, but he was not able to hear well, and therefore was not in a state to assist in the Court of Appeal. Thus there was one of those alleged available Judges disposed of. The next ex-Chancellor, a very wonderful man for his age, was in his 80th year. He might serve if he pleased, but you could not reckon upon the continued service of a man of that age. Another Law Lord was 73; he very much feared he would not be able to serve by reason of ill-health. The next was 72 years old. He was entitled certainly, if he thought fit, to enjoy his pension without any further service. He had served for 15 years as a Judge, and was fairly entitled to enjoy his pension without longer service. The list was, therefore, reduced to one. That noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) was in the vigour of health and intellect; but they had no right to call upon him for continued service, although he might, if he chose, gracefully accede to what he must know was the general wish. They had no right to speculate on his services merely in consequence of the public wish or expectation. Besides, in case of a change of Government, Lord Cairns might be called on to occupy his former position; but in that case they would doubtless have the services of the present Lord Chancellor. The Government, therefore, must take the power to provide additional Judges for the administration of justice if it should be necessary. They were not, however, guilty of any needless extravagance. Their proposal, with a view to strengthen the Equity department of the Court of Appeal, was very moderate indeed. Two Equity Judges in one Division would probably be sufficient. They did not propose of necessity to appoint more than one, but they wished to be unfettered for this reason—that they might reckon on having to appoint members of the Scotch and Irish Bench or Bar, not with the view of increasing the charge on the public, but simply to provide for carrying out fairly the plan proposed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock, and accepted by the Government. It was quite possible that changes might occur in the constitution of the Courts before the Bill came into operation, and by reason of these changes they might find more Equity Judges available than there were at present. If that should happen, it might be in the power of the Government to avail themselves of the services of those Judges without increasing the charge to the public.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, the question was whether they were bound to make the appointments from the present Judges, or to make them from members of the Bar. He should say, while they had Equity Judges, they should not make new appointments; that was, if the Equity Judges were willing to serve. As the Bill now stood, there were to be nine Judges, seven of them of the Common Law Bar, and two of the Equity Bar; and anyone who knew the barrier between the Common Law Bar and the Equity Bar must be aware of the distinctions between them. He regarded the Amendment of the Government, as proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, as a very moderate one, and he hoped the House would support it.

MR. MATTHEWS differed from those hon. and learned Gentlemen who had spoken as if the public had a right to the services of ex-Chancellors. The public had no such right. When an eminent lawyer was made a Lord Chancellor he received a fixed salary for a precarious office, and gave up a professional income far exceeding that salary. The pension he afterwards obtained was to be considered, not as the wages of his leisure time, but rather as part of the price we paid for the most distinguished eminent men we could find to preside over the legal system; and unless the prospect of the pension were held out to him the services of the most prosperous lawyer could not be secured. With regard to the Amendment before the Committee, he should support the Government.

MR. WEST said, the Amendment of the Attorney General altered one of the most important promises held out at the introduction of the Bill—namely, that there should be no increase in the expense of the judicial staff to be created under this Bill, and as the arguments at present stood he was not prepared to vote for the Amendment of the Attorney General if the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) insisted upon a division. He would, however, suggest to the hon. and learned Member that the present was not the most favourable opportunity for taking a division upon this question, as Irish and Scotch Judges would have to be appointed to the Court of Appeal.

MR. T. HUGHES said, that after the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, that the Government would not put this power which they asked for into operation unless they failed to get sufficient assistance on the Equity side from the present members of the highest Court of Appeal, he considered the proposition a just and reasonable one, and he could not vote with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt). He was entirely opposed also to the suggestion that Judges should be appointed in the Court of Appeal who had not been Judges in Courts of First Instance.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he had very little expectation of support from hon. and learned Members of the bar in his opposition to the contemplated appointment of three new Judges, whose united salaries were to amount to £15,000. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball), for instance, made anxious inquiries as to the time when the Bill would come into operation, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes) in his innocence supposed, if the Government got the discretionary power which they asked—a power which would place at their disposal salaries amounting to £15,000—that they would not exercise it in appointing new Judges and conferring high salaries upon them. He (Mr. Harcourt) protested against the doctrine that Law Lords were to receive pensions, which were not superannuations, without being required to render the country some service, if they were able to do so. He would not waste time by dividing upon the Amendment; but when the question of the pensions of the Law Lords arose upon an Amendment of the Attorney General, he would certainly ask the opinion of the Committee as to whether or not the public had a right to expect and ask the services of the Law Lords in the Appellate Court in consideration of their pensions. If the Committee came to an affirmative conclusion, then he thought these three additional Judges might be got rid of.

LORD JOHN MANNERS reminded the Committee that the late Lord Kingsdown and the late Lord Devon had given the country the benefit of their competent professional knowledge without pension or remuneration, in discharge of their duty, not only to their order, but to the Sovereign and the country. When it was proposed to abolish the connection which had hitherto existed between the House of Lords and the appellate jurisdiction of the country, then the position of ex-Chancellors qua the appellate jurisdiction was entirely changed. This was one of the many inconveniences which would arise from the hasty and precipitate decision of the Lords as to the abolition of their appellate jurisdiction. He regretted that decision; but, as far as this House was concerned, he did not regard the debate on the interpolated Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) as finally settling the question of their Lordships' appellate jurisdiction. The more the Bill was discussed the more did we exhibit our helplessness in the formation of an Appellate Tribunal, which was to be a substitute for the House of Lords. When they came to discuss the clauses which dealt more particularly with the formation and constitution of the proposed substitute for the Court of Appeal, they would find themselves in inextricable confusion.

Amendments (Mr. Attorney General) agreed to.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, with the object of securing the appointment in each Common Law division of the Court of at least one Judge practically conversant with the practice and principles of Equity, moved, in page 2, line 24, after "this Act," to add—

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

"And so many other judges, to be appointed by Her Majesty by letters patent, as may be required to constitute the several divisions of the court as hereinafter provided; and such other judges may be appointed by Her Majesty, and assigned to their respective divisions by letters patent, either before, at, or after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act: Provided always, That no such appointment shall come into operation before the time appointed for the commencement of this Act."

He disclaimed any intention to stereotype the distinctions between Law and Equity; but said the distinctions existed and could not be ignored. He provided by a subsequent Amendment that the offices he proposed to create should not be filled up unless, by death or retirement, the number of Judges in each division fell below five. The object of the Amendment was to provide for a transitional period, and could not cost more than £15,000 altogether.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment, not on the ground of economy, because if it could be shown that even a greater outlay would facilitate the administration of justice, he would support it; but here the Court did not require that additional strength which it was the object of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment to confer upon it.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that of course it was quite useless to go to a division in which he would be out-voted at once, and he would therefore withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT moved, in page 2, line 27, to leave out from "all persons," to "as heretofore," in line 33. As the divisions of the Common Law Courts were to be removed it was not too much to ask for the omission of all statements which regarded the existence of these divisions as permanent matters. Suppose the Queen in Council determined that, the transitional period having passed, the time had come to abolish the divisions in the Courts. What would then be the position of these great officers? The Courts would be abolished, yet the Chief Judges would be perpetuated under their present titles, which could not be affected by an Order in Council, having been created by statute. This would not be the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out; it would be the part of Hamlet with the play itself omitted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought there was no necessity for the omission of these words. The power given to the Queen in the Bill to abolish the divisions would equally give her power to abolish the titles of the Judges composing the divisions. If there was any doubt on this point, he was quite ready to introduce words in clause 29 which would make it clear that the offices would not survive the divisions.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved, in page 2, line 38, at end add—

"Provided always, That if at the commencement of this Act the number of puisne justices and junior barons who shall become judges of the said High Court shall exceed twelve in the whole, no new judge of the said High Court shall be appointed in the place of any such puisne justice or junior baron who shall die or resign while such whole number shall exceed twelve, it being intended that the permanent number of judges of the said High Court shall not exceed twenty-two."

Proviso agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Constitution of Court of Appeal).

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he thought that what had occurred to-day placed the Committee in greater difficulty than ever, for the Government had not only not made up their minds what they would do with the Scotch and Irish appeals, but were equally in doubt what they would do with regard to the additional Judges. The Prime Minister had reserved to himself a discretion as to the extra Judges who were to constitute the Appellate Court. The Committee did not know who they were to be, where they were to come from, or whether they were to be appointed at all. The Appellate Court, therefore, of which we had any certain information consisted of the two Lords Justices and the four Judges of the Privy Council. If that were to be the new Appellate Court which was to supersede the House of Lords, he was sorry he had voted for the abolition of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. Before the House proceeded further with the matter, he thought the Attorney General should state what was to be the constitution of the Court. He had already stated his objections to classify these Judges as ex officio, ordinary, and additional Judges, and he would therefore move in page 3, line 5, to leave out from "there shall be," to "ex-officio Judges," in line 7, and insert "the first Judges thereof."

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, if the Committee went into the clause at all they could not postpone it. He did not think the clause could be properly dealt with until the Committee knew exactly what the scheme of the Government should be, and therefore moved that the clause should be postponed.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that as there had already been an Amendment moved upon the clause, he could not receive the Motion for postponement unless the Amendment were withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Government could not accede to the proposal that the clause should be postponed. It was true they had acceded to certain changes; but these would not affect the constitution of the Court of Appeal as far as it was now under discussion, and the Committee were substantially in possession of the views of the Government upon the subject. He denied that the transfer of Scotch and Irish business to the new Court rendered necessary a postponement of the discussion. His right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had stated that there would probably be some judicial representation of Scotland and Ireland in the Court; but that introduced no uncertainty. All the Committee had to do was to consider the constitution of the Court as an English Appellate Court, and any Scotch and Irish element hereafter introduced would not make the constitution of the tribunal to any extent uncertain.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he did not wish to impede the progress of the Bill; but he contended that until the Committee knew from what source the Scotch and Irish Judges would come they could not legislate with certainty in constituting the Court of Appeal. The number of the Court would also be materially affected by the future proposals of the Government. It would be easier to go on with the other clauses than to prolong a discussion upon the future constitution of the Court.

THE LORD ADVOCATE observed that the postponement of the clause would not gain the object which the right hon. Gentleman had in view, which could only be attained by an Instruction of the House. Under that Instruction the clause might be modified, and the House would not be in a position to consider that matter until the Report was brought up. He thought the most convenient course would be to pass the clause conditionally, on the understanding that it should be re-considered and committed.

MR. GORDON said, he thought a discussion of the clause at present would be a waste of time, since it was not the clause which the Government would ultimately propose. He quite understood yesterday that when the Committee came to Clause 6 the Government would state to the Committee the Amendments they proposed, or that some indication would be given of them; but they had not done so. This was one of the most important questions in the Bill. He thought the question of the Appellate Court had been too hastily decided by the House of Lords, and he hoped it would be reconsidered. The Scotch Members who met yesterday were of opinion that, at any rate, there should be a proper representation of Scotland upon the new tribunal. He suggested that the question of the Appellate Court should be postponed for another Session, when the House of Lords and the House of Commons might consider whether the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords should be abolished, and, if so, how it should be replaced.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the real meaning of the objection taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon) was to postpone to another year the discussion of the question of appellate jurisdiction. Such at least was the practical meaning to be attached to his words. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not apprehend, however, that was by any means the object of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Spencer Walpole) who had brought forward this Motion, who had doubtless stated his entire purpose, and whose proposal he would treat upon its merits. He was not aware that there was any embarrassment, and even if this clause were postponed, the same difficulty would present itself when the clause came on again for discussion, because it might be said that the title of the Bill would still prevent the Committee from including Ireland and Scotland within its provisions. There was but one thing the Government could do towards smoothing the path of the Committee, and that was to make known the substance of the Amendments they would have to propose. One of these, as to which there was no difficulty, would extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal; but the difficulty which was felt by those hon. Gentlemen who felt any difficulty at all, had relation to the composition of that Court, which, as the Bill stood, consisted of five ex officio members and nine ordinary members, of whom three were to be found by means of new appointments. The Government thought it would be necessary to introduce into the Court of Appeal one ordinary member from the legal profession in Ireland and one ordinary member from the legal profession in Scotland. Together with the ordinary members so appointed it would be right to make an addition to the ex officio members of the Court of Appeal, and this addition would consist of not fewer than one from Scotland and one from Ireland. He was not able, however, yet to say whether it would or would not be expedient to proceed beyond that. This, he thought, comprised the whole substance of the case except as to one point in respect to which the Government had not yet arrived at a conclusion—namely, whether the arrangement he had just sketched out with reference to ordinary members chosen from the legal profession in Ireland and Scotland would or would not require any addition to the number of Judges. This, however, was not a question which need lead to embarrassment, because if there were any addition whatever, it would be the smallest possible addition. His right hon. Friend would now perceive what was the nature of the plan the Government intended to propose, and would probably admit that there could be no advantage in the postponement of the clause on the ground that the Committee would be better able to deal with it at a future period. He saw no reason why time should be lost. It would be necessary to re-commit the Bill; but before then the Government would be able to put the Committee in possession of the exact terms they proposed, and, under these circumstances, he hoped the Committee would proceed at once with the clause.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE feared that question after question would arise as to the constitution of the Appellate Court as the matter at present stood, and there would be other questions consequent upon the proposed addition to the duties of the Appellate Court. If his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government could undertake to put into shape the clause of which he had given Notice and the Amendments that he would introduce in reference to the Court of Appeal, so that they would be able to go into the question on Thursday next, he saw no reason why they should not postpone the clause now under consideration, and go on with the other clauses.

MR. HENLEY said, that the impression on his mind was that the Government never intended to include Ireland and Scotland; because why should the Committee be left labouring to fit up an appeal clause which would suit for England alone, and would be very unsuited to appeals from Ireland and Scotland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought that when the Prime Minister said that he would accept the proposition in good faith, it would be taken that he meant what he said. He would undertake to place the Amendments on the Paper, so that they would be in the hands of hon. Members by Thursday morning, and he trusted that under the circumstances there would be no difficulty in proceeding with the discussion of the clause.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY said, he thought the better course to adopt now would be simply to report Progress. It was impossible to proceed with this part of the clause without knowing not only how many additional Judges the Government meant to appoint, but also how they meant to deal with the Lord Justice General or the Lord Justice Clerk in Scotland, or the Lord Chancellor, or the Lord Justice of Appeal in Ireland. He hoped the Government would consent to reporting Progress.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he could not accept the principle that they ought to report Progress at a quarter-past 8; but understanding that there would be some difficulty in dealing with the clause without the Amendment of the Government being before the Committee, he was willing to move that the Chairman should report Progress.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he hoped that to-morrow afternoon they would be made acquainted with the final decision of the Government relative to the precise number of the Court, otherwise they might find it necessary to alter the provision they had already passed.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was impossible in a Bill of this kind absolutely to declare the amount of judicial strength they might find it their duty to recommend; but they would come as near as they could towards informing the House either precisely what was intended, or that the question left open should be brought within the narrowest possible limits.

MR. MATTHEWS observed that it would not be possible to introduce these Amendments until the Bill had gone through Committee; and how could they discuss properly the existing clauses with the Amendments hanging over their heads? The Bill had better be re-committed and the matter then discussed, so that there would be no necessity for going over it twice.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, that a noble Friend of his (Lord Henry Thynne) had an Amendment on the Paper that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, and that as he was absent, being obliged to leave town to attend quarter sessions, he would appeal to his hon. Friend to postpone the discussion. He begged to move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Robert Fowler.)

The House divided:—Ayes 142; Noes 218: Majority 76.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

[BILL 38.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. FOWLER, who was in charge of the Bill, said, he wished to make an explanation. He felt so much the importance of the Bill (the Landlord and Tenant Bill) which stood second on the Paper, which had been so largely discussed in almost every agricultural district in the kingdom, and to which so much importance was attached by the tenant-farmers and by many of the landlords of England, that he thought a full opportunity should be given for the discussion of it, and as the principle of the measure which stood in his name had been twice discussed in the present Parliament, he thought he should be doing his duty in waiving his right to ask that his measure should be read a second time, in order that the Landlord and Tenant Bill might be brought forward for discussion. Since he had given Notice of his intention to waive his right, he was much surprised to hear that there was a disinclination to submit the Landlord and Tenant Bill to the discussion of the House. He very much regretted that the illness of the author of the Landlord and Tenant Bill (Mr. James Howard) should prevent the discussion of a subject which was of the highest importance; but after the Notice he had given, the only thing that he could do was to move that the Order for the Second Reading of the Real Estates Settlements Bill be discharged.

Moved, “That the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged.”—(Mr. William Fowler).

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

LANDLORD AND TENANT BILL.

(Mr. James Howard, Mr. Clare Read.)

[BILL 56.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CLARE READ said, that last night he received information by a telegram from the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. James Howard), who was to have moved the second reading of this Bill, that indisposition would prevent him being in his place to move the second reading, and, therefore, he (Mr. Read) had to perform the very painful duty of asking the House to discharge the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill, and of giving Notice, on behalf of his hon. Friend, that, should the present Parliament sit again after the present Session, he would, at the earliest opportunity, re-introduce the Bill.

Moved, "That the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged."—(Mr. Clare Read).

SIR WILFRID LAWSON expressed his regret at the conclusion at which the hon. Member for South Norfolk had arrived, in moving that the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill be discharged. It was a most important question, especially as regarded the agricultural interest, and no one was better able to deal with such a subject than the hon. Gentleman. Moreover, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) thought it was proper that the country should learn the opinions of the great Conservative party upon the question of tenant right. Under these circumstances, he hoped the House would not permit the Order to be discharged, but insist on the Motion for the Second Reading being proceeded with, and the subject thoroughly discussed, and with that object, would move, as an Amendment, that the Order be proceeded with. If it were postponed, the House, on a hot afternoon in July, would have to deal with the Bill of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate)—namely, the Monastic and Conventual Institutions Bill.

MR. CORRANCE believed the Bill of his hon. Friend to be a most important one, but at that late period of the Session, he exercised a sound discretion in moving that the Order be discharged. He regretted the absence of the hon. Member for Bedford, and still more the cause of it; but although the Bill might involve a question of great importance, it was too late now to discuss it. He did not think that the House should be turned into a debating society for the purpose of merely discussing this question just before a General Election.

MR. BRAND said, he hoped the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle would divide the House on the proposition of withdrawing the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill. It was a question of great importance, and should therefore be discussed by the House, and not withdrawn in the inconsiderate manner proposed by his hon. Friend. The majority of the Conservative party had expressed their intention of voting for the second reading of this Bill, the object of which seemed to be to catch popular favour. He, therefore, thought the Bill should be submitted to discussion, and he was opposed to the discharge of the Order for its Second Reading.

LORD ELCHO said, he had heard with some surprise that last night, at 12 o'clock, a notice had been posted up at the Carlton, stating that the Bill would not be proceeded with at the morning sitting; and although his hon. Friend (Mr. Clare Read) did not think fit to proceed single-handed with the measure, there could be no doubt that he was quite able to deal with it. He (Lord Elcho) had given Notice of an Amendment, declaring that the House was not prepared to prohibit freedom of contract between landlord and tenant. Considering that the subject had been so largely discussed, and that pamphlets had been published upon it, he regretted that no discussion could now take place. He believed that there were in the Bill principles which were good and sound, but that there were other things in it which were wild, and on which Parliament ought to put its foot.

VISCOUNT ROYSTON said, that he had heard of no opinions on his side of the House in favour of the second reading of the Bill as it stood. He had, however, heard that if certain clauses were withdrawn, there would be no objection to the second reading. He greatly regretted that the discussion could not be proceeded with; but, on the other hand, he did not believe that the Bill would prove satisfactory to the country. The absence of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. James Howard) was an unfortunate affair, and still more so the cause of it; but he thought the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had exercised a wise discretion in moving that the Order be discharged. Many distinguished Members of the Conservative party were now discharging their duty at the quarter sessions. He therefore deprecated any attempt to proceed with the Bill.

MR. BRUCE regretted the absence of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. James Howard), and the postponement of a more useful and interesting discussion than often occupied the House on a Wednesday, and he did so the more especially, as it was one which had received the careful consideration of the Government, and upon which they were prepared to express their opinion, if the Bill had proceeded to the second reading. The course of proceeding in withdrawing the Order was exceedingly unusual, and no man was better able to handle the subject than the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read); but in the unavoidable absence of the promoter of the Bill, no other course could perhaps be taken. He hoped, therefore, his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would not insist that the House proceed with the discussion.

Mr. WHITWELL thought that the country at large would extremely regret the withdrawal of the Bill. After the expression of regret by the right hon. Gentleman, and the interest said to be taken by the Government in the Bill, a day ought to be fixed for a discussion on the second reading.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY also regretted the collapse of the discussion, but he agreed that it would be unusual and inconvenient to force it on under the circumstances. As to one principle of the Bill—so far as compensation to tenants for unexhausted improvements was concerned, a large number of hon. Members on that side of the House had already granted it. As his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk did not wish to undertake the question single-handed, he thought he had taken the proper course.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he had always understood that the main principle of the Bill was, that compensation should be given for unexhausted improvements, where it was not secured by other means. Where that could be obtained it was most desirable. At the same time, he very much deprecated the provisions which would preclude the right of free contract. Such a principle was as applicable to commerce and to trade as it was to agriculture, and Parliament could not possibly sanction it.

Mr. PARKER said, that the country believed that there was some unwillingness on the part of the House to express their feelings on the principles involved in the Bill. Although the Bill did not extend to Scotland, it was regarded with great interest by agricultural constituencies there, who would naturally regret the withdrawal of the measure. He had received a great number of communications respecting it, and if the House went to a division he should certainly vote that the Bill be proceeded with.

Mr. WREN HOSKYNs thought the withdrawal of the Bill was one of the greatest calamities of the Session. A discussion upon it would have shown who were the true friends of the farmers in that House. He hoped that the Government would take steps to have a full discussion on the subject. The question was brought before the House in 1848 by Mr. Pusey, and had remained dangling ever since. At that time the Conservative party were against tenant-right.

Mr. PELL thought the hon. Member for South Norfolk was perfectly justified in moving that the Order be discharged. He contended that after the posting of a notice at the Carlton Club to the effect that the Bill would be withdrawn, the House could not, in the absence of their Leaders, proceed with the discussion of this measure. What would have been said in the course of discussion would have had greater reference to the next General Election than to the actual merits of the question.

Mr. SERJEANT SHERLOCK, as an Irish Member, would have liked to have heard the question discussed, because, notwithstanding the Irish Land Act, there was a good deal of excitement in some agricultural districts in Ireland, and the Land Question was not considered finally settled there. The Bill appeared to go further in some respects than the Irish Land Act.

Mr. SPEAKER reminded the hon. and learned Member that the Motion before the House was that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged. To go into the merits of the Bill upon such a question would be quite out of Order.

Mr. SERJEANT SHERLOCK, resuming, asked the House not to assent to the withdrawal of the Bill, as the whole of the United Kingdom was interested in a discussion of this question.

Mr. A. EGERTON said, the principle of compensation for unexhausted improvement was generally admitted; but objecting, as he did, to other parts of the Bill, his vote upon the second reading would have depended upon the concessions which were made by the promoters. The hon. Member for South Norfolk would have been unable to give any satisfactory assurance upon the point, and had therefore exercised a sound discretion in withdrawing the Bill.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he had sent to the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. James Howard) a telegram to which he had received no reply, informing him that his Bill would be taken first that day. Universal disappointment would be caused by the withdrawal of the measure.

MR. G. E. M. MONCKTON said, that his constituency strongly objected to the Bill. It was true that they were protected by local custom; but they felt that under the Bill they would be in a worse position than they occupied now.

MR. HENLEY said, the 2nd of July was quite a sufficient justification for withdrawing the Bill, for no one could expect any legislation on the subject during the present Session. There seemed to be a fixed determination on the part of the House to do no Business on Tuesday and Friday evenings. If, therefore, the Bill went on, time would be wasted, and worse than wasted, in making speeches upon a matter which everybody knew perfectly well would come to nothing.

MR. M'LAGAN observed that the votes of many hon. Members would depend on the concessions which the hon. Member for Bedford intended to make; and as that hon. Member was not present, he thought the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Clare Read) was perfectly correct in the course he had taken. If the Bill had proceeded, he (Mr. M'Lagan) would have been prepared to show that, while fully recognizing the tenant's right to compensation, the plan set forth in the Bill was not the best calculated for the advancement of agriculture.

VISCOUNT MAHON said, he concurred with the promoter of the Bill as to the principle of compensation for unexhausted improvements, and hoped the Bill would be introduced next Session without the objectionable clauses restricting freedom of contract.

MR. MUNSTER pointed out that the Bill had been before the House since the 18th February, and therefore he was surprised that it should not be proceeded with.

COLONEL NORTH contended that there was no time left in that Session for properly discussing this subject, which was one of very great importance to the country generally.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that after the expression of the opinion of the House, he should not press his opposition to the discharge of the Order. The discussion that had taken place was no doubt highly instructive.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

LORD ELCHO said, he thought it of the utmost importance that the House should discuss the general question of interference with contracts. He would, therefore, give Notice, that on the first favourable occasion, he should move as an independent Motion the Resolution which stood in his name on the Notice Paper:—

"That this House, while ready to consider any well-devised measure which, in the absence of any lease or agreement, proposes to give reasonable security to the capital of the Tenant invested in the land, and due protection to the property of the Landlord, is not prepared to prohibit freedom of contract in England between Landlord and Tenant."

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS BILL—[BILL 62.]

(Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Holt, Sir Thomas Chambers.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. NEWDEGATE—Mr. Speaker, in moving "That the Bill be now read the second time:" I am glad to avail myself of the present opportunity to describe what it is I now propose, although it has come upon me somewhat unexpectedly. I feel that the House may fairly expect that I should state my reasons for proposing the second reading of the Bill. The House will remember that I have been twice permitted to introduce this measure. Early last Session the House gave me leave to bring it in; but such was the encumbered state of the Order Paper, crowded with Bills, many of which were never likely to receive the decision of the House, that last Session I was unable to take the sense of the House upon the Bill. Again I have been denied the opportunity until this late period of the present Session. I am perfectly aware, Sir, that the opposition to the Bill has been, and is, of an indirect, but of a most pertinacious character. It is the same opposition that has been offered in every country where these Conventual and Monastic Institutions have existed, whenever any proposal has been made that they should be regulated by law, or controlled by the Government. It is the same opposition—the opposition of the party which is called Ultramontane in some countries, and Clerical in others; a party devoted to promoting the universal power of the Papacy as universal. Early in the present Session the very unusual course was adopted of resisting by a division the introduction of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews) moved that I should not be permitted to submit the Bill to the House; but the House decided by a majority of two to one that it would entertain the subject-matter of the Bill. Again, to-day, at the outset of this discussion, I observe a manifest unwillingness to entertain the subject; and why is that? Is it because the subject-matter of the Bill is insignificant? The example of the Parliament and Government of the German Empire in passing a measure which completely re-organizes the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the State, in consequence, avowedly, of the action of the Monastic Orders upon the Roman Catholic Bishops in that country, confutes the idea that the subject is insignificant. Is the form in which I suggest the inquiry, which the Bill would institute, unnecessarily offensive? This is the second reading of the Bill. I have stated before, and I repeat, that I should be ready in Committee, if the Bill should remain until that stage in my hands, to adopt any reasonable suggestion that may render the measure as inoffensive as possible to my opponents. My opponents may claim to represent the whole Roman Catholic population of this country; but I at once deny the validity of that claim. They may represent the ecclesiastical authorities of the Church of Rome; but I deny that they represent the whole body of the Roman Catholic laity. They may represent a majority of the laity; but I know that they do not represent a large minority of their co-religionists, nor is it reasonable to suppose that they do. Far more stringent measures have been adopted with respect to those institutions by the Roman Catholic Parliament of Italy than is proposed by the Bill, which is solely for inquiry. The Italians who know these institutions better than any other nation—they who most thoroughly understand the social effects of these institutions—they who can best appreciate the political dangers which these institutions have entailed, the Italian Parliament, have passed a law for the suppression of Monastic Institutions. You cannot say that they are not Roman Catholics. You cannot say that the Spanish nation is not Roman Catholic, and yet in Roman Catholic Spain the legislation of late years has shown a manifest consciousness of the political necessity that has existed for suppressing Monastic Institutions. And what is the aspect of Spain now? That those who formerly defended these Monastic Institutions, and in many cases persons who were members of those institutions, are actively contributing to plunge that country into civil war, and seem to have rendered all settled form of government impossible. I say, then, that it is not because this is a little question that I am met by this opposition. It may be asked, why do I not leave this measure to be introduced by Her Majesty's Government? In reply, I will appeal to the history of kindred proposals. This question has been entertained by the House during several Sessions. In 1851, it was raised in the form of a Bill for the inspection of convents. In 1853, the House of Commons, by large majorities, repeatedly declared that inspection of convents of women by the authority of the State was necessary. Again, in 1854, by large majorities, the House affirmed the same opinion; but in every one of those instances the House was baffled by what they call abroad the clerical opposition. In 1864, a question as to certain property which was obtained by the Oratorians at Brompton arose, and I moved for the appointment of a Select Committee in this House that should inquire as to the position and the relations of these institutions with respect to property; that proposal was rejected by a small majority. In the following year, I moved that a Select Committee of this House should inquire into the number of inmates in such institutions, as to the circumstances, property, position, and discipline of those institutions, and that Motion was rejected by a small majority. In 1868 and 1869, I moved that the relations of these institutions to property, that the rapid increase of their number, and the methods by which they were acquiring property should be investigated by this House. The majorities against these proposals diminished gradually, until in 1870 the House decided—first, by a small majority, but afterwards by larger majorities, that the increase of these Monastic and Conventual Institutions, their acquisition of property, their character and the inefficient state of the law with respect to them should be referred to a Select Committee of this House.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, and it not being Four of the clock:—When other Members entered the House, Mr. Speaker again counted the House, and 40 Members being present,

MR. NEWDEGATE resumed: Mr. Speaker: I cannot but express the regret I feel at the attempt which has been made to destroy the free action of this House. The hon. Members who had left the House, and have now returned to it, are perfectly aware that when once you, Mr. Speaker, have taken that Chair at noon on a Wednesday you must remain in it until 4 o'clock. I can only therefore consider this form of opposition as threatening both the Orders and the free action of this House. If, Sir, I could feel that in the course I am pursuing there was any justification for the attempt which has now been made, such consciousness would occasion me the deepest regret; but, on the contrary, I feel that by submitting this proposal to the House, and by resisting such attempts, I am vindicating the independence of the House of Commons, and the right of this country to be represented on all subjects, not according to the will of a small minority in this House, however influential may be the organization that supports that minority, but according to ancient usage, so that this House shall fully represent the deliberate judgment of the country upon every subject which it is competent for the House in your judgment, Sir, to entertain. I will now proceed further to explain the purport of the Bill; what is the object of the Bill? The Bill proposes that exemption from inquiry by Commissioners which has hitherto been permitted to these Monastic and Conventual Institutions of the Church of Rome shall cease. The institutions of every other denomination have been inquired into by Commissioners, appointed either under the Sign Manual of Her Majesty, or by statute; and I say, Sir, that it is an anomaly, that exemption from inquiry should be permitted to these Monastic and Conventual Institutions. This peculiar privilege of exemption commenced with the exception of these institutions from the operation of the Act of 1853, which constituted the Charity Commission. It is with a view to terminate this peculiar, and as it now appears to be considered privileged, exemption that I introduce the Bill. Sir, the Bill proposes that Commissioners shall be appointed for three years, and knowing that a plea has been advanced that these institutions, or some of them, are of so peculiar a nature that it will injure the feelings of the Roman Catholic Members of this House, and of Roman Catholics generally, if any Commissioners should be appointed and empowered to inquire into those institutions, I propose that the Commission of Inquiry should be thus constituted. The proposal is not as yet embodied in the Bill as it stands; but I have given Notice that I intend to move in Committee that the Commissioners to conduct this inquiry shall be appointed in the following manner—namely, one by the Lord Chancellor, one by the Speaker of the House of Commons, one by the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, two by the Roman Catholic Poor School Committee; and I select that body, because it is the only exclusively Roman Catholic organization which has hitherto been recognized by Parliament. It is recognized as the recipient of the grant of public money made to Roman Catholic schools, and is treated as the body to which is committed the administration of those schools, subject, of course, to inspection by the State. I propose that another Commission of Inquiry be appointed by the Charity Commissioners, under whose jurisdiction Parliament has twice decided to place these institutions—first, during the passage of the Act constituting the Charity Commissioners in the year 1853. The exemption of these institutions was not granted until that Bill which had come down to this House from the House of Lords had reached its third reading. The exemption of those institutions was granted during the passage of that Bill through its last stage. Again, in the year 1860, I supported a Bill which was introduced by my late Friend (Sir Charles Selwyn), afterwards one of the Lords Justices, and which was adopted by the late Sir George Lewis. The Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860 passed both Houses of Parliament with the intention of including under the operation of the law the property of these institutions; but in doing that, to meet as far as possible the objections raised by the representatives of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. That Bill, Sir, by its operation enabled a large amount of Roman Catholic charity property to be enrolled; but the period for enrolment under the provisions of that Act ceased in 1861, and since then Roman Catholic trusts have ceased to be practically amenable to the general law by enrolment, so as to be accessible to the inspection of the Charity Commissioners and persons interested in that property. I think I have said enough to show the House that the exemption of these institutions, and of the property which they are rapidly acquiring, is peculiar and anomalous. Why, I ask, should the whole class of these rapidly-increasing institutions be exempted from the operation of the general law with respect to the acquisition of property? Why should a large class of institutions, like these Monastic and Conventual Establishments, be left beyond the purview and reach of the law? That the Monastic Institutions are illegal has been proved by the Roman Catholic witnesses who appeared before the Select Committee of 1870. If they are innocent, why should they be illegal? Then, take the case of convents of women, which are not illegal. These convents, and I will give their number presently, are rapidly increasing and acquiring property; why should they, in this country, be exempt from that inspection and control by the State to which similar, nay kindred, institutions are subjected in every country in Europe where they are permitted to exist? Why, I say, should the law which prevails in Prussia, and generally now throughout Germany, not be adopted here? That law which requires that the name of every inmate of these convents should be registered and accessible to the magistrates of the district? Why, I say, should convents in this country not be subject to visitation, as convents are in France by the mayor of the arrondissement? Convents have a peculiar and unsafe exemption here, on the plea of the illegality which attaches to the manner of their acquiring and holding property. That exemption is extending, and is becoming a privileged exemption, and is thus justly exciting the jealousy of all other denominations who are subject—and properly subject—to the control of the law, and to the supervision of the State in respect of several particulars with respect to which these Roman Catholic institutions are exempt. Do I, Sir, propose any rash method of inquiry that might be termed harsh? I propose that the Commissioners shall be appointed by the highest officers of the State, and in addition to the Commissioner thus to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor; in addition to the Commissioner that shall be appointed by yourself, Sir; in addition to the Commissioner that shall be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench; in addition to the two Commissioners that I propose, should be nominated by the Roman Catholic Poor Schools Committee, I propose that one Commissioner should be nominated by a body of Commissioners, who are expressly appointed in this country to conduct a peculiar species of inquiry, in the prosecution of which any grossness, any undue interference, any want of consideration or of courtesy would be peculiarly painful to families. On account of their already proved qualifications in that respect, I propose that another member of the Commission shall be nominated by the Lunacy Commissioners; and I have selected the Commissioners in Lunacy because they are in the habit of dealing with the affairs of families without exposing their affairs to needless publicity, or inflicting unnecessary pain. It is with the view of preventing the undue coercion of individuals by families who forget their duty that the Commissioners in Lunacy have been appointed. They possess qualifications, which peculiarly fit them for their duties, and I therefore consider them the persons best fitted to nominate one other member of the Commission, the appointment of which I submit to the consideration of this House. I am anxious, Sir, fully to explain the manner in which I propose that these Commissioners should be appointed—and appointed only—for the purpose of inquiry. I trust that I have shown that to the utmost of my humble ability I have sought to render this investigation, which I feel to be no less necessary in this country than it has been found to be necessary in every country in Europe, should be conducted in a manner the least offensive to my Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. There is a strong feeling in this House that it is time this exemption of these Monastic and Conventual Institutions from the control of the law, carried out by the Executive of State, should cease. Parliament has repeatedly declared its opinion in that sense, and I now ask the House again to declare that opinion. Well, Sir, there are Notices upon the Books of this House manifesting the intention of several hon. Members to invite Her Majesty's Government to undertake this question. I admit, Sir, that it is the duty of the Government to do so; but I am warned by my long experience in this House that nothing has ever been attempted by any Government in this country with regard to this subject, until the House of Commons has by a majority decided that it would undertake this subject. Under the stress of this House, in 1870, the First Minister of the Crown undertook the appointment and regulation of a Committee of Inquiry. I feel that that justifies me as an unofficial Member of this House in proposing the appointment of this Commission, because the experience of the House of Commons shows that unless the House acts in this matter for itself, and upon its own judgment, no Government has hitherto ventured to deal with this subject. I am ready, Sir, however, at once to yield this subject into the hands of Her Majesty's Government. I should greatly rejoice to see them undertake it, or hear them promise to undertake it. I am comparatively powerless myself; but I represent the deliberate opinion of hundreds of thousands of my fellow-countrymen, and I can assure Her Majesty's Government that they would receive the whole of that support, that they would be looked up to as the first Government in this country who had undertaken to destroy this anomalous exemption, by deciding to extend the power of the State and of the law over those institutions which are exempted from the power of the State, and from the operation of the law in no other country in Europe where they are still permitted. Let me now advert to figures in order to show that since the investigations of the Select Committee of 1870 the number of those institutions has continued to increase. I will show the House how gradual, how progressive, and how steady has been that increase, and that it is continuous. The most indisputable account of these institutions must be that which was given by his Eminence the late Cardinal Wiseman. In 1864, Cardinal Wiseman attended a Roman Catholic Congress at Malines in Belgium, and I have a copy of the statement contained in the speech he then made, and in which this passage occurs—

"From 16 convents which we possessed in 1830, we have now in Great Britain 162. In 1830 we had not a single religious house for men; but in 1850 there were 11, and to-day their number is 55."

And what, Sir, was the number of convents, according to The Roman Catholic Directory? The Roman Catholic Directory showed convents of women in 1870 to the number of 233, and The Roman Catholic Directory for 1873 shows convents of women, 260. Then, as to the religious houses for men, his Eminence declared their number to have been 55 in Great Britain at the close of the year 1863, and I am speaking only of Great Britain. The Roman Catholic Directory in 1870 showed that there were 69 religious houses for men or Monastic Institutions, and in 1873 The Roman Catholic Directory shows the number of 77. There has therefore been an increase of eight monastic houses since 1870; that is, according to The Roman Catholic Directory; according to which authority also there has been an increase in the number of convents for women between 1870 and 1873 of 27. Thus, the House will observe that the increase is continuous. I know that Mr. Cuddens, a Roman Catholic lawyer, one of the legal witnesses who were called before the Committee of 1870, contradicted the statement which appeared in The Roman Catholic Direc- tory that there were 69 religious houses for men. He also contradicted the statement of his Eminence, who said that there were 55 at Christmas, 1863. Mr. Cudden stated that in 1870 there were only 80 Monastic Institutions; but then he added that besides those 80 Monastic Institutions, as he described them, there were 121 clerical residences occupied by members of the regular Monastic Orders of the Church of Rome. I questioned him with regard to the number of inmates in those houses; but, as was the case with the other Roman Catholic barristers and solicitors who were brought before the Committee, the moment any Member of the Committee asked what was the number of inmates within an avowed monastery, as he had described it, or in a religious house, the moment you asked Mr. Hastings, or any of the witnesses who appeared in behalf either of these Monastic or of these Conventual Institutions, the number of inmates in any monastery or convent, or to state the locality of any such house, or of the property associated with it, he instantly replied that it was contrary to his duty to do so, or to give any such information. So was not satisfied with this, and I endeavored to persuade the Committee to examine some of the records and papers of such a community, with the object of ascertaining whether the numbers of inmates were really as large as they were represented to be. I then asked Mr. Hastings, or any of the witnesses, whether they would be prepared to give any such information, and they all replied that it was contrary to their duty to do so. I then asked Mr. Hastings, or any of the witnesses, whether they would be prepared to give any such information, and they all replied that it was contrary to their duty to do so. I then asked Mr. Hastings, or any of the witnesses, whether they would be prepared to give any such information, and they all replied that it was contrary to their duty to do so.

and it is because their investigations, according to their own declaration, are incomplete that I, at the instance of some hundreds of thousands of persons in this country, ask this House, by statute, to appoint a Commission which shall conduct upon the spot where any of these institutions are discovered to exist, and upon oath administered to the witnesses, an investigation which I fully believe no Committee of this House, considering the opposition of the Roman Catholic witnesses to giving evidence, would be able satisfactorily to conduct. What, Sir, is the last paragraph of the Report of the Select Committee of 1871? It runs in these words—

"The operations contained in the Report will probably suggest some means of increasing the number of the law, and the Commission would be a more efficient and economical mode of proceeding than the one now proposed. A single Commission, composed of a few persons, would be able to visit the various monasteries and convents, and to ascertain the means by which their revenues and other matters are obtained, and to ascertain the number of inmates, and the nature of the property associated with them, and to report on the results of their inquiries. It is proposed that a Commission should be appointed, and that it should be empowered to visit the various monasteries and convents, and to ascertain the means by which their revenues and other matters are obtained, and to ascertain the number of inmates, and the nature of the property associated with them, and to report on the results of their inquiries."

Now, in reading the evidence which I proposed, the Commission should be empowered to visit the various monasteries and convents, and to ascertain the means by which their revenues and other matters are obtained, and to ascertain the number of inmates, and the nature of the property associated with them, and to report on the results of their inquiries. I then asked Mr. Hastings, or any of the witnesses, whether they would be prepared to give any such information, and they all replied that it was contrary to their duty to do so. I then asked Mr. Hastings, or any of the witnesses, whether they would be prepared to give any such information, and they all replied that it was contrary to their duty to do so. I then asked Mr. Hastings, or any of the witnesses, whether they would be prepared to give any such information, and they all replied that it was contrary to their duty to do so.

be appointed to inquire further as to these increasing and extending institutions. Why is there need for such an inquiry? Because the state of the law in this country is not suited for the proper control of those institutions. A decision has been given by Vice Chancellor Wickens in the Court of Chancery, in the case of Cox v. Manners, to this effect—that where property was left to two convents of different kinds, one being a convent at Carisbrooke in the Isle of Wight, and the other a convent of “Sœurs de Charité” at Selly Oak, near Birmingham, the “Sœurs de Charité”—ladies who are employed in works of charity—are incompetent by the law of England to take and hold impure personality; while the cloistered convent at Carisbrooke in the Isle of Wight, in which the inmates are employed only in devotional exercises, and are not permitted to exercise themselves in works of external charity, can take and hold impure personality—that is, charges upon land to any extent. Now, what is the law of France? By the law of France cloistered convents are not authorized, and such a convent as that at Carisbrooke would not be authorized—that is, recognized and capacitated by the law; whilst the convent of Selly Oak, the inmates of which are devoted to works of charity, would, by the law of France, be authorized and capacitated. Therefore the law of England is in direct contradiction to the Code Napoléon and the law of France. Is not that an anomaly? Look at the law of Scotland. In Scotland there was a law called the Law of Deathbed, the only Scotch law in the sense of the statutes of mortmain which our ancestors found it necessary to enact in order to prevent the undue accumulation of property in the hands of the Monastic and Conventual Orders. It has recently been the pleasure of this House to repeal the Law of Deathbed; and in consequence the Scotch people now stand in this position—that there is no law whatever to prevent the representatives of these Monastic and Conventual Institutions from acquiring any amount of real property in Scotland in perpetuity, although restrictions in the sense of the ancient law of mortmain exist in every State in Europe, exist in England, and exist in Ireland. Is that not, then, a case which demands the careful investigation of competent Commissioners, in order to advise Parliament how it shall proceed to deal with an exemption so peculiar and so complicated as the exemption from the operation of our laws which those institutions present? I scarcely like to advert to such a subject; but I have been before, and am now, the object of much virulent attack by the party who would by continuing the exemption of these institutions from the operation of the law establish an alien jurisdiction in this country. What is the answer by which we are met when we urge inquiry as to convents of women? We are met by this sort of answer. Dr. Ullathorne, in 1865, wrote to me in this sense—

“Why are you discontented with the supervision of these institutions? I have full authority over all the conventual institutions in Warwickshire, part of which you represent.”

It did not appear, Sir, in the case of Saurin v. Starr that the authority of the Roman Catholic Bishop had very much influence. For what appeared in that case? That Miss Saurin, the lady who suffered persecution in the convent at Hull, had a brother who was a Jesuit priest. The object of the Superioress, Mrs. Starr, was to compel Miss Saurin to leave her convent. Miss Saurin, supported by her brother, who was a Jesuit priest, objected to leave her convent, because it would have been inconsistent with the perpetual vows she had taken; and what was the operation of the law of England in that case? It practically intercepted the action of the Bishop who had obtained power from Rome to absolve this lady from her vows; and is not that, I ask, an anomaly? Am I to be told that the law of England is rightly used and interpreted, when it seems to intercept the abolition of perpetual conventual vows, obligations which are condemned by the Code Napoléon and the law of France, and which are now again virtually condemned by the recent decision of the Parliament and Emperor of Germany? Is it a satisfactory state of the law of England that it can be thus used? A pamphlet has been published by a person whom I suppose I must call “learned,” intitled Monastic and Conventual Institutions; their Legal Position, Property, and Disabilities. By Hugo J. Young, B.A., Barrister-at-law. London: Burns and Oates, 1873. I wish to show the House the kind of means that are employed to deter hon. Members of this House from the performance of their duty. I have the pamphlet here, and in the Preface I find the following passage:—

"Mr. Newdegate's most recent Bill warns us now to look into the real nature of the houses within its scope. Its very boldness seems to suggest that there must be some justification for its proposals. But it is not the boldness of justice, it is the shamelessness of depravity."

This person gives his address—"Hugo J. Young, Lamb Buildings, Temple, E.C., 1873." He has chambers in Lamb Buildings, but has not taken the trouble to put on sheep's clothing; anything grosser than such an imputation as this it would be impossible to pen. Another bulky volume has been published, and inasmuch as it has been disputed that these convents are connected with monastic houses—that the Superiors of a Monastic Order—that is, of a male Monastic Order, are also Superiors over the convents of their Order; but that connection is admitted in the bulky volume to which I refer. It is entitled Terra Incognita, and it shows that on account of this connection convents should be included with monastic houses under any inquiry which this House may think fit to authorize. Now, I know that the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews) and this precious Mr. Young would have it believed that I have some design to insult or annoy the ladies who are the inmates of convents. Sir, I was aware years ago that attempts would be made to fix upon me that vile imputation. When Dr. Ullathorne, who calls himself Bishop of Birmingham, invited me to visit, accompanied by himself, the convent of Colwich and other institutions of the like nature in the county I represent, I replied that I would never enter a convent accompanied by Dr. Ullathorne or with his assistance; that I never will enter a convent except as authorized by Her Majesty's Commission, and in the performance of my duty under that Commission; because I know that were I to do so I should become the object of these depraved accusations which exhibit a foulness of mind on the part of those who utter them totally unworthy of gentlemen. But, after all, Sir, this is quite a minor matter. There is in this country a widely-felt anxiety, a deep-seated belief, that the personal freedom of the inmates of convents is not duly secured, and that conviction this House has repeatedly declared by its votes in 1853, in 1854; and again by the three divisions in 1870, this House has affirmed that the law of Habeas Corpus is inefficient, insufficient in the case of convents. I advert to this, because, when it was recently suggested in a well-known case now before the Court of Queen's Bench, by one of the counsel, Dr. Kenealy, that a nun resident in a convent could not be brought before the Court as a witness, the Lord Chief Justice of England is reported to have said that, if any opposition were offered to the production of that witness, a little bit of paper from the Court of Queen's Bench would open the doors of any convent in the country. What the Lord Chief Justice stated was quite true in that instance, because the Court had then before it sufficient proof that there was a particular nun resident in a particular convent; and when once furnished with that information the writ of Habeas Corpus is sufficient. But the difficulty in other cases is this—and this has been found and acted upon in every country in Europe except England; that the writs under the law of Habeas Corpus cannot be issued, unless in the first instance the Court is satisfied that there is such a person within such a convent, and that such person desires to be removed or liberated from such convent. The law fails in this—that without inspection you cannot be sure of obtaining that requisite but preliminary information; and seldom will obtain it unless under some peculiar circumstances such as those which occurred the other day in the Court of Queen's Bench. For then counsel stated to the Court that there was a certain person who would be a valuable witness who was a nun in a convent which he described. When once the Court has that information in its possession it can proceed by Habeas Corpus, but without such information a writ of Habeas Corpus cannot be issued; and it was because the House of Commons in 1853 and 1854 was fully conscious of that failure in the law that the majority voted over and over again that convents ought to be submitted to inspection in order to ensure that the law of England should be operative within their walls. I can well imagine, Sir, whence the opposition which has manifested itself so unbecomingly in one quarter of the House to-day has arisen.

Mr. Newdegate

In 1870, the Rev. Mr. Gallwey published a pamphlet with reference to the Notice for a Select Committee that I then had before this House; and what is the substance of that pamphlet? The author signs his name as Father Gallwey, S. J. He declares himself to be a Jesuit, and that he is so, I believe, is well known. In that pamphlet, he enjoins upon all the nuns who are resident in this country, that rather than appear before a Committee of this House as they have appeared, and recently appeared before the Courts of this country, they should submit to be found guilty of contempt and suffer imprisonment. Such, Sir, is the advice of an eminent Jesuit to the nuns in this country. He is evidently a clever man, and has written a clever and an able pamphlet; and he entitled it Committee on Convents. The Nun's Choice. Notes for Neudefgate—Newgate or Neudefgate. It is worthy of the talent of this Jesuit to give his pamphlet such a title; but let hon. Members observe what is conveyed under this jocose title, and ask themselves whether the advice here given has no influence over these nuns? It is perfectly well known that the Conventual Order of the Sacre Cœur is connected with the Jesuit Order; and at Roehampton this Father Gallwey is not only the Superior of a monastic institution, but has also control over a convent near it. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] The hon. Member says "No, no!" Is it not probable that Father Gallwey in giving his pamphlet the title he chose has suggested inquiries on my part which render me better informed than the hon. Member? I have ascertained that several convents are subject to the control of monastic Superiors of the same or like Orders. That is one reason why I have in the frame of the Bill included both Monastic and Conventual Institutions. It is known that throughout the Continent these institutions are frequently subject to the same authority. Why, Sir, we who live in old houses in this country know something about the canon law of Rome. - I myself live in a house that was once a priory. The priory was suppressed under a Bull which Cardinal Wolsey had obtained from the Pope for the suppression of the smaller religious houses, and I know that the constitution of that House before it was suppressed was most peculiar, for this reason—there was a large and influential convent at Nuneaton, and Dugdale the historian of my county, and other old records tell me that the Prior of Erdbury was the ecclesiastical inferior of the Abbess of Nuneaton, and that that was a singular exception to the almost general rule under which an abbot or a prior was superior to the conventual institutions of his own Order in the vicinity of his abbey or priory. The Mr. Hugo J. Young, who thinks me so depraved, evidently desires that no limits should be assigned to the acquisition of property by these Monastic and Conventual Institutions. He writes as follows:—

"Tracing back to the earliest times we find monasteries holding a prominent position in the history of this country. . . . They were in fact, in most instances, corporations empowered to hold property, and the law sanctioned a tenure peculiar to them, and endowed with special advantages. This tenure was known as Frankalmoin, or free alms, and was relieved from the burdens which pressed so heavily upon feudal property. . . . None of these imposts were incident to the tenure of Frankalmoin, because, as Littleton says, the prayers and other divine services of the tenants were better for the lords than any doing of fealty. . . . Such licences of alienation in mortmain were, however, frequently granted, and we find these institutions, in the Middle Ages, the richest in Europe. To this wealth is to be traced one of the chief causes of their ultimate downfall: for, doubtless, the desire to possess himself of their property, had great weight in inducing a bankrupt and rapacious Sovereign to ordain their suppression."

That is the tenor of the history for which this Mr. Young cites the authority of Littleton. How different from the account of these matters is the view given by the historian, Lord Lyttelton—

"The great increase of religious houses must be reckoned among the evils of this age—Henry II. The author of the Nobilia Monastica computes the number of such houses built in England, during the reigns of Henry I., Stephen, and Henry II., at no less than 300."

We are approaching the same number now—

"And Mr. Inett asserts, that more monasteries and other religious societies were founded in that kingdom during the single reign of Henry I. than in 500 years before. But he rightly observes that this was not peculiar to this nation. The high opinion of the merit of such foundations infused into the minds of the laity by the divines of those days, the hopes of compounding in this manner with the Deity for the greatest offences, but more especially the liberty granted by the Pope of commuting for vows made to go to the holy wars by benefactions of this kind, filled all Europe with convents. In the year 1152 the Cistercian Order, which had been founded in 1098, had no fewer than 500. Among other causes of the increase of monasteries in this kingdom may be reckoned the civil war with which it was afflicted during the reign of King Stephen; for many of the nobility engaged in those troubles endeavoured to atone for the pillage of the people and other crimes they had committed, by raising or endowing religious houses, and others desired to secure for themselves and their children a quiet asylum in these places. The pernicious consequences of such numbers of men and women being confined to a life of celibacy were grievously felt in the reign of Henry II., by continuing and increasing the depopulation of the country, which the commotions in that of his predecessor had occasioned. Nor was it a small inconvenience to the Government of this monarch, in his disputes with the Pope, that he had so many persons in his realm who, by their separation from society, and the nature of their institutions, were more devoted to the See of Rome than the secular clergy, which difference showed itself upon several occasions in the conduct of both; and the practice of exempting monks from the proper authority of the diocesan Bishops increased this mischief."

Well, Sir, I believe that no one will doubt the authority or the impartiality of the historian, Lord Lyttelton. But if they do, I can quote Hallam, Blackstone, and the other eminent historians in the same sense—that the history of this country in Roman Catholic times shows that the Sovereigns found it necessary to prevent the exceeding increase of monastic and conventual houses and property; that Henry V. obtained the power to suppress several of the minor priories, and used it; that Henry VII., through Cardinal Morton, obtained the power, and used it; that Henry VIII., through Cardinal Wolsey, obtained the power, and used it; therefore, when hon. Members and others speak of the control over, or of the diminution of those institutions, as always the act of some tyrannical Sovereign, or some outrage on the part of the lay and temporal authority of the nation, I quote to them the fact, that when this country was exclusively Roman Catholic, successive Popes, at the instance of successive Cardinals, authorized and enjoined the visitation and, in many cases, the suppression of monastic and conventual houses, on account of gross abuses, which the more honest of the Popes of that time were ready to acknowledge and correct. I have therefore the authority of infallibility—if we are to be told that the Popes are infallible—that it is the duty of the State to look to it that these institutions do not unduly increase—and they are increasing rapidly in this country; to see that they do not unduly acquire property which ought to remain the heritage of families; and to take care that the inmates of those institutions are secured of that freedom which is the birthright of every English subject. I thank the House for having permitted me to explain views which prevail widely, and are daily extending both in England and Scotland, and which I am authorized to represent on this occasion. The operation of the Bill is to be confined to England and Scotland; and I ask the House, by passing the second reading of the Bill, to sanction the procuring of such information as may indemnify Her Majesty's Government for hereafter proposing some regulation of these institutions by law, in some measure, which may be but a very mild imitation of the laws recently passed by the Legislatures of other countries. So far as I have been able to ascertain the new constitution in reference to this matter which has been adopted by the Prussian Parliament, and which will soon be if it is not already the law of the German Empire, is in its principles to be precisely accordant with the ancient Constitution of this country in Roman Catholic times. William the Conqueror, Richard I., Edward I., Edward III., Richard II., and their Parliaments all vindicated the supreme authority of the State. In the laws which the German Parliament, at the instance of Prince Bismarck have passed, they have merely adopted the same principle—the principle that the authority of the National Legislature, of the law, and of the Sovereign shall be all pervading within the State; and that no ecclesiastical authority, conspiracy, or contrivance, however combined, shall be able to bar the operation of the general law of the commonwealth or of the Empire from permeating all institutions, from duly controlling the disposition of property, and, above all, in securing the personal freedom of the people. Sir, I beg leave to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

Mr. PEASE, in moving that the Bill be read the second time that day six months, said, he believed the House would be of opinion that much of what had been stated by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was altogether irrelevant to the subject in hand. Reference had been made to the law existing in Germany, France, Spain, and Italy; but he ventured to say that the law relating to Monastic Institutions in this country was even more stringent. The hon. Member took his stand on what he was pleased to call the incompleteness of the Report of the Committee of 1870-71. Now, he (Mr. Pease) maintained that the Report of that Committee, so far as circumstances would allow, was most complete, and entirely did away with any ground for this inquiry. It was unanimously agreed to, as a digest of the existing law upon the matter, and full information was given as to the number of the institutions, and as to the property possessed by them. In that Report, it would be found that it was a misdemeanour, punishable by banishment for life for a man to be admitted into any of those institutions, or to administer the oaths to him, and that all endowments of such societies were illegal. The Bill ignored altogether the labours of that Committee, which was exceedingly well qualified to deal with the question. It was chosen principally from the legal Members of the House, and contained a large majority of Protestants and a very limited portion of Roman Catholic Members, who were specially interested in the question. The Committee met 15 times, and had before them 29 witnesses, of whom four were from the Charity Commissioners, brought forward by the hon. Member for Longford, two by the Roman Catholics interested in the matter, two by the Chairman, and one by the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundee (Sir John Ogilvie); while there were four conveyancers to the Roman Catholic community, and 16 out of the 29 were produced by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Two Reports were drawn up—one by the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan, and one by the hon. Member for West Kent. The Report agreed to by the Committee was that of the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan, but several paragraphs from that of the hon. Member for West Kent were incorporated with it; and when the Report was agreed to, as it was unanimously, only three Members of the Committee present were Roman Catholics, while the remaining eight were Protestants. The Committee was appointed to inquire into the law respecting these institutions, and the terms on which their incomes and property were held and possessed. What did the hon. Member for North Warwickshire ask for? The number of those institutions since the beginning of the present century was ascertained, and their objects stated. Instead of there being any reluctance on the part of the Roman Catholic witnesses to give evidence, as stated by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, their evidence was given in a manner reflecting great credit on their ability and desire to answer all the questions put to them. They stated their belief that there were belonging to the Roman Catholic community, in 1870, 10 Colleges for men, having attached to them 2,032 acres of land, and containing 1,172 students; that there were also 150 houses, having 20 acres of land, and congregations attached to the number of 270,000, while the school children were 92,000. The incomes were derived from personal property in support of these places, to the extent of £10,250 per annum. There were 215 convents holding women, and having great estates attached to each, to the extent of 2 roods and 34 perches for each member; with personal property in the ratio of £6 13s. 3d. to each person! There were large educational establishments for 995 children of the pauper class; 3,115 children of the middle class; upwards of 5,600 children of the poorer class; and over 4,000 belonging to other classes. This being the case, he submitted that the Committee of 1870-71 had discharged its duty completely, and that the information asked by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was already before the House. Mr. Henry Bagshaw, a distinguished Roman Catholic conveyancer, in reply to the question—

“Will you state to the Committee in your own way what you consider the present state of the law with regard to convents and monasteries?” said, “With respect to monasteries containing monks bound by vows, there could be no doubt about their complete illegality, because of the Emancipation Act rendering the taking and administering of such oaths a misdemeanour, punishable with banishment or transportation.”

He added that there was no doubt that such institutions were in every respect as completely illegal as any association of men for any purpose could be—in the ordinary acceptation of the term—which was illegal or immoral. Mr. Bagshaw went on to say, that all the property held by these institutions was in the present state of the law held in honour—that was to say, invested in trustees without specific trusts, and it was by them applied to the purposes for which it was intended by those who purchased the land. There was one curious provision in the Bill which related to the circumstances to be inquired into by the Commissioners, under which it was desirable to promote the emigration of women. This direction followed that by which the Commissioners were to inquire into the regulations of convents, and was somewhat significant. The hon. Member for West Kent had on a former occasion stated to the House that there had been no case made out for an inquiry such as it was the object of this Bill to obtain, except one that made such an inquiry utterly distasteful to a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects, and he (Mr. Pease) believed that this was the opinion of a large majority of the Members of the House. In order to lay the foundation of such an inquiry a bond fide primâ facie case ought to be made out, showing that there were great abuses of the personal rights of liberty in the institution referred to; and this the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had not been able to do in a manner that was at all satisfactory to a majority of the House. The Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench had stated the other day that a small piece of paper from that Court would open the door of any convent in England. A case had been mentioned of a convent in which it was alleged that a young lady was immured against her will; but the Judge demanded some proof of this, and when the young lady was spoken to by those who made this allegation, she said she preferred to remain where she was, in the belief that if she carried out her vows she would be doing that which was acceptable to God. The fact was, that if any case could be made out, the existing law was quite sufficient to reach it, and to protect the personal liberties of those who were inmates of monastic or conventual institutions. Without some strong case being made out, there was no reason why the sacred character of these establishments should be interfered with, or that the same procedure should not take place with regard to them as in the case of private houses. Whether the inmates of the monasteries and convents were right or not, they thought that a life of ascetic and secluded piety was incumbent on them, and the House had no right, without a good case being established, to interfere with the privilege of every Englishman—to worship God according to his own conscience in his own manner. Supposing the Bill were passed, there would be some difficulty in getting the House to agree to the appointment of the Commissioner, who, according to the statement already made, was to be nominated by the Speaker. His hon. Friend would have done better to have given more credit to the Committee of 1870-71, before bringing in a Bill which proposed to deal in so objectionable a manner with a matter of such extreme delicacy. He should remember the sacred character and the religious influence and religious feeling of all our Churches, conforming and non-conforming, and which lay at the bottom of the soundest of the conditions of society. The hon. Member concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Mr. MATTHEWS, in seconding the Amendment, said, the Bill was almost unexampled in the annals of the legislation of that House. Since the days of the Stuarts there never had been a Bill that in such an outrageous way violated every principle of personal liberty and constitutional right. That was not a question affecting merely the Roman Catholics, for Protestant and Catholic institutions alike would be subjected to this inquisition. A secret and unlimited inquiry was to be held into the minutest circumstances connected with the inmates of these institutions, the Commissioners were to have power to bring before them the inmates, their relatives, and even the servants; and that was the sort of Bill which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire proposed to the House in the interests of liberty. The allegations upon which the hon. Member based his case were entirely unfounded in fact. He said that in every other country in Europe, a measure of this sort existed. That allegation was quite incorrect, for in Prussia he (Mr. Matthews) was informed by a letter from Count Münster that the inspection of the convents by the State had never taken place. In Holland, another Protestant country, there was no law to prohibit persons living together in community; if religious Orders restricted themselves to the rules of their Order, and did not teach, Government did not interfere with them, and they were free from inspection or supervision of any kind; but if they had schools they were subject to Government inspection. He had received similar communications from Belgium, Austria, and France, where there was no inspection of convents whatever. It was clear that what the hon. Gentleman required was not the inspection of Conventual and Monastic Institutions, but their entire suppression, and it would be better that he should at once, instead of pretending that he had no wish to hurt the religious feelings of the gentlemen and ladies connected with those establishments, come forth in his true clothing, and call for their destruction. That was what Prince Bismarck, between whom and the hon. Member a strong likeness prevailed, had done, in violation of every principle of constitutional right. That was what had been done in Spain, by a Government which wished to get possession of the vast property held by such institutions in that country. Was this country prepared to follow such examples? As a proof of friendliness to the personal liberties of the members of these institutions the hon. Member proposed to invoke the assistance of the Commissioners of Lunacy, and he also empowered his Commission to report on the increased facilities for emigration that should be afforded to women. What did he mean by that? Why, that nuns should be assisted by the State to emigrate, with or without their consent. With regard to the hon. Member's assertion that Roman Catholic charities were exempted from the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, the Act of 1853 made an exception of Catholic charities, simply because under the law against so-called superstitious uses, the endowments would have been forfeited if the deeds had been brought under the attention of the Commissioners at that time. That exemption was renewed from year to year until 1860, when Parliament gave a limited protection to Catholic charities, and since that period they had been governed in all respects by exactly the same laws as were applicable to Protestant charities. Therefore, there was no ground for the legislation which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire asked for. It was true, however, that some convents and monasteries did not come under the notice of the Charity Commissioners for the simple reason that they were not charities. The hon. Member said that the last paragraph of the Report conclusively showed that some further action by Parliament was necessary; but the fact was, that the Committee were struck by the monstrous anomaly of the present law, and that paragraph was intended as a hint to Parliament in a sense friendly to these institutions. The hon. Gentleman had quoted cases—the case of Cox v. Manners—to show that convents took property contrary to the spirit of the mortmain laws; but then, not being a lawyer, he was on strange ground, for the convent not being a corporation could not receive property; but it was probable that some one, as a trustee, did take property for an institution of the kind. The hon. Gentleman had also cited the case of Saurin v. Starr; but if there was ever a case which showed there was no necessity for this Bill, it was that case, inasmuch as it put the public in possession of everything relating to the internal life of a convent.

MR. NEWDEGATE denied having said anything of the sort. What he said was, that a certain cloistered convent in this country had taken impure personalty, and he added that cloistered convents were unauthorized convents in France.

MR. MATTHEWS thought that amounted to much the same thing in other words. The fact, however, was there was nothing in the law of France to prevent trustees from holding property for cloistered convents. The animus of the hon. Gentleman might be gathered from his proposal that the Lunacy Commissioners should appoint one of the Commissioners, thereby intimating that the gentlemen and ladies who joined those Orders were lunatics. He protested against the Bill, not merely because it was one which was directed against Roman Catholic institutions, but because of its illiberal, inquisitorial, and unconstitutional character, and for that reason must express an earnest hope that the House would throw out the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Pease.)

MR. WHALLEY said, it was absurd to say that because these institutions consisted of religious Orders they should not be interfered with. He believed there was an almost unanimous feeling in the country that we ought not to submit to the violations of our national independence, which were perpetrated by men who called themselves Catholics. What, he should like to know, were the manners and customs of the Roman Catholic religion as it was practised in this country? It was high time, in his humble opinion, for people to ask themselves whether they ought any longer to tolerate and encourage by public money or by silence many of the doctrines and practices of that religion. In spite of the general concurrence of opinion out-of-doors, that these institutions should not be closed against Government supervision, they were called upon not merely to tolerate, but to support them, for it appeared that a special object for which Her Majesty's Government existed, was their support and encouragement. For the last 20 years there had been a continual increase of them all over the country, and Roman Catholic influence was spreading generally. He, therefore, thought that all Members who on previous occasions had voted for the inspection of convents were doubly bound to give their support to the present Bill.

MR. MCCARTHY DOWNING said, the House would remember that in 1851 the public mind was highly excited on the subject of the Papal aggression. In that year a Bill of this description was rejected by a large majority. In the same year the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) stated that in the cells of a convent near his residence dark deeds had been committed, for dead bodies were found, and no coroner's inquest had been held. In 1870 the hon. Member had further moved for a Return of all the coroners' inquests held on the bodies of inmates of religious houses, and what was the result? Why, three were held; one upon a person who was found dead in his bed—a young priest from Ireland—a second upon one who died from heart disease, and a third upon a drowned man. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: Those inquests were held on priests, but none were held on nuns.] There were none held because there was no occasion to do so. Those nunneries and convents did much for the promotion of education, and was it right for the hon. Member to ask a Liberal House of Commons to interfere with those useful institutions? Was the House prepared to pass a Bill of this description on the request of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, who was afflicted by monomania on this subject, or of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), who had recently published a letter which cast a most undeserved insult upon all Roman Catholics, inasmuch as it suggested that the evidence of the Roman Catholic witnesses in a pending trial could not be acted upon, they being governed by other influences than those which ought to actuate them? Yet both hon. Members affected to carry on this agitation out of pure affection to Roman Catholics. Although the Roman Catholics of the United Kingdom amounted to 6,500,000, and that they were the persons having the greatest interest in this question, no Roman Catholic had asked for the inspection of these institutions. If there was any hardship practised upon the inmates of Monastic and Conventual Institutions, who, after themselves, were most aggrieved? Their relatives. Yet there was not a single Petition of a relative of a person immured in these convents in favour of such an inspection as was now proposed. The vows of the inmates were taken in the most public manner, and after the fullest inquiry as to whether it was the real wish of the person taking them to do so, and even after they had been six months in a convent or monastery, they could leave it, if they chose. It would be a violation of their vows, but still they could do so with impunity, so far as the authorities of the convent were concerned. The fact, however, was that many of them did so, and got married and became mothers. The nuns were visited by their parents and friends, who had more interest in their welfare than the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, and who could take them out of those nunneries if they thought proper. What excuse, then, had the hon. Member for annually disturbing the House and the country on this subject? He trusted that that would be the last occasion when useful legislation would be retarded by discussions like the present.

MR. GREENE said, that such an exhibition as had been witnessed that day, he had never seen since he had the honour of a seat in that House. While the Speaker was in the Chair, the House had been counted, although it must have been perfectly well known that the right hon. Gentleman could not leave the Chair until 4 o'clock. Such a proceeding was not less disrespectful to the Speaker than to the House, and was, in his opinion, quite unworthy of the House of Commons. He was not himself particular in using the forms of the House for an object; but he should not think of straining them to the extent that had been attempted that day. When, moreover, it was found that hon. Members were all but using violent means to prevent other hon. Members from entering the House, he could not help saying that such proceedings were a disgrace to the House of Commons. It appeared on evidence which could not be disputed that there were in England 69 monasteries, which were institutions contrary to the law, and 239 religious establishments altogether. Was it not clearly against public policy that these should be filled with persons in regard to whom no one knew who they were or whence they came? If a Protestant parent had a daughter who had escaped with the intention of entering one of these convents, would they tell him whether she was there or not? He ventured to say they would not. In Prussia the police were aware of the names, &c., of all those who entered these institutions. The same rule prevailed in France, so that if you wanted to know where any person was to be found the police could give the requisite information. He complained that the Prime Minister had limited the power of the Committee by the Resolution which he had carried, subsequent to that one which the House had passed at the instigation of his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdegate). He thought hon. Members before the next Election would have to say "Aye" or "No," whether they were in favour of some inspection or registration of these institutions, because it was contrary to the liberty of the country that they should exist as at present. It was said by Roman Catholic Members that the Bill was contrary to the liberties of the people; but had the Roman Catholic Church ever been the parent of liberty? All history contradicted such an assertion. Was it not well known that hon. Members were returned to that House for Irish constituencies by the influence of their priests? They could not therefore be considered independent men. ["Name, name!"] All of them.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was not Parliamentary language to speak of any body of men in that House as otherwise than a body of independent Members.

MR. GREENE said, that he withdrew the observation, but he had felt impelled to make it by a sense of duty.

MR. CALLAN appealed to the Chair whether that was a withdrawal.

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. Member to withdraw the observation. ["Withdraw!"]

MR. GREENE: I have obeyed the Speaker, and I shall obey no one else. I have no concern with hon. Members opposite.

MR. MUNSTER appealed to the Speaker to say, whether the hon. Member, after what he had said, had withdrawn the charge.

MR. SPEAKER: I certainly understood the hon. Member to withdraw the observation.

MR. GREENE, resuming, said, that he was, in the fullest sense of the word, a Protestant—a good old word that had been too long forgotten, and he was just as much opposed to the semi-Papal portion of our own Church as to the Roman Catholics. He would, indeed, rather belong to the Roman Catholic faith than have his soul taken care of by the clergy of a half-and-half faith. If it was the desire of the country that these establishments should exist, they would remain, but that had to be seen. There was no desire on the part of the supporters of the measure to offer any insult to Roman Catholics; but they deemed it to be against public policy, that there should be confined in certain houses in this country, communities of men and women without any knowledge respecting who they were or whence they came.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, that when the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) produced Petitions, either from the inmates of convents or monasteries, or from their relatives, complaining of specific grievances, he would be entitled to ask for such a Bill, but not before. If the Bill had been sanctioned by any appreciable part of the Roman Catholic laity, the hon. Member would be supported not only by Petitions from them, but by facts, which were entirely wanting in the present case. During the inquiry before the Committee the hon. Member asked not less than 1,222 questions, and if he failed under such circumstances to elicit the truth, what amount of inquiry on the part of a Royal Commission was likely to bring it out. Various witnesses had also been examined before the Committee, but with respect to many of those on whose evidence the hon. Gentleman had principally relied, the Committee found that they had not been able to substantiate any grievance. There were several Anglican institutions of the same kind, but the evidence showed, that as to restrictions in nunneries they were not greater or more severe than in Anglican institutions, yet no complaint was made against those Anglican institutions. The hon. Member said he did not desire to insult or annoy any of the ladies in these institutions, but his allegations as to the dungeons at Princethorpe and other matters imputed positive crimes to those concerned. Was not that an insult? All the alleged grievances brought before the Committee of 1865 had vanished during the later inquiry. [Mr. NEWDEGATE said, the Committee had been precluded by its instructions from inquiry into such cases.] The allusion to Palmer, the poisoner of Rugeley, must be understood as an insult, as well as the suggestion that such crimes as secret poisoning were committed in these establishments, and other things which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire said they did not like down in the Midland counties. With respect to the number of these institutions reference had been made to a speech by Cardinal Wiseman, in which he stated there were a large number of these monastic institutions, and that they were increasing. He had no doubt that the Cardinal did make such a speech, but The Roman Catholic Directory contained the exact number of these institutions. The fact, however, was there was good reason for believing that the number of really monastic institutions was much less than the number stated in The Roman Catholic Directory, for reasons explained by Mr. Cuddon, although the statements made in The Directory were said to be permissa Superiorum, to elucidate the meaning of which phrase 120 questions were asked. That explanation was, that in many cases these so called monastic institutions were occupied by only one or two priests, who performed purely parochial duties. They were not monastic institutions, but purely parochial churches, ministered to by one, two, or three of the regular clergy, in proportion to the number of the population. It was right, he thought, also to allay the apprehensions generally excited by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire as to the enormous wealth of these institutions. He had a Return before him, in which a large number of these monastic establishments were rated at only from £6 to £10 and £16 a-year. As to the increase of the establishments, it was shown that the increase since 1870 had only been at the rate of 2½ per cent, and surely, taking the increase of population in London and all the large towns, that was no more than was absolutely requisite for religious instruction and consolation. He (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) contended that even if the hon. Member had some grounds for asking for an inquiry in the first instance, he had none whatever at the present time, because he had no new facts to bring forward. If the number of monastic institutions were to be greatly increased, there might then be some reason for complaint; but at present, at any rate, there was no fear of anything of the kind taking place, and he thought therefore the House should hesitate before they passed a Bill the result of which would be insult and annoyance, however much the hon. Member might object to the expressions. He therefore hoped the House would come to the conclusion that the matter had been fully investigated by a Committee of that House, and that no grounds whatever had been shown for the passing of the Bill now before them.

MR. HOLT said, that he should not attempt at that hour to answer the objections which had been urged against the Bill. He desired, however, to notice the remarks made by the hon. and learned Member for King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock); and to remind the hon. and learned Member that his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had at the time distinctly stated in the House the reasons why he could no longer serve on the Committee of 1870. His hon. Friend was not satisfied with the decision of the Committee in the matter of taking evidence. He (Mr. Holt) desired also to set the House right on another point. He believed he was correct in saying that the Journals of the House would show that the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Sir Thomas Chambers) was discharged from serving on the Conventual Committee in 1871. He (Mr. Holt) wished to recall the attention of the House to the question under consideration. It was a proposal for an inquiry "by Commissioners respecting the increase and character of Monastic and Conventual Institutions in Great Britain." He regarded the proposed inquiry as a necessary consequence of the partial inquiry of 1870. He based his arguments in favour of the Bill upon, first, the fact of the recent increase of Conventual and Monastic Institutions in the country, a fact admitted in the debate. Next, upon the opinion recorded in the evidence, taken before the Committee of 1870, that those institutions were illegal. He did not refer to Orders of men only; but it was the opinion of eminent Roman Catholic lawyers that nunneries were as illegal as monasteries. Thirdly, it had been admitted both by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and by a Roman Catholic Member on the opposite benches (Mr. Synan) that amendment of the law was desirable. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State said—

"there could be no doubt that the present state of the law justified the introduction of a measure on the subject."—[3 Hansard, ser. 1712, 1713.]

The position of affairs then was this—There existed numerous Monastic and Conventual Institutions in this country. The fact could not be disputed that they were on the increase, and it was asserted that they were all alike illegal. What he desired was, that they should be either rendered legal, or otherwise dealt with. He (Mr. Holt) urged that the criticisms passed on the Bill were unfair. The hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) in criticizing the duties to be entrusted to the Commissioners had entirely kept out of sight the important provisions of the 2nd section. He had alluded only to that part of the section which related to the inquiries by the Commissioners into the numbers of these institutions; but had omitted to notice the important words of the section. The Commissioners were also to inquire into "the respective situations and character of Monastic and Conventual Institutions," and though he spoke of their property and income as having been already the subject of inquiry, he omitted to read the sub-section to the end—

"Whether the mode of acquisition and the holding thereof, or the purposes for which the same is held are in contravention of the principle of the law."

Those were subjects excluded from the inquiry of the Committee of 1870, but he contended that an inquiry into these subjects was a necessary preliminary step to any legislation. That inquiry was the object of the Bill. He and his Friends asked for inquiry. They knew these communities existed; they were not satisfied that they should continue to exist beyond the control of the law. They desired to know that their inmates were not detained by bolts and bars, but only by moral suasion; that as they were free to enter so they were free to leave, and were neither forced to depart, nor forced to remain at the will of the Superior. He hoped the House would see fit to read the Bill a second time, and by so doing admit the principle that further inquiry was desirable.

MR. MUNSTER said, the Bill was drawn up in the most disingenuous manner, and refused to believe that the House would assent to such an inquisitorial measure. Why, the hon. Member who introduced the Bill called upon the House to inquire who and what were the inmates of convents! In his opinion, they might as well ask who and what were the ladies within the hon. Member's own house.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he hoped that the apprehensions of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Greene) would be found to be without foundation, and that instead of the Bill being talked out a division would be taken. In his (Mr. M. Henry's) opinion the Roman Catholic Members of the House had been put upon their trial on had been before the country for several years. It had been said that some of the proposals in the Bill if passed into law would not work well, and that some difficulties would arise. Under the present law, there were many similar difficulties, and he was convinced that these difficulties would be diminished, and not increased by the changes which the Bill proposed. The Bill had been a long time under consideration, and it had been very carefully prepared; and if there were faults in the measure they could be easily remedied in Committee. On the whole, he thought he could safely recommend the Bill to the favourable consideration of their Lordships.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD COLONSAY said, he fully agreed in the propriety of making certain changes in the existing law. He approved generally of what his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack stated to be the two leading objects of this measure—namely, to dispense with what were called charters by progress, and to enable persons holding property by feu tenure to redeem what were called the casualties of superiority. So far, the measure would be in accordance with the Report of the Royal Commission in 1838, and would, he believed, meet with general approval in Scotland. He expressed general approval also of certain other provisions in the Bill. But as to the clauses by which it was proposed to carry out these objects, considerable amendment might be necessary. The Bill, however, went far beyond the objects to which he had referred. It contained provisions calculated to subvert the relations of superior and vassal—to unsettle the whole system of land tenure in Scotland, and to introduce confusion and uncertainty as to titles. The existing system was well understood—conveyancers were familiar with it; but if the whole system of land tenure in the country was to be suddenly uprooted, confusion would be inevitable. The Royal Commission referred to, comprehended men of great eminence and qualifications for the task, and they reported very decidedly against what was now proposed to be done, and pointed out some of the serious evils to which it would lead. The bodies in Scotland whose members were most conversant with the subject, and best qualified to judge, were decidedly opposed to it. He had presented Petitions from several of these bodies and from other bodies and parties, some of whom were largely interested, praying that no such interference with the tenure of land should be sanctioned, or, at least, not without full inquiry by a Royal Commission. Several deputations from various parts of Scotland had waited on him, urging the same views. One of the results of this interference with tenure would be the substitution of leases for feus. That was pointed out by the Royal Commission, and was confirmed by the recently expressed opinions of those most conversant with feuing transactions; and it was well known that those who desired to acquire small portions of land for building purposes in Scotland, greatly preferred feus, which gave a perpetual right of property, to leases which gave only a temporary right. Feu duties were themselves valuable property, and a convenient and favourite investment, especially for educational or religious endowments. One of the Petitions he had presented was from an endowment society holding feu duties to the extent of nearly £20,000 per annum. He had also presented Petitions from banks, insurance companies, and other holders of feu duties, as investments or securities. Some of these Petitions stated, and he had been informed from other sources, that since the scheme of this Bill had been ventilated, that valuable class of property had fallen greatly in the market. He hoped the Government would not, without inquiry, persevere in a course of legislation so unnecessary and unpalatable, already condemned by a Royal Commission, and also by those best qualified to form an opinion on the subject, and not asked for or desired by any class of the community. The Royal Commission had recommended various improvements on conveyancing to be introduced gradually. He had when Lord Advocate introduced measures for effecting some of these improvements. His successors in office had followed the same course. Nothing now remained necessary to be done but to carry into effect the other two recommendations of the Commissioners already mentioned. If this Bill were confined to these objects and some of the minor points of which he had expressed approval, it would be a beneficial measure and would give general satisfaction in Scotland, instead of being as it now presented itself most obnoxious. Another part of the Bill to which he strongly objected, was that which had for its object to do away with the system of service of heirs. It might effect some saving of expense on succession, but in cases of transfer and mortgage it would necessitate an investigation of title at every transaction, which would on the whole cause greater expense. It would introduce uncertainty and insecurity as to title, and diminish the value of property.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that notwithstanding the extreme technicality of the measure to unlearned persons, he hoped their Lordships would allow him, a layman interested in property in Scotland, to say a few words in favour of the Bill. He believed there was not a layman in that House who could not, with a lawyer at his elbow, master the provisions of the Bill in an hour. He entirely concurred with his noble and learned Friend (Lord Colonsay) as to the mischief and danger of damaging in any respect the feudal tenure in Scotland, which was one of the most popular tenures in the country. It was a valuable security and a valuable investment, and cautious men like Scotchmen rather rebelled against the shorter tenures which were common in England. Many of their Lordships had no doubt heard the story of the Scotchman who was offered a 999 years' lease, and made an urgent appeal that it might be extended to 1,000, and on being laughed at, shook his head and said—"Time soon slips awa'." No doubt, there was a reluctance on the part of Scotchmen to build houses or invest money on anything short of a perpetual tenure, and therefore it was by no means only in the interest of superiors that the House ought to guard this tenure. Most of their Lordships were in the position of superiors; many were in the position of feudals; and if it were really true that a Bill of that kind would materially injure the rights of superiors, it would undoubtedly act upon the value of land in Scotland, because it would be unpopular with proprietors to give that particular form of tenure. He entirely agreed that they ought to preserve, as far as they could consistently with the object which they all had in view—namely, to simplify tenures and cheapen processes—all the essential securities of the feu tenure. The objections which his noble and learned Friend had brought against the Bill seemed all to be objections that could be dealt with in Committee; but even on the second reading, it might be well to point out the weakness of his objection to the 3rd clause. That clause purported to give a new and short definition of feu tenure, and he (the Duke of Argyll) admitted at once that any attempt to give abstract definitions of property must always involve some risk; but after reading the clause over and over again in the interest of superiors, and knowing that that was one of the points chiefly objected to by the legal profession in Scotland, it appeared to him to take in every service and every duty, for it said—

"From and after the passing of this Act an estate of superiority shall consist of the right to the feu-duties, services, and casualties, which are by law or covenant incident to a feu."

The objection of the noble and learned Lord was that it did not include all duties; but if it did not, words could easily be inserted in Committee to remedy the defect, and if the noble and learned Lord chose to propose an addition to the clause, the Government would have no objection. He knew of cases of persons who held estates under his family, where the superiors were entitled to many rights which had become absolutely obsolete—as, for instance, a number of gentlemen were bound by the feu to keep six-oared boats to enable the Earl of Argyll to cross certain ferries. Again, one of the rights of superiors which would be interfered with by the Bill was that of defending the feu against the invasion of third persons. Was that a valuable right to preserve? He was involved once in litigation of that kind, and so far from being regarded by him as a privilege to be coveted, he looked upon it as a damnoſa hereditas. Again, it was the right of the superior to make roads, fences, drains, and so on for the feu, but he had never heard of such a right being claimed. If the superior reserved to himself to do those things, of course he would have to do them; but under ordinary conditions, the superior had no more right to enter upon his vassal's land than to enter upon that of any other proprietor, and he had never heard an instance of a superior attempting to enforce a right to construct roads, drains, or fences, even where it would be greatly to his interest to do so. Those were matters mentioned by the noble and learned Lord as rights which would not be covered by the Bill; but if they were valuable rights, he maintained that they would be covered by the words of the 3rd clause. He could not say that he, as a superior, was in the least alarmed by any instances which his noble and learned Friend had given, where the rights of superiors would be liable to be invaded if the Bill passed. There were other portions of the Bill to which the noble and learned Lord had referred that were obviously more questions of detail, and of those, the question of the recovery of duties and services was one. He could only say that he had looked very closely at the Bill, and having heard what the noble and learned Lord had to say, he was wholly unable to see the dangers which had been pointed out by his noble and learned Friend as involved in any one of the clauses to which he had drawn attention. It appeared to him that if the Bill were allowed to go into Committee, whatever objections were entertained to particular parts of the Bill by the noble and learned Lord might be there dealt with, and if it were thought necessary, a remedy might be applied. He trusted therefore that the House would not object to the second reading of the Bill—especially as there was so much in it which the noble and learned Lord had admitted to be valuable, and if any alterations were really required the House could make them in Committee.

LORD CAIRNS said, the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had not answered any of the objections which had been pointed out by his noble and learned Friend behind him (Lord Colonsay), and he would suggest that the clauses which were objected to should, in Committee, be omitted from the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR admitted that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Colonsay) was entitled to speak with great authority on that subject, and whatever fell from him on such a question would have due weight with their Lordship's House. He thought, however, that the noble and learned Lord had misapprehended the object of the Bill in regard to certain points on which he had offered objections. Nothing could be more foreign to the intention of the Bill than to discourage feus, or the system of holdings that was now in existence. On the contrary, he was of opinion that it would tend much to their encouragement. With regard to the 3rd clause, he thought it was amply guarded by the Proviso, that a lawful reservation of any right, other than feu duties, services, and casualties, contained in a grant or conveyance of land shall import an estate of property to the extent of the right reserved. If, with respect to that portion of the Proviso in which the words "an estate of property" occurred, it should be thought by their Lordships that those words were not happily conceived, nothing could be more easy than to modify them in Committee. In Clauses 5, 23, and 24, most ample provision was made in respect of all feu-duties created after the passing of the Bill, for placing on record every species of covenant or condition which in any respect qualified the feu. The noble and learned Lord had referred to the section which enabled a superior to merge his estate of superiority in the estate of property, by a process like that which in England was called enfranchisement; but it struck him (the Lord Chancellor) that the objection was one that applied to the substance more than to the form of the clause. The question seemed to be in reality whether it was best when the superior acquired a title to the property of the land, and so united his interest with that of the feuar, the title of superiority should remain, or whether it should be merged in the property and extinguished. As regarded the 15th clause, it was only carrying out the great object of the Bill, which was to afford greater facilities than at present to the feuar, and to relieve him from inconvenient burdens. If the right to enter was given to the superior, he had not only the same right as every landlord had in the case of his tenant, but the same right which existed in England when land was sold, reserving a perpetual rent. This was a very common form of contract at the present time especially in Lancashire. With respect to the objection taken by his noble and learned Friend to the 37th clause of the Bill, it was that it gave the powers mentioned therein to an individual Judge, and not to the Court of Session. Of course, if it were thought better that the powers should not be given to any particular Judge, the alteration was one that might easily be made, but the powers themselves were closely analogous to those which were given in England by the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act; where, however, they were always exercised by a single Judge. He was much gratified when he heard the noble and learned Lord speak of the great importance of the Bill, and he had no doubt it would be found when the Bill got into Committee, that those portions of the measure that were objected to bore but a small proportion to the other parts which would be regarded by their Lordships as highly valuable. Whatever objections there were to the Bill could be readily considered and dealt with in Committee, and he trusted therefore that their Lordships would consent to read the Bill a second time.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 15th instant.

SOUTH SEA ISLANDERS. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that he rose to put a Question in the terms of the Notice that he had given, to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the South Sea Island Papers lately distributed. As to whether any further communications of importance have been received by Her Majesty's Government upon the subject, particularly as relates to the disposal of the prisoners convicted at Sydney of murder on board the brig Carl; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay the Papers on the Table of the House? With regard to the latter part of the Question, he thought their Lordships would consider that he was right in asking for the Papers, subject to their being no objection to producing them. Probably some of them might consist of Minutes of the Executive Council of New South Wales, and sometimes it was objectionable that such Papers, when relating to capital cases, should be laid before Parliament, because their publication might tend to produce embarrassment in the colony. With regard to the Papers lately distributed, he wished to make a few remarks. The first part of them repeated some of the information which he had sent home before he left New South Wales, and to which he drew attention last Session. In another part was contained the reports of naval officers who were ordered to inquire into the statements made after the murder of Bishop Patterson. It appeared that in accordance with a suggestion which he (the Earl of Belmore) made to Commodore Stirling, that officer had written to the Admiral in China, who had sent a ship of war down to the islands near the line. This ship—the Barrosa—was met by the Blanche, which had been sent up from Sydney, and there were interesting Reports from the officers commanding them—Captains Moore and Simpson—upon the labour trade and skull-hunting. With regard to Captain Hayes, the notorious pirate, whose name had been before mentioned in connection with this matter, it appeared that the Barrosa had only missed capturing him by a single day, having left Mulgrave Island one day whilst he arrived there the next. He had been in the custody of the captain of an American man-of-war—the Narraganset—but was released. In one part of the Papers, the reason given was, that the British Consul at Samoa had failed to bring charges against him which would hold water, although in another place that gentleman expressed great surprise at his having been released. With regard to skull-hunting, although it was admitted that it prevailed amongst the natives of the Solomon Islands, yet there seemed reason to think that no white man had taken part in it. Captain Moresby, of H.M.S. Basilisk, it was true, heard from a native pupil of the Melanesian Mission at Norfolk Island, the same story which the Rev. Mr. Brooke told the year before last, at the time of Bishop Patterson's murder; but, on the other hand, Captain Simpson could find no trace of white men having been engaged in it. The reasons he gave for his belief were, shortly, that it would not pay. Mr. Brooke had surmised that the captains of British ships had taken war parties in their vessels to procure the heads of their enemies, in return for being allowed to trade—tortoiseshell being the article of trade. But he (Captain Simpson) found that tortoiseshell could only be collected in small quantities at any one place—a few pieces at a time, as was shown by the case of a fine of two tons of tortoiseshell, which had been inflicted by Captain Montgomerie, of H.M.S. Blanche, on the inhabitants of an island who had murdered the crew of the Marion Renny, but which fine had never been collected, and which Captain Simpson altered to a punishment of a different sort. He (the Earl of Belmore) should not hesitate to accept this view, but for the reason that in the case of the Carl a naval officer had boarded her a few days after the massacre on board that ship had taken place, and could find nothing to excite suspicion, and had passed her as having all correct; and if one naval officer had been deceived in one case, so might a second be also in another. As regarded kidnapping, Captain Moresby, of H.M.S. Basilisk, thought that amongst the islands where his cruise had extended, it had entirely ceased, as far as procuring men by force went. He thought that men were still procured by fraud, but that the evil was gradually curing itself. Captain Simpson had found that it had ceased amongst the Caroline, Marshall, and Solomon groups, but that it still continued amongst the Gilbert group. On the whole, he (the Earl of Belmore) hoped that though it had not been entirely put down, yet that it had been checked. A right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Lichfield) had mentioned to him that he had heard from his friends of the Melanesian Mission, that they had met but one labour ship during their last cruise for every ten the preceding year. There was one subject as to which he should like information to be given. As he had before stated, Captain Montgomerie, of H.M.S. Blanche, had inflicted a fine of a large quantity of tortoiseshell on the inhabitants of an island, as retribution for the murder of the crew of the Marion Renny. Captain Simpson, on arriving at the island three years afterwards, found that the fine had not been collected; and, instead of it, he exacted from two of the chiefs a promise that they would execute a third chief, who was responsible for the murder of the crew. This, it appeared, had since been done. Commodore Stirling said that this was the only part of Captain Simpson's conduct of which he had not approved; and he (the Earl of Belmore) wished to know what opinion Her Majesty's Government had expressed on the subject. Without committing himself to an opinion, he was inclined to think that it was better to exact retribution from the man who was, there seemed little doubt, morally responsible for the murder of 22 white people rather than adopt the old plan of retribution by shelling a defenceless village. As regarded the case of the Carl, it appeared by the Papers that two men had been found guilty at Sydney of murder, on board that ship, and had been sentenced to death. This sentence had, it was known, been commuted; but the Correspondence contained in the Papers stopped short of giving any information on that point, and he should be glad if the Papers he had given Notice to move for could include the despatch giving the reasons for such commutation, and the reply of the noble Earl. Two other men, named Mount and Morris, had been found guilty of manslaughter at Melbourne, but the Papers likewise stopped short of giving any information as to the sentences passed upon them. There was only one other matter to which he need allude, and that was the position of the British Consul towards the Fijian Government. It might be premature to express an opinion at present, and he understood that the new Consul and the new Commodore had orders to inquire and report on the state of affairs. The noble Earl had stated on a former occasion that the ultimate recognition of the Government, at present recognized as a de facto one, would a good deal depend upon how it behaved with respect to the suppression of kidnapping. From what appeared in the Papers, he did not anticipate very much from its action, for if all that was stated in the despatches of the late Consul was true, it would appear that one at least of the Members of that Government was implicated in some of the irregularities of the labour traffic. He begged to put the Question of which he had given Notice.

The Earl of Belmore

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he hoped the noble Earl would excuse him, if he abstained from following him into certain matters he had touched upon, and which were not included in his Notice. With regard to the proceedings in connection with the ship Carl, and the persons belonging to her who had been convicted of murder, it was quite true the Papers presented did not bring the intelligence down to that point at which they would give information of the sentences that had been passed upon the persons convicted. But at the same time, the only information in his possession on the subject of the commutation of the sentences passed on the persons found guilty of the atrocious proceedings referred to was contained in a despatch from Sir Hercules Robinson, the Governor of New South Wales, dated the 30th of December, 1872, in which he said—

"The capital sentences passed upon Dowden and Armstrong, the two men convicted of murdering a large number of Polynesians on board the brig Carl, have been commuted to penal servitude for life—the first three years in irons. It was the opinion of the Executive Council—in which I concurred—that it would have been improper to have executed these men, seeing that they were in the service and acting under the orders of Dr. Murray, the owner of the brig; and that he, the instigator and most active perpetrator of the murders, had escaped all punishment by being accepted as Queen's evidence against his own employés."

With respect to the prisoners Mount and Morris, who were convicted of manslaughter before the Supreme Court of Victoria, and sentenced to penal servitude for 15 years, some technical question had arisen which had been referred to the Law Officers in the Colony; and he would not object to lay Papers on that subject upon the Table when he received further information. He could assure his noble Friend that with regard to the labour traffic, measures had been taken to send back to their homes those islanders who had been induced to enter into engagements under false pretences, and he had reason to believe that the officers intrusted with that duty were doing their utmost to carry it out to a successful issue. At present the Papers were in a very incomplete state, and it was undesirable to add to them; but as soon as they were complete further Papers would be presented.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in reply, said, that after what had fallen from the noble Earl, it would not be proper for him to press his Motion. Very likely an opportunity would occur next Session of renewing the discussion on this subject. As regarded Dr. Murray, who had been admitted as approver, the more that came out about him the worse he appeared to be. When he first told his story to the late Consul at Levuka (Mr. March), he of course made the best story for himself, and even at the trial at Sydney the whole truth did not come out about him. But at the trial of Mount and Morris at Melbourne, it appeared that Dr. Murray had, not in a moment of conflict, but after everything was quiet, deliberately fired several shots from his revolver through holes bored with an augur in a bulk-head in the hold of the ship amongst the natives confined within. Anything more cold-blooded had probably never been heard of since the world existed.

THE MARRIAGE LAWS.—QUESTION.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Royal Commission on the Laws of Marriage presented to the House in the Session of 1868; and to ask the Lord Chancellor, Whether there is any probability of the introduction by Her Majesty's Government of any measure founded on that Report? said, their Lordships would recollect that some time ago a celebrated case occurred, known as the Yelverton case, which exhibited in a remarkable manner the difficulties which arose in ascertaining the legal status of an individual in consequence of the difference of the marriage laws existing in the United Kingdom. That case was tried in the Irish Courts and in the Scotch Courts, and ultimately it came to their Lordships' House for final decision. In the progress of the case, there was a great conflict of opinion upon questions involving the peculiarities of the Scotch marriage law, and also the statute law of mixed marriages in Ireland. The result of the controversy was, the expression of a very great desire that, if possible, an inquiry should be instituted with a view to ascertain whether the marriage laws of the different parts of the kingdom could not be brought into closer conformity. The Government of the day were pressed upon the subject in the House of Commons, and a Royal Commission was issued in 1865 for the purpose to which he had referred. That Commission, of which he was appointed Chairman, consisted of men most of whom had attained to high judicial positions. England was represented by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, Lord Cairns, Lord Lyveden, Lord Hatherley, Lord Penzance, Mr. Walpole, the Queen's Advocate, and himself; Ireland by Lord Mayo, the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and Mr. Monsell; and Scotland by the Lord Justice General, the Lord Advocate, and Mr. Dunlop. They began their labours by obtaining a summary of the marriage laws of the three different parts of the United Kingdom, and by the desire of the Commissioners he issued a Circular requesting, and which elicited, information on various heads, and which was addressed to all the Archbishops and Bishops in England, Ireland, and Scotland, Protestant and Roman Catholic; to the Moderators of the Scotch Church, Free Church, and United Presbyterian Church of Scotland; to the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland; to persons connected with the Presbyterian Church in Ireland; to clergymen of the Established Church in England; to the President and Vice President of the Wesleyan Conference in England; to various persons, members of the Dissenting Bodies in England; to the Registrar General in England and to many of the Registrars throughout the country. In all no fewer than 97 persons gave evidence before the Commissioners, or valuable information in reply to the Circular. The inquiry extended over three years, but that arose from the fact of many of its members having judicial and other functions to perform, which made it difficult to appoint convenient times for our meetings. The present Lord Chancellor not only gave his assistance as a Member of that Commission, but undertook to prepare the Report of the Commission, and that able and carefully prepared document was entirely his work. The Report was signed by all the Commissioners, with one exception. The late Lord Mayo, who was then Chief Secretary for Ireland, had been unable, from the pressure of his official duties, to attend a sufficient number of the meetings of the Commission to justify him in signing the Report. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland and Mr. Monsell signed the Report, but dissented from the recommendations affecting the Law of Divorce and the Jurisdiction of Divorce Courts, believing that the marriage tie was indissoluble, and that divorce a vinculo was contrary to the law of God. The Lord Justice General also signed the Report; but in a note he expressed his preference for the Scotch law of marriage. The Report of the Commissioners began by laying down the principles of a sound marriage law. It contained recommendations as to the capacity of persons to contract marriage; and as to the solemnities that should be required—as to the requirements preliminary to marriage, the requisite notice, residence, and declaration of the parties—with respect to the publication of banns it did not recommend their abolition, but that the publication of them should not be required as a condition of the lawfulness or regularity of a marriage. It recommended the abolition of canonical hours, and the solemnization of marriage in the presence of witnesses; it recommended the repeal of the law as to mixed marriages; it contained most important recommendations as to the notice of the intention to solemnize marriage, and as to the certificate of the minister or civil officer receiving the notice, and the Report suggested that this certificate would supersede the necessity for a licence, and recommended that the practice of granting common licences should cease. It contained most valuable recommendations for the registration of all marriages, and recommended the repeal of all existing statutes upon the subject of marriage, and the embodying the enactments necessary to give effect to the recommendations in a single statute. The Report was made five years ago, and it was matter of regret, if not of reproach, that nothing had been done since that period. Of course, a measure of so much importance could only be introduced under the authority of the Government, and he did not expect that at the present moment his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would be prepared to give any pledge on the subject. He trusted, however, that some assurance would be given that the matter would not pass altogether unnoticed, and that his noble and learned Friend, as the author of the Report, and more competent perhaps than any other person to address himself to the subject, would not allow the labours of the Commission to fall to the ground without bearing fruit, but that he would add to his high reputation by improving a law which affected the domestic relations of every family in the kingdom, from the highest to the lowest.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it would not be possible for him to give a pledge as to the time or manner in which the Government would deal with this subject, if indeed during their tenure of office, it would be possible to deal with it at all. He was, however, grateful to his noble and learned Friend for calling their Lordships' attention to a question the importance of which was much greater than most of those which occupied the attention of Parliament, and which if not dealt with when it was attracting no public attention, would sooner or later require to be dealt with under less favourable circumstances. He was the more sensible of the importance of the subject, because every year more than one Act became necessary to set right some slip, mistake, or error arising from the state of the marriage law in one portion or other of the United Kingdom. In England and Ireland the faults of the marriage law lay in an opposite direction from those of the marriage law of Scotland, turning as they did on sectarian differences or formal observances. In Scotland, on the other hand, there was absolutely nothing to insure certainty as to the fact, or to preclude the most uncomfortable questions from subsequently occurring. What were called irregular marriages in Scotland, were however, rare exceptions; and the peculiarities of the Scotch marriage law, which rendered such marriages possible, could be easily got rid of without any hardship or inconvenience to the well-conducted portion of the community. The Commissioners recommended a system of registration which would tend to insure the facility and certainty of marriage, and, at the same time, to check improvident and hasty marriages. Their endeavour was to reconcile, as far as might be, the great and fundamental doctrine that matrimony was a civil contract, with the general belief that it was a contract which ought to receive, as far as might be, a religious sanction. With that view the Commissioners proposed that every authorized minister of religion ordinarily officiating in any place of public worship throughout the kingdom might solemnize marriages for civil purposes. At the same time, marriages might be solemnized by civil registry alone if the parties desired it. This scheme was by no means a complicated one. It would be of uniform application throughout the three kingdoms, and it would put an end to the cases of uncertainty with which Scotland had furnished us with frequent examples, while, at the same time, it would get rid of every remnant of the sectarian system by which the validity of marriage could be affected. These proposals dealt equally with all churches and denominations, and he trusted they would one day be embodied in a law. Without pledging the Government in any way, if it should be his good fortune at some future time to be instrumental in submitting such a law to the House, it would not be the least of the services which he desired to be able to render to the country.

INDIA—THE BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the subjects referred to in the Question he had placed on the Paper were familiarly known to the noble Duke (the Secretary of State for India), and indeed to all persons who of late years had taken any part in connection with Indian affairs. The claims had remained unsettled for 14 or 15 years, and in the course of that time they had given rise to a great deal of correspondence and discussion. He had been asked by parties who were interested in the settlement of these claims to put to the noble Duke the Question which stood in his name on the Paper, and under the circumstances, considering the lateness of the hour, he would do so without any further remarks. He would ask the noble Duke, Whether the complete accounts of the Banda and Kirwee Booty can be presented to Parliament in this Session; and, whether Her Majesty will be advised under the Act 3rd & 4th Vict. chap. 65. sect. 22. to refer for judicial decision the claim of the troops, which in 1871 was confirmed by the Secretary of State for India, to interest on a million and a half of old rupees taken at Kirwee, or other claims for valuable booty which are supported by the legal opinions of Her Majesty's Attorney General and other very eminent counsel?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the final accounts of the Banda and Kirwee booty had not yet been received from India. They were extremely complicated, but as soon as they arrived from India they should be presented to Parliament. With regard to the second Question, he did not know whether his noble Friend was aware that the same Question was put to him last year by the noble Lord opposite, on which occasion he made an elaborate statement to the House of the whole circumstances of the case. He then stated that the claims were finally settled, and declined to refer the matter to a judicial tribunal. The only remaining question, even among the officers themselves, was whether interest ought to be allowed on a large quantity of bullion, old rupees, and jewels which were held by the Government for a certain period unrealized. He explained to the House the important principles which were involved in this question. The claim was made on the supposition that the Government were in the position of a prize agent, and were bound to make the best possible use of all the property which came into their possession. The whole of the money and the proceeds from the jewels had been given to the Army, with interest from the moment when the Government became the profitable owners of them, but for a part of the time during which they were in the hands of the Government they could not be turned to profitable use, and the Government could not admit the claim that they were bound to allow interest upon them during the period which they were not profitable. As to the jewels, they had been valued by native jewellers at a price which exceeded the sum realized by the sale, and some of the officers put forward a preposterous claim for the amount at which the jewels were valued. The Government had certainly not acted in a nigardly manner, for they had calculated the interest on the bullion from the time it was captured, and the interest on the jewels, &c., from the time they were actually sold. He repeated that the Government could not consent to bring the claims before a legal tribunal, as they deemed the question to be finally settled.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY regretted that no more satisfactory explanation could be given, and stated that much dissatisfaction prevailed in consequence of the manner in which the whole transaction had been dealt with.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the question referred to the decision of Dr. Lushington was as follows:—The Crown having granted particular booty to be distributed among the troops, what troops were entitled to take the benefit of that grant? The legal foundation for the judgment was the actual grant by the Crown of certain things to certain troops, and the decisions given in former cases enabled the Judge to solve that rather difficult question. It was quite a mistake, however, to suppose that there was any legal principle on which the Judge could be asked to try the question whether the Crown ought to pay interest on the booty, or whether the Crown should let the troops have property not taken in the actual operations of the field. These were matters for the Crown and the Government to exercise their discretion upon, and, in his opinion, they ought not to be referred to the decision of a judicial tribunal. To do so would be to call in a judicial tribunal to arbitrate on the question, whether the Crown ought to give something which it had not given in fact, and which it was under no obligation to give.

POOR LAW—LABOURERS' UNIONS.

QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (for Mr. T. HUGHES) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that in the Eastern Counties boards of guardians have refused medical relief to the wives and families of labourers on the ground that such labourers had become members of the Labourers' Union; and, whether such refusal is not contrary to the well understood principles of the Poor Law; and, if so, whether he will take steps, by minute or otherwise, to instruct boards of guardians as to the principles upon which such relief ought to be administered?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, that it was not within the knowledge of the Local Government Board that relief had been refused to any persons on the ground of their being members of Labourers' Unions. Such a proceeding would be contrary to the principles of the Poor Law, which laid down destitution as the only test and ground for the receipt of relief. There were no doubt certain rules and regulations under which the guardians administered the law throughout the country; but they were so well understood that the Board saw no necessity for issuing any fresh instructions.

LABOURERS' DWELLINGS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the Reports of the Irish Poor Law Inspectors on the subject of Labourers' Dwellings, in the Blue Book lately placed upon the Table of the House, in which one of the Inspectors, Dr. Roughan, states that he "has no practical knowledge of the working of the regulations under which loans are obtained for the building of labourers' dwellings," and that "he is not aware of any instance in which a proprietor in his district has availed himself of the privileges of the Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1860;" whereas it appears from the Report of the Commissioners of Public Works, 1870-71, that at least one loan has been issued and expended for that purpose in Dr. Roughan's district; and, whether he will obtain from the Local Inspectors of the Commissioners of Works, who are in a position to possess practical knowledge of the improvement of labourers' dwellings, answers to those queries which have been submitted to the Poor Law Inspectors on this subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the matter referred to. He believed the facts were such as were stated in the Question. He was informed by the Board of Works in Ireland that they were willing to take steps in connection with the matter.

POST OFFICE PACKET VOTE—CLAIM OF MR. CHURCHWARD.—QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING asked Mr. Attorney General, with reference to his recent statement on the subject of Mr. Churchward and the Vote for the Post Office Packet Service, Whether it is in the power of a subject to keep alive for an indefinite number of years, without taking any action thereon, proceedings against the Crown in the Common Law Courts (unlike the practice which prevails in Courts of Equity), the Crown meanwhile remaining entirely helpless in the matter?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL was understood to say, referring to the subject of Mr. Churchward and the Post Office Packet Vote, that it was doubtful whether the Crown was bound by the Common Law Procedure Act, and whether, therefore, proceedings against the Crown could be kept alive for an indefinite time in the Common Law Courts. The Judicature Bill would prevent an unreasonable delay in proceedings of this nature.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—DEPOT CENTRES—LINCOLN—GRANTHAM.

QUESTIONS.

MR. WELBY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a site for the new dépôt centre at Lincoln has been purchased other than that hitherto used by the Militia, and offered for sale to the Government by the county authorities; and, whether ample space, together with the other most important requirements for a dépôt centre, might not have been obtained by the purchase of the county Militia buildings and adjoining land at Grantham; and also, whether the Government will recommend that, by a Grant out of the Consolidated Fund or otherwise, some compensation shall be given to counties which, having been forced during the last few years into very heavy expenditure upon buildings for the protection of arms and other national property, will now have them thrown upon their hands, and incur serious loss in disposing of them for purposes for which they were not originally intended?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the engagement into which Her Majesty's Government entered on this subject was this. We said that in any district where the county buildings were suitable for the purpose we would purchase them, if they could be obtained at a reasonable price; and that in districts where they were not suitable we should place them at the disposal of the county, to sell them for their own advantage, and build for ourselves the local centre necessary for the scheme. In the case of Lincolnshire, it is reported that the buildings are not suitable, and that the price asked is out of proportion to their value to the Department. Arrangements are in progress for the purchase of land at Lincoln. I have no intention of proposing any payment to the county out of the Consolidated Fund.

PRIVILEGE—PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE—INFORMAL PETITIONS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is intended to take any notice of the Special Report made to the House by the Select Committee on Public Petitions, that in the case of the Petition 14,619, the heading was inserted by one W. H. Cornish of Stroud, after the signatures had been appended to the Petition?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, it would be a serious matter for the consideration of the Government whether they should interfere on behalf of the House, provided the case appeared to those who had been officially intrusted with the duty of examining it to be one calling for such interference. But he did not learn that, in the opinion of these authorities, it would be wise to take any steps in the matter. Under these circumstances, he did not think the Government would interfere.

Mr. Welby

MR. C. FORSTER, as Chairman of the Committee, said the junior Member for Stroud (Mr. Winterbotham) attended before the Committee and gave such explanations as were possible, in addition to which he had received a letter from a person implicated, expressing regret at what he had done while labouring under a misapprehension. The Committee had reported the matter to the House as an illustration of the way in which Petitions were sometimes got up; but, under the circumstances, he should not make any Motion on the subject.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY—SUTHERLANDSHIRE.—QUESTION.

MR. BROGDEN asked the First Commissioner of Works, If it is true that he has removed the men engaged upon the six-inch Ordnance Survey from South Wales to Sutherlandshire; and if so, and the removal is caused by an insufficient staff, if he will state to the House the reason why he does not ask for an increased Vote, in order to complete the survey as soon as possible?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that his hon. Friend was under a misapprehension. The men engaged in the survey had been employed in Wales during the winter months, and in the summer, when the weather in Sutherlandshire was favourable for the purpose, some of them were removed thither to complete work which had been left undone. When the weather in the North of Scotland ceased to be favourable to the conduct of the surveying operations, the men would go back to Wales to complete the survey of the mining districts.

COURT OF PROBATE—DISTRICT REGISTRY CLERKS.—QUESTIONS.

VISCOUNT MAHON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will be willing to consider the propriety of granting a scale of salary and superannuation allowances to the District Registry Clerks of Her Majesty's Court of Probate, on the same footing as enjoyed by the clerks of the principal Registry Office?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that by recent legislation district registry clerks of Her Majesty's Court of Probate were not Civil servants at all. They were employed by the Registrars in the conduct of their private practice. The business in the District Registry offices was very different from that in the Metropolitan Offices, the first-named officials being only empowered to grant probate where it was unopposed. He therefore could not hold out any hope that the positions of the two classes of clerks would be assimilated in the manner suggested by the noble Lord's Question.

VISCOUNT MAHON said, he wished to know what position the district registry clerks held if they were not Civil servants?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: They hold no position at all which can entitle them to the same terms as those enjoyed by Civil servants.

ARMY—HONORARY COLONELS OF CAVALRY REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the alterations in the pay of the honorary Colonels of Cavalry Regiments recently appointed under the Royal Warrant of 27th December 1870 is legal, no Royal Warrant having since been issued authorizing the change?

MR. CARDWELL: I need, Sir, scarcely say that, if I had any reason to suppose the course illegal, I should not have proposed to take it. I have always understood that when any reduction is contemplated it is the rule only to permit an appointment to be made on condition that it is accepted subject to the new arrangement, if it shall be carried into effect.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—SCHOOL FEES OF PAUPER CHILDREN.

QUESTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he can state in how many cases the school fees for children of out-door paupers were paid out of the poor rate by the guardians, under "Denison's Act," during the year ending Lady Day 1872; or by how many boards of guardians the provisions of that Act were adopted during the same year?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, the Department over which he presided had not in their possession sufficient information to enable them to answer the Question at that time.

TURKEY AND GREECE—BRIGANDAGE. QUESTION.

MR. ION HAMILTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Reports have been received from Her Majesty's Agents in Greece relative to recent acts of brigandage in that country; and, whether the Correspondence with the Greek Government relative to the assassination of Mr. Herbert and others is finally closed?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, reports have been at various times received during the present year from Her Majesty's Consuls at Salonica and Corfu reporting the appearance of brigands and acts of brigandage in Salonica, in Macedonia, and Thessaly, and Albania. Major Stuart, lately Consul at Janina, reported the murder of a boy by brigands, in a despatch received a few days ago. Her Majesty's Ministers at Athens reported recently that the brigand chief Spanos, on the Ottoman side of the frontier, has lately killed two other brigands from motives of revenge. The Correspondence with the Greek Government relative to the assassination of Mr. Herbert and others is, to all intents and purposes, closed.

TEIGNMOUTH AND DAWLISH TURNPIKE TRUST.—QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire, On what principle the arrangements recommended with regard to the Teignmouth and Dawlish Turnpike Trust are founded?

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH, in reply, said, the principle on which the arrangements recommended had been founded was that which the Committee had endeavoured to apply in all cases of insolvent trusts—namely, the doing of justice to all by making equitable arrangements between the public, the ratepayers, and the creditors. The first Act of Parliament was granted to the Teignmouth and Dawlish Trust 50 years ago. Their last Act dated back six years, and the trust had since been continued from year to year. They had 24 miles of road, and in that distance there were 22 gates and bars, seven of which formed a network round the town of Teignmouth. Their ordinary bonded debt was over £24,000, in addition to which they had a preference debt, with which the Committee could not interfere, of £700. The tolls averaged about £1,100 a-year, and the trustees had applied the income to paying the interest on their debt. They had not paid off any part of the corpus, nor had they repaired the roads. The Local Board of Teignmouth had therefore applied that the trust be at once discontinued.

UNION RATING (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the honourable Member for New Ross, What course he intends to pursue with regard to the Union Rating (Ireland) Bill?

MR. M'MAHON, in reply, said, he wished to proceed with the Bill; but he feared he should not be able to do so in the present stage of the Session. There was only one substantial Amendment proposed, and if the Government would only take up the measure it could be passed in a very short space of time. The Bill was a very short one, and its object was simply to assimilate the law of Ireland. ["Order."]

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Member that he was quite out of order in explaining the provisions of his Bill on the question now put to him.

MR. M'MAHON said, he proposed to give Her Majesty's Government a space of a week or ten days in which to consider whether they would take up the Bill and carry it through this Session, because if they did not take this course, the Session would have been utterly barren of useful measures for Ireland.

IRELAND—NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS—THE CALLAN SCHOOLS—DISMISSAL OF REV. ROBERT O'KEEFE.—QUESTION.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that as, looking at the state of business, he was not likely to be able to bring forward his Motion in reference to the Callan Schools to-morrow, he wished to know whether his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government could state at once, or on the next day, when he could grant a day for the consideration of the question?

MR. GLADSTONE cheerfully acknowledged the considerate manner in which his right hon. Friend met the Government with regard to the important Motion he had on the Paper, and said that he would endeavour to state in the course of to-morrow's sitting when he could fix a day for the question. He was very anxious that it should not be supposed there had been any wilful delay in reference to the matter. The Commissioners of Education in Ireland were a body governed by strict rules, and it was impossible at that moment to say when the communications between the Government and the Commissioners would be in such a state of forwardness as to admit a discussion of the Committee's Report. As soon as possible he would fix a day, and he hoped it would be an early one.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL—(Lords).

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 1st July]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

Constitution and Judges of Supreme Court.

Clause 6 (Constitution of Court of Appeal).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be postponed."—(Mr. Spencer Walpole.)

MR. DISRAELI: I have hitherto refrained from troubling the Committee with remarks on this Bill for two reasons. The first is that I am favourable to the policy of Her Majesty's Government on this subject—that is to say, I am favourable to a reform in the Judicature of this country, and that our Judicature should consist of a Court of Primary Decision and of a Court of Conclusive Appeal, and that both of these Courts should be formed of the most efficient elements. Sir, the second reason why I have refrained from making any remarks in the course of this Bill has been, that I was myself once called upon to consider the subject, and I am well aware of the difficulties connected with it. I therefore refrained from any observations which might, perhaps, have increased those difficulties. So far as I myself am concerned, my frame of mind may be fairly described as that of one who watched the mode in which Her Majesty's Government sought to solve those difficulties in a spirit of respectful curiosity. But what has happened with regard to this measure? Within the last 48 hours so many remarkable circumstances have occurred, and Her Majesty's Government has taken so unexpected a line—unexpected not only by the House and by their own supporters, but I should imagine, from the expression of their own countenances, by themselves—that I do not consider it consistent with my duty to continue silent when I believe that the Committee has in an inconsiderate manner placed themselves in a position of considerable peril to the public interests. Now, it is just as well, when we are dealing with matters of this kind, that we should have a just conception of what it is we are undertaking to grapple with. We are dealing with a subject very dear to the people of this country—namely, the administration of justice. I do not think there is any subject in which the people of England take so profound and so keen an interest. They have a stronger feeling with regard to the administration of justice than they have even with respect to the incidence of taxation, because, in fact, its influence is more extensive. Very few people are discontented, as far as taxation is concerned, unless they are touched by a direct tax which is only contributed to the Treasury, after all, by a minority of the people; but the whole country is interested in the administration of justice. It is highly desirable, therefore, that in any step which we take we should have a clear conception of what we are attempting to accomplish, and that we should really have from the Government a precise statement of what they wish to achieve. At present I confess I am somewhat at a loss upon those two heads, and the only object which I have in making these remarks is that before we pass any further clauses I may be able to obtain a clearer idea of what is the object of the Government, what is the course by which they really propose to effect that object, and what may be the consequences if that object be attained.

Lord George Cavendish

It may be well for a moment, and only for a moment, to consider how it is that we are dealing with this subject—namely, the reform of the Judicature of this country. We should be in error if we supposed that Her Majesty's Government had taken up this question as a matter of choice, or in a spirit of caprice, or that, in proposing to reform the Judicature of this country, they were only bringing forward a subject which might excite the interest of the constituencies. The circumstances which have led to the necessity of legislating upon this head are not of a trivial or temporary character. It is now half a century since the question was raised whether the system of Judicature prevailing in this country which had long been so vaunted was altogether a system which secured to the subject a satisfactory administration of justice. Its purity and its impartiality have never been impugned; but its efficiency was years ago questioned—first by scholars in their study; then it was canvassed by eminent lawyers and statesmen; then that criticism led to the institution of Commissions; then the subject was discussed in the public Press, in all the forms of that Press, from daily journals to Quarterly Reviews, until at last a body of public opinion, ripe and strong upon the subject, had been created, the influence of which could no longer be resisted by any Government, and in due time the Judicature Commission was appointed. The Judicature Commission recommended, generally speaking changes in harmony with those which had long been accepted by persons of great authority and influence, and which had been advocated by the Press universally. I mention these things to show that it was quite impossible for any Government to leave this question of Judicature untouched and believing that reform of the Judicature was necessary, I should have been glad to have seen a measure brought forward by any Government which would effect this object. Well, Her Majesty's Government brought forward a measure which certainly might have done this. There might be controversy as to the preferable mode by which those results might be obtained; but no one can deny that in the Bill sent down to this House there were elements which under the influence of the criticism of the Committee might have been moulded and matured successfully, so as to establish two great Courts, the one of Primary Decision and the other of Conclusive Appeal, thereby accomplishing those two objects which practical men and philosophers, the Press, and learned Committees and Commissions of Inquiry had all agreed to recommend, and which now, after a considerable number of years, have been generally accepted by all those leading men who have given their minds to the subject as most desirable objects to accomplish. Now, I will address the Committee strictly with reference to the Motion before it for postponing Clause 6. In effecting the object I have described Her Majesty's Government had called upon the House of Lords and the other Courts of Appeal in this country to surrender their jurisdiction, and the House of Lords, as all know by the Bill now before us, made no difficulty on that head. If it was necessary to have one sole Court of Appeal it was, of course, necessary, unless you concentrated all its duties in the House of Lords, to devise a new Court in which all other Courts of Appeal and all other tribunals of that character should be absorbed. And here I would mention the regret which I feel that there should have been some misapprehension as to the conduct of the House of Lords, as I have collected in the course of the various discussions on the subject. The question is always treated as if the House of Lords had relinquished their duties because they felt that they were unable any longer to fulfil them. But that is an error. The House of Lords did not for a moment acknowledge that they were unable to fulfil those duties which the Constitution of this country at present delegates to them. On the contrary, we have it in evidence—evidence before the Committee of the House of Lords on the subject—evidence adduced by the Lord Chancellor and the late Lord Chancellor (Lord Hatherley)—that the duties of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal were never performed in a more satisfactory manner than in this generation, and especially during the last few years. Evidence to that effect is abundant. Indeed the House of Lords, we know as a Court of Appeal was a popular tribunal, particularly in Ireland and in Scotland. We have complete evidence on that subject taken before the Lords themselves, and it is acknowledged in the Report of the Committee, many Members of which were Members of Her Majesty's Government. On that point, therefore, there can be no doubt. How did it then become inevitable—and I dwell on this topic because I know some dissatisfaction exists among my Friends around me on the subject—how did it become inevitable that the House of Lords, whilst they were performing in the most satisfactory manner their duties as a Court of Appeal, should have consented to relinquish that jurisdiction? It arose in this manner. So long as you had an intermediary appeal in England—and you had more than one—the number of appeals, which are considerable in the country, were sifted by the Intermediary Courts, and the only issues that went to the House of Lords were of that gravity, either as regards the amount of property or the possession of precious privileges, which those interested would not consent to have decided by one appeal. Therefore, the business of the House of Lords might be accurately described by these figures. The appeals that came up were from 50 to 60 per annum, and the House of Lords dealt with them in the most satisfactory manner. The very appeals to them upon matters of such commanding interest showed the confidence of the country, and that the decisions at which they arrived were satisfactory to the suitors. Nor should it be omitted that so prompt was the transaction of their business that there were no arrears; so that if there had been no change the House of Lords were capable of perfectly fulfilling those duties which the present constitution of the country devolves on them as a Court of Appeal. But the moment you terminated the Intermediary Courts of Appeal, the Exchequer Chamber, the Committee of the Privy Council, and others, the appeals, which are now 50 or 60, would be described by a very different figure—they would be 500 or 600; and the House of Lords felt that by their constitution they would be quite inadequate to transact business of that amount; and they felt also the unsuitableness and incongruity that a Senate like the House of Lords should be called on to decide on a point of procedure in a Court of Law, on some interlocutory motion and such like, but which, if there was only one tribunal of ultimate appeal, must all go to the House of Lords. It was therefore perfectly clear that if the Government adopted this new principle—if you had only one tribunal of appeal in this country—unless very much more complicated and different changes than those proposed in this Bill were adopted, it would be impossible that the House of Lords could grapple with the business you proposed to call on them to transact. That was the reason why the House of Lords willingly relinquished their jurisdiction of appeal; but that jurisdiction the House of Lords, in relinquishing, were conscious they had performed in an unexceptionable manner, and one which has never been for a moment seriously impugned.

So far as to the position of the House of Lords; but Her Majesty's Government in dealing with this question on the lines upon which they were building, and in the Bill they have consequently placed before us, dealt with it with prudence and sagacity. Their conduct was prudent, but it was inevitable. They refrained from dealing with the ultimate appeal of Ireland and Scotland to the House of Lords. I was therefore very much astonished when the other night, to my great surprise, the right hon. Gentleman opposite announced to the House that, without discussion and without debate, he was going to accede to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). I wish, therefore to know whether the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee have duly considered what must be the consequences of our adopting that course; because I cannot, from the Amendments which have been placed on the Table by Her Majesty's Ministers, assure myself that these consequences have been foreseen. I certainly do not find that there are any remedial arrangements proposed to prevent the ill consequences which seem inevitable. Now, Sir, the appeals which are brought up to Westminster from Ireland and Scotland are not very numerous. They are much more numerous from Scotland than from Ireland; but I suppose if I take them in the course of the year at from 30 to 40 I should not be making an inaccurate statement. Well, now, I want to know from Her Majesty's Government whether they are going to treat, or why they do not treat Ireland and Scotland in respect to the institution of this Court of Appeal on the same conditions as they did England. In England, we are told, the subject is to enjoy what, according to the results of all enlightened inquiries on the matter, is a great privilege—he is to enjoy in the administration of justice the privilege of being free in the decision of his issue from continued and repeated appeals; he is to have a single Appellate Tribunal. As I collect from Her Majesty's Government, that is not a privilege that is to be accorded to Scotchmen and Irishmen, and I cannot understand why. It appears to me utterly impossible that we can legislate with any prospect of arriving at a satisfactory termination if we avoid this difficulty. Suppose we agree to the suggestion which I collect from the Amendments which are to modify this 6th clause as proposed by the Government—suppose we arrive at the arrangement which the Government in the first instance recommends, what happens? The Irishman and the Scotchman alike possess Courts of Intermediate Appeal in their own countries; but they are also to have an Ultimate Court of Appeal in England. In order to effect this object we are to have Irish and Scotch Judges appointed. Well, now, with the two ex officio Irish and Scotch Judges, and two Judges appointed in a different manner, the business they would have to decide according to the average time required for Scotch and Irish appeals will probably occupy from Scotland two or three months, and from Ireland two or three weeks. You will therefore have the Irish and Scotch Judges so appointed kicking their heels about London, doing nothing, and they will be called in to decide English appeals; and what effect will that have on the constitution and character of the single Court of Appeal which you have engaged to secure for the people of England. The right hon. Gentleman has applied this Bill to Ireland and Scotland; suppose as the result of discussion the right hon. Gentleman advances in his opinions another step—suppose he abolishes the intermediate Courts of Appeal in Ireland and Scotland, and puts the three countries on exactly the same footing; then there will be ample business for both the Irish and Scotch Judges. It is possible that, as the result of discussion, he may be driven to that logical and reasonable conclusion, but in what position may we find ourselves? The Scotch and Irish appeals, which may be now 30 or 40, would become 300 or 400; you would have appeals on points of practice, on the most insignificant subjects on interlocutory questions from Ireland and Scotland, argued here at considerable expense, which I need not dilate upon; and you would have solicitors and perhaps barristers brought from Edinburgh to discuss these matters. Can a more retrograde movement be conceived? We have now been for a century, more or less, mitigating and abolishing the centralized judicature which the Normans established in this country. The boast of this generation is the institution of County Courts. Every Session we are developing the attributes of the County Courts, increasing their power and extending their sphere, and in every way raising their influence upon the people. Now you would institute a system which would call upon the people in Ireland and Scotland, upon every insignificant subject upon which the laws of this country allow of an appeal, to travel to Westminster at an immense expense, bringing counsel, solicitors, and agents to argue these points. Do you think you can do that without creating a great mass of discontent? It is the question which at the end of the last century caused so much feeling in Ireland, when the question arose whether a writ of error in the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland should run to the Court of Queen's Bench in Westminster, upon which Mr. Grattan made such passionate appeals to his country and created such a feeling that England was obliged to yield. You are actually on the eve of reviving the very legislation which was then so odious, and which, if you had persisted in maintaining it, might have led to serious consequences. Upon these topics we ought to have a clear intimation of the intentions of the Government. We ought not to be told that something is to be done on another occasion to complete this plan—that, no doubt, something further is intended, and will in due time be proposed. This is a system the parts of which must all hang together. If you really believe, as I am prepared to agree, that it is a high privilege gained for any subject in the administration of justice that there shall be only a single and conclusive Court of Appeal, you have no right to deprive an Irishman and a Scotchman of the same privilege. If you do not legislate in this instance with regard to Ireland and Scotland the same as for England, you are leaving the Irish and the Scotch to make an inevitable demand, and that will be—Let us have only one Court of Appeal, and let us have it in Dublin for Ireland, and in Edinburgh for Scotland. That may or may not be a desirable course; but it is the inevitable consequence of the course you are now pursuing.

We have heard a great deal lately about a sudden change of feeling in Scotland and in Ireland on this matter. It was understood at the beginning of the debates that Ireland and Scotland were perfectly content with the appeal which they now enjoy to the House of Lords; it was mentioned on the authority of the Prime Minister, who even dilated on the subject, and that was the triumphant defence which the right hon. Gentleman had against expanding the provisions of this Bill to Ireland and Scotland. Now all this has been suddenly changed; but what evidence have we of the change of feeling? It is said the Lord Advocate has held a meeting of Scotch Members. I am no great admirer of the way in which Scotch business is conducted in this House, or rather out of this House. It appears to me a somewhat strange, scarcely constitutional course that the Lord Advocate should have it in his power to call a meeting of Scotch Members upon a subject of public gravity like the present and communicate to us their opinions without our being favoured with them in debate. I entirely object to that mode of conducting Scotch business; and if it is continued, how are we to remedy our unfortunate ignorance of Scotch business and above all master the mystery of Scotch law? The Lord Advocate gives a dinner party to some Scotch Members, not more numerous than an ordinary dinner party; and then he informs us that he met some 20 Scotch Members and extracted from them the opinion that the feeling of Scotland, which for 200 years has been strongly in favour of carrying their appeals to the House of Lords, has entirely and suddenly changed. I say that evidence is not sufficient. In Dublin we have a most extraordinary meeting of lawyers who pass resolutions the result of which is that they want to keep their own Intermediary Court of Appeal, which furnishes them with plenty of business, and to enjoy the privilege of having a couple of their members nominated Judges of the Court of Appeal in England. On such conditions, that they are to have a local Court of Appeal and an Imperial Court of Appeal, too, they are very much in favour of the arrangement proposed by the Government.

We have always been led to believe that the great object of a Court of Appeal of the character we desire—recommended by all these Commissions and Committees and learned legists who have devoted themselves to the study of the subject—that the great object is to secure harmony and uniformity of decision. A Court of Appeal should steady the law, and to effect such a purpose it must consist of homogeneous elements. How are you dealing with it in this Bill in regard to attaining such objects, and especially this Bill as modified by the Amendments placed on the Table with respect to the 6th clause? Whether you retain the local intermediate Courts of Appeal in Scotland or not—and I think you will find it impossible—it will be expected, for the very reason that you have selected Scotch Judges, that they should give their minds to Scotch appeals, and that Irish Judges shall give their attention to Irish appeals. You have already decided that India Judges shall give their special attention to Indian causes, and, of course, the English Judges will attend to English causes. Thus you will have four Courts, instead of the great desideratum of a single Final Court of Appeal; and, instead of harmony and unanimity of decision and a steady law, you will have four Courts acting on different grooves, all giving, for aught I know, different decisions. What a position is this, that instead of a single Court of Appeal, consisting of first-rate men, you will have, perhaps, on the very same day different portions of it—those portions all being tribunals of equal and supreme authority—giving absolutely contradictory judgments.

There is another point with reference to these changes which I must bring before the consideration of the Committee, that is the great importance that has always been attached—if you are to have a single Court of Appeal—to this, that that Court of Appeal should consist of first-rate men; that those who construct and select the Court should have the power and privilege of selecting men for their merits, and for their merits alone; and that nothing but the possession of transcendent qualities as to learning, experience, sagacity and character should sway the decision. Look at what a position you will be placed in by the new propositions of the Government on this head. There are to be two Scotch and two Irish members of this tribunal. I do not wish to make an invidious remark. Both the Bench and the Bar of these countries at present furnish men quite adequate to this position; but this has not always been the case; for there have been times when neither the Bench nor the Bar of Scotland or Ireland could furnish such men. There may have been times when you have found it very difficult, even in England, with its larger area to find adequate men. But by this new change in the Bill you are no longer to appoint only such men, because so far as four of the Judges are concerned you will select them not for excellence, but for nationality. When these four men have transacted their special business—their Scotch and their Irish business—they will then be deciding upon English business; and, therefore, instead of securing for your Court of Appeal those only who have been appointed for excellence, it is quite possible that you may have your appeals from England decided by Scotch and Irish Judges, who have not been appointed for excellence but for nationality. I think that these are grave considerations, and ought to occupy the attention of the Government. If I could obtain from the Government an admission that they had considered these points I should be the less disheartened. But the Amendments on the Paper do not warrant me in arriving at any such conclusion. What we want is, a complete and coherent tribunal. As regards the Irish and Scotch Judges, we ought to know what the Government intends to do in respect to the Intermediary Courts of Appeal in the sister countries. If those Courts are to remain there is no necessity for appointing Irish and Scotch Judges—the Scotch appeals really occupying only 10 weeks in the Session, and the Irish appeals only about 10 days. If there is to be one sole tribunal of appeal in the country, everybody must agree that both Ireland and Scotland should be represented. But if those Intermediary Courts are to be retained, you will deprive the English subject of the security promised in the fact of the Prime Minister exercising an unlimited choice in the selection of Judges, and being bound by the responsibility of selecting men of transcendent ability. Instead of that to meet with a result such as I have indicated would be most unsatisfactory. I will not presume to give any advice to Her Majesty's Government, because that is always subject to misapprehension; but if I were to advise them on this occasion it would be as sincere and honest advice as was ever given in this House. Her Majesty's Government have boldly, and to their honour, dealt with a subject of great difficulty. The House has read the Bill a second time. Therefore, the House has sanctioned their policy. But the House, I am sure, cannot be insensible to the imperfect manner in which the Bill carries out that policy, and especially to the manner in which the principles of the Bill have been altered in a sort of haphazard manner without notice and without discussion. Under such circumstances, I think the Government would do well if they took some more time to consider the details, especially as they have been much modified by the enormous concession of the other night; and that when the House shall meet again the Government might give us a Bill which will not only be satisfactory to the House, but will give confidence to the people of this country.

MR. GLADSTONE: This is the period for agreeable surprises. On Tuesday the late Lord Advocate of Scotland disclosed an idea in recommending the Government to withdraw the Appellate Clauses of this Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) has improved on that suggestion in recommending the withdrawal of the whole Bill. He does this in a manner that is bland and genial, and with many compliments to Her Majesty's Government as to the difficulties they have had to encounter and the courage with which they have met them. I am not convinced in the slightest degree by the reasons which the right hon. Gentleman has urged. Those reasons must be viewed in the light of day. I want to know whether the speech of the right hon. Gentleman has really left a clear and distinct impression on the mind of the House as to the grounds on which, at this time of day, he recommends us to stop short in the labour in which the other House of Parliament and we ourselves have been engaged. Here is a Bill which is the production in the first instance of a Royal Commission. This Bill, in a House where the influence of the right hon. Gentleman predominates, has received, as to its main parts, unanimous approval. It has now come to this House after a long discussion on the second reading, and the opinion of the House has not been challenged by those who are adverse to the Bill, and a unanimous vote has been recorded in its favour. The slender foundation upon which the right hon. Gentleman has contrived to construct the broad recommendations he makes, is the change that has been adopted in compliance with the spirit of the motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). Upon that point he has founded the inverted pyramid he has now presented to the House. Is the right hon. Gentleman right in thinking that it would be for the credit—I do not say of the Government, but of the House of Lords or of the House of Commons—that the resolution he proposes should be adopted? My belief is that if Her Majesty's Government, lured by the complimentary expressions of the right hon. Gentleman, and possibly influenced by the infirmities of human nature at this period of the year, were to adopt the fatal decision of abandoning this work, of which we are about to reap the fruit, we should cover ourselves with ridicule and with the deserved contempt of the country. The right hon. Gentleman has put together a number of ingenious arguments, some of which appear to me to go to the very root of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman committed himself to this opinion—that if we abolish intermediate jurisdiction in Ireland and in Scotland the consequence of that will be that, instead of having one great Court of Appeal for the three countries, we shall be compelled, in deference to the demand of Ireland and Scotland, to have three Courts of Appeal, and that opinion was founded upon a prior argument, which was this—that as, according to the principles of this Bill, it is of great advantage to the people of this country that intermediate appeals should be abolished, we should not be justified in withholding that advantage from the people of Ireland and Scotland. If the argument of the right hon. Gentleman be sound, I venture to say we shall not be more fit next year or in any coming Session to deal with the question of a Tribunal of Final Appeal, and a great deal of time has been wasted, and we had better have left things alone. The right hon. Gentleman was rather severe upon the subject. He contemplates the arrival of periods when it will be necessary for the Prime Minister of the day to fill up the vacancies in the Courts of Appeal with inferior men from Ireland and Scotland. This doctrine as to the inferiority of Irishmen and Scotchmen is an awkward doctrine. The right hon. Gentleman is at the head of a party constructed of Members belonging to the three nations respectively. I do not understand what experience has led him to lay down this despairing doctrine. Is it in the choice of the Lord Advocates of his Government that the right hon. Gentleman feels himself entitled to anticipate those unfortunate results? I wish I could offer some consolation to the right hon. Gentleman. It appears to me that his Lord Advocates, including the last one, have been abler and more learned men than the right hon. Gentleman thinks. I see no signs of hopeless and incurable inequality of intellect as regards the Scotch Judges. Nay, more; we have had the idea that the Scotch, besides having a sufficiency of intellect for themselves, were what may be called an exporting nation, used to provide a certain amount of intellect, over and above what the home market required, for the use of their neighbours in the South and elsewhere. I will not push the argument so far as to wound the feelings of Englishmen; but I think I am justified in putting aside so much of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman as depends upon his unhappy anticipation as to the difficulty of finding competent men in Ireland and Scotland to bring into the Court of Appeal. On the contrary, my hope is that a little free trade and free contact between Irish and English Judges, and still more between Irish and English and Scotch Judges, with the new views and lights of law which will come to us here from a legal system so different from our own as that of Scotland, will be highly beneficial to all three. My pulse, therefore, is not lowered, my anticipations are not darkened. I take rather a cheerful than a gloomy view of this portion of the subject. But then the right hon. Gentleman objects to a declaration of opinion by the Scotch Members. He says it is highly unconstitutional that the opinion of Scotch Members should be gathered by the Lord Advocate at a meeting of the size of an average dinner party. Now, the size of an average dinner party is a small matter; but the hospitality of the right hon. Gentleman must be boundless if he looks upon a meeting of some five-and-thirty Members in this light. If that be the size of the average dinner party which is to govern our domestic arrangements, some of us must provide additional length and breadth in our dining rooms. But the right hon. Gentleman objects on principle to this collection of Scotch Members and seems to think it a bad thing. I will not enter into any general argument upon the question of consultations between Members connected with particular interests or districts; but I think it is a good thing, and that the management of Scotch business in this Parliament, so far from being open to adverse criticism, is an example which we should be glad to follow and extend as far as we can do so. I fear it is not practicable to extend it greatly; but having had some cognizance of the effect of this custom upon the despatch of Scotch business in this House, I differ from the right hon. Gentleman, and think the practice not a bad, but a good one. I am astonished, however, that if the right hon. Gentleman is right in thinking it a bad thing, it should have been the constant habit of his Government to hold these meetings. I am told that my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate has held but few of these meetings, and is regarded by some Scotch Members as being on that account a degenerate successor of the late Lord Advocate.

MR. GORDON: I am not aware that when I was Lord Advocate I held any such meeting, except in one case, when I was not in Parliament, and the Scotch Members were called together to receive an explanation of the provisions of the Public Health Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: That explanation reveals, I must say, a rather unconstitutional act. That the Lord Advocate, being a Member of the House of Commons, should invite some brother Members to consider a certain subject seems to me quite justifiable; but that the Lord Advocate, being a servant of the Crown and no Member of Parliament at all, should convene such meeting is an extension of a usual and established practice as to which I had rather reserve my judgment. But I am told that when it was not convenient for the Lord Advocate to call the Scotch Members together they were called by another person. The objection of the right hon. Gentleman is that they should be called by the Lord Advocate. Apparently he is not a personage of sufficient dignity for that purpose; but I am informed that during the existence of the late Government when the Scotch Members were not summoned by the Lord Advocate, they were called together by a Lord of the Treasury. These points were only the wadding or the padding of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and I may pass from them with rapidity. He has made one or two other points, of which I hope I can dispose without possessing special or professional knowledge. The right hon. Gentleman is afraid that the Appellate Court by meeting in two Divisions will be in danger of coming to opposite decisions, so that there will be a conflict of law within the bosom of the Court itself. Here, again, I make this comment upon his argument—that if one Court of Appeal be constituted for the three kingdoms, it will still not be possible that all its members should act together upon precisely the same business. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, proves too much; but if I am correctly informed his apprehension is entirely groundless. He fears that the Divisions of the Court of Appeal will proceed in culpable disregard—at any rate, in occasional disregard—of the judgments of one another, thereby insuring a conflict of decisions. But the difficulty raised is one of which we may say—soleitur ambulando. We have in Scotland a case exactly in point. The judicial body in Scotland is divided into two Houses for the purposes of appeal, and appeals are made from the decision of a single Judge to one or the other of these Houses. When, however, there is the slightest apprehension that variance will be the result of sole action, the two Houses are in the habit of meeting together; and the 50th clause of the Bill enables the Divisional Court of Appeal, under like circumstances, to enlarge itself and include a greater number of Judges. It will thus be in the power of the Court of Appeal to make perfect provision for unity of decision. Then the right hon. Gentleman also fears that the Court of Appeal will be overwhelmed with the multitude of appeals from the County Courts; but the Bill contains no proposal on that head.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. What I wished to show the Committee was that if we abolished intermediary tribunals in Scotland and Ireland, and forced suitors to come to Westminster in order to appeal in comparatively insignificant cases, we should be reviving the Norman system of centralization.

MR. GLADSTONE: I quite apprehend the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, and it is one which must be weighed and examined when we come to consider the question whether intermediary appeals shall be abolished in Scotland and Ireland. But on this point I think there is a double error in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. First he assumes that it is necessary to proceed now with regard to these intermediary appeals. I do not admit the necessity. It is perfectly possible to make the requisite provisions with regard to the Court of Appeal before considering the question whether we shall or shall not abolish the power of intermediate appeal in Ireland and Scotland. But it is quite obvious, also, that the question of intermediate appeal is not the same in the three countries, and for the very reason which the right hon. Gentleman has urged—namely, that we should prefer the local, where we can do so, to the central principle, and because while it might be perfectly right to abolish intermediate appeals in London, it might not be expedient to do so in Dublin or Edinburgh. I do not know whether the Lord Advocate would be prepared to give a positive opinion as to intermediate appeals in Scotland; but I think he would hesitate to affirm at this moment the absolute necessity of abolishing intermediate appeals there—[The Lord Advocate: Hear, hear.];—and I am told that is the opinion at which the Irish Bar has arrived.

Mr. DISRAELI: It is a very natural opinion for the Bar to form, and I quoted it.

Mr. GLADSTONE: It also appears to be a decision sound in principle; that is to say, we must keep the administration of justice local as far as we can do so, subject to the further principle that there must be perfect unity in the matter of appeals. In truth, therefore, the question is very simple. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks, as he is entitled to think, that we are wrong in endeavouring to extend the scope of this Bill so as to include Scotch and Irish Appeals, he will have, in consequence of the mode of procedure we propose, the most convenient opportunity of raising that question; because nothing done in the Committee will in the slightest degree commit the right hon. Gentleman, who will be free to exercise his judgment on the partial re-committal of the Bill which we mean to propose. If, on the other hand, as we believe, it is perfectly practicable to introduce those limited changes into the Bill which this extension will require, there is no reason for refusing to go forward with the Bill as it stands, the House being in full possession of the intentions of the Government. In saying that the House is in full possession of the intentions of the Government, I must point out an unfortunate error in a single word of the printed Amendment to be proposed upon re-committal. On a former occasion I intimated that we were engaged in considering whether it would, in our judgment, be necessary to ask the House to give us the power of adding one more Judgeship to the Court of Appeal, thereby increasing the number of other persons to be appointed from three to four. Upon consideration we have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary to ask for such an addition. If, however, upon more careful consideration during the Recess we find it necessary to ask the House for additional judicial strength, it will be our duty to make that demand without fear that the House will decline to meet it. Under these circumstances, the last line of one of the pages of Amendments should read, "such other persons not exceeding three," instead of four, as printed, "as Her Majesty by letters patent may be pleased to appoint." The assumption of the right hon. Gentleman was that the Court of Appeal would be overburdened with business in consequence of the abolition of the intermediate system in Dublin and Edinburgh. My answer to that is perfectly distinct. First, I do not know it does follow that there would be a very large addition, for I am told that the Appeal business in Scotland is not very large; but whether that be so or not, is a matter which we shall be able to consider with far greater advantage when we come to deal with this intermediate jurisdiction. Meanwhile, the provisions now before us are enough to enable us to constitute the High Court of Judicature in a satisfactory manner as a Court of First Instance for England alone, and as a Court of Appeal for the three kingdoms.

Mr. GREGORY thought that the Government had done right in adopting the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie); but it necessarily led to a re-consideration of the constitution of the Court of Appeal. He (Mr. Gregory) would admit there were great anomalies in the constitution of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal; but he thought its jurisdiction might have been preserved if the Chief Justices and other eminent lawyers had been associated with the Law Lords. As, however, the Lords themselves had not thought fit to adopt such a course, this House could only accept the Bill in the shape in which it had been sent down by them. The question resolved itself into one of the Court as now proposed. It was quite evident that we must preserve the intermediate Courts of Appeal in Scotland and Ireland, whereas they were to be abolished in this country, and surely this would be a great anomaly. How would it be possible to work the Court of Appeal as constituted by this Bill? There were to be nine ordinary and certain ex officio Judges, but he doubted whether the latter could be relied upon to attend the sittings of the Court, particularly as some of them were to be taken from Scotland and Ireland. Some, again, would have to preside over the Divisional Courts, and consequently could not be relied upon to sit in the Court of Appeal. All therefore that they could calculate upon were the nine ordinary Judges. These nine Judges were empowered to subdivide themselves into Divisions of not fewer than three each. Now, it appeared from a Return before the House that the number of appeals to the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices in one year were 215, to the Exchequer Chamber 107. Adding to these 25 Scotch and 10 Irish Appeals, they had a total of 357 in the course of the year, which would have to be disposed of by the three Divisions he had just referred to. Now, four of the Judges were taken from the Privy Council for the purpose of forming the Divisions, and how, in their absence, would the business of the Privy Council, which was sufficient to occupy them all the year round, be carried on? Indeed, he was not sure that the Indian business of the Privy Council, relating to Mahomedan law, was not of itself sufficient to occupy the time of one of the Divisions, independently of the ordinary Appeals from the Colonies. He felt convinced that unless there was an intermediate Court appointed to consider and adjudicate upon minor matters the appellate scheme proposed in the Bill would not work in a satisfactory manner. He hoped that in this respect the Government would modify their Bill.

MR. MACFIE said, in reference to the transferring the jurisdiction of the House of Lords in Scotch appeals to the new Appellate Court, he had put himself in communication with his constituents, and in order to get a guide to their views, he had distributed about 20 copies of the Bill; but up to that hour he had not been able to get any reply to his question, and he was not likely to obtain their views for some few days, because it was only that morning that the Amendment which brought Scotland within the scope of the Bill had been put upon the Paper, and it would be next week before his fellow-countrymen in Scotland would have an opportunity of considering the subject. Taking these circumstances into consideration, he submitted it would be well to confine the Bill to England, and in the intermediate months that would elapse between the present discussion and the next Session, let the question be well ventilated and discussed, and canvassed in Scotland, and then no doubt a very sound and tangible conclusion would be arrived at. He thought that the Government might be content with the exaltation which would accrue to them from the glory of having settled this question so far as England was concerned. By the adoption of the course which he proposed, they would be enabled to go to the country some weeks earlier, which would be a very great comfort to them all. He implored Her Majesty's Government to adopt that alternative. He was sorry to say that, in his opinion, there prevailed on this subject in Scotland the most complete ignorance—an ignorance so great as to entirely mislead. That morning there reached him from the capital of Scotland one of those liberal and popular papers, The Daily Review, and in that paper was a leading article which he would read if it were not against the rule of the House, but as it was he would content himself with describing it. The scope of that article was that with respect to the present state of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, as regarded Scotch appeals, not only was it not unsatisfactory, but that it ought to be maintained, and that his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had rendered Scotland infinite service by helping to maintain it. Therefore, not only was it that the people of Scotland were ignorant of the provisions of the Bill, but they misunderstood altogether what it was that Her Majesty's Government aimed at. Now, that was one reason why he thought that it would be better that this part of the Bill should be postponed. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) was altogether wrong when he said that substantially Scotland was to be put on a different footing from England. It would in reality, he contended, be an appeal from the Supreme Scotch Court to an English Court, and the result would be injurious, as the people would consider that justice would not be done. By the plan proposed the rich would have an undue advantage over the poor. If the Bill was passed through the House without the knowledge of the people of Scotland, and transferred the discussion of appeals from the House of Lords to this Appellate Tribunal, the Scotch people would most indubitably charge the Scotch Members with having forgotten or having become a party to a breach of the Treaty of Union in submitting to review the discussion of a Court in Scotland to a Court in England ejusdem generis, and in point of fact in over-riding the judgment of a superior by that of an inferior Court, and thus interfering with the proper flow of justice. He was content with the decisions of the Courts of Session, and thought that if high salaries were given to the Judges there would be very few cases of appeal.

MR. AMPHLETT said, the Government had come to a wise conclusion in yielding to the general wish of the House that appeals from Scotland and Ireland should come to the highest Appellate Court. He had hoped that when the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was abolished one great Court of Appeal, comprising men of the highest legal reputation in the country, would have been established. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) in thinking that great inconvenience and conflict of decisions would arise from having the Supreme Court of Appeal sitting in Divisions, and thus constituting two or more ultimate Courts of Appeal, each of whose decisions should be final. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had urged that in Scotland there was a precedent for a Court of Ultimate Appeal sitting in Divisions without causing inconvenience; but he seemed to forget that there was in the case of Scotland a further and final appeal to the House of Lords. What he intended to propose in another part of the Bill was that there should be an Appeal Court of five or seven Judges, whose decisions should be final, but also that interlocutory and other matters of that kind should be heard by a Division consisting of three Judges, whose decisions should only be final if they approved the judgment of the Court below. If the interlocutory matters, and all the cases in which there was an agreement between the Divisional Court and the Court below were taken from the Court of Appeal, the residue of the business would be quite manageable, and the Court would be more likely to give a greater amount of satisfaction to the country than it would if divided into sections.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the Government were not at all wedded to the number three, and aware as he was that the suggestions of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Amphlett) were always made for the purpose of advancing measures, when the House came to discuss the clause for the number of the presiding Judges, the Government would consider the proposal very carefully. With respect to the question of "Divisions," the difficulties were obvious. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had pointed them out; but the fact was they could not get through the appeals without Divisions. As to conflicts arising between those Divisions, there was no reason to be apprehensive on the point. We had at present no theoretical security against conflicts between the two ultimate Courts of Appeal—the Privy Council and the House of Lords—and therefore the difficulty which the right hon. Gentleman pointed out might occur at present. But the answer to his objection was that it never did occur. The fact was the Court which was the stronger prevailed, so that conflict between the Courts was imaginary and not real. If the Judicial Committee were constituted as it was at the time when Lord Kingsdown lent his eminent services to it the House of Lords would pause a long time before deciding a case otherwise than in accordance with the previous decision of the Privy Council. If, on the other hand, the House of Lords was strongly constituted, the House of Lords would prevail. He was very much in favour of a practice followed with great success by the Court of Cassation in Paris and the Court of Appeal in Scotland, and that was, that when any difference of opinion occurred between the Judges to call in the other Judges to consider it. Now, that course could be adopted in the case of a subdivision of the proposed Court of Appeal under the Bill; for in cases where a difference of opinion existed in one, the other could be called in to assist in the consideration of the point. In that way a satisfactory conclusion would at once be arrived at. In his opinion, it was very doubtful whether two Divisions would be sufficient to get through the business; but at present the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was rapidly getting rid of its arrears, and so might have more time than they required for the disposal of cases coming from India and the Colonies. It was the same with the arrears in the House of Lords, so that he and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General were in hopes that a subdivision of the Court into two branches would be generally enough. The appeals from India oftentimes involved not only English but Hindoo and Mahomedan law; and those from the Colonies not only Common Law and Equity, but French, Roman, and Dutch law. He believed himself it would be desirable to send a Scotch Judge sometimes into the Colonial Division, where questions arising out of laws founded on Roman law sometimes arose, as Scotch law was in a great measure founded upon the principles of Roman law. In his opinion, if there were one Division of the Court of Appeal for cases of Equity and another for those of Common Law no conflict could occur between them. He thought he had shown that it was perfectly practicable to accomplish what they all desired—a substantially numerous, and satisfactorily constituted Appellate Court. With regard to the question of intermediate Courts in Scotland and Ireland, they had only a choice of difficulties. If they abolished Scotch and Irish intermediate Courts of Appeal, Scotch and Irish suitors would be compelled to come to London to obtain justice, which in cases of urgency—injunctions for instance—would amount to a denial of justice; while, on the other hand, if intermediate Courts of Appeal were kept up, there would be the expense of a double appeal, from which England was free. He thought the Government had adopted the lesser evil by allowing for the present the intermediate Courts to remain. But that was open to re-consideration when the judicature of Scotland and Ireland should be dealt with in a future Session.

Mr. BOURKE said, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Solicitor General as to no conflict having arisen between the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the House of Lords, that the Privy Council always held itself bound by the decisions of the House of Lords.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: That is not so. In the last case I was in before them they said they were not bound by any decision of the House of Lords.

Mr. BOURKE said, the hon. and learned Gentleman must of course be right in the particular case to which he had alluded; but it was undoubtedly the law and practice of the Privy Council to hold themselves bound by the decision of the House of Lords. With regard to intermediate Courts of Appeal, it had often been said that this Bill was founded upon the recommendations of the Judicature Commission; but the Report of the Commission showed that they merely contemplated this great Court of Appeal as an intermediate Court, and that in certain cases a final appeal should be open to the House of Lords. Now with respect to the Lord Advocate of Scotland, he confessed he was surprised to find him in favour of this Bill, because in his evidence given last Session before a Committee his views were entirely opposed to it.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he heard with surprise the suggestion thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) when he recommended the Government to withdraw the Bill, and bring in another next year, more maturely considered. But where would the Government be next year? Where would any of those now present be? One thing was perfectly certain—if they dropped the Bill this year they would never have it again, and if they went on at the present rate of progress they would have to sit there till Christmas. He would suggest that the Committee should at once dispose of the Motion, and address itself to the consideration of the clauses of the Bill.

Mr. WHALLEY asked the Lord Advocate whether he still held the views which he expressed before the Committee of the House of Lords last Session in favour of the appellate jurisdiction of the Upper House?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had read the Report of the evidence which he gave before the Committee of the House of Lords last Session, he thought for the first time, not many days ago, and no doubt the views which he there found expressed were those he entertained at the time, and he had no hesitation whatever in informing the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) that they quite tallied with and represented the opinions that he entertained now. He had not in any respect changed his opinions. If the question was as to maintaining the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords for the three kingdoms, he, speaking his own sentiments, and chiefly from a Scotch point of view, repeated the opinion which he expressed before the Committee of the House of Lords. But it must be manifest that the question to which he was now referring was not that which they had to consider there. The House of Lords by passing this Bill had determined so far as they were concerned that their House should no longer remain a Court of Appeal for the three kingdoms. They had resolved that they should no longer exercise appellate jurisdiction with reference to this country of England. It had been announced to them on authorities which he did not for a moment think of questioning, that the opinion of the Irish Bench and Irish Bar, and, so far as could be ascertained, the opinion of the people of Ireland, was, that if the House of Lords should cease to exercise appellate jurisdiction with reference to England, it was no longer desirable that appeals from Ireland should be sent to that House. Now, considering the matter had thus so entirely changed, he confessed that, for his own part, he was of opinion—and he thought that opinion was entirely consistent with what he said before the Committee of the House of Lords—that it was not desirable to retain the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords for Scotland only. There were many reasons which might be assigned for the change of opinion, or rather, he should say, for the different conclusions one arrived at, in consequence of the very material change in the circumstances. In the first place, it was very manifest that if they withdrew the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords with reference to England, they altered the character of the House in its judicial capacity very materially indeed, not only in the estimate of the country—although that was a great deal—but in truth and in reality. In the second place, it had always appeared to him to be of very great importance that they should have one Imperial Court of Appeal, to entertain in the last resort causes not from Scotland alone, which would be the case if English and Irish appeals were withdrawn from the House of Lords—not for Ireland alone, not for Scotland and Ireland together; not for England alone; but an Imperial Court exercising the supreme jurisdiction in the last resort for the three kingdoms and the colonies.

Dr. BALL said, the difficulties found in constituting the new Court went far to support the wisdom of the view originally entertained by the Lord Advocate. If we had retained the House of Lords as the ultimate tribunal of appeal—which he believed the Irish legal Members wished to do—these difficulties would not have arisen. For his own part, he would never abandon the opinion he had expressed from the commencement, that the Appellate Tribunal would have been most efficiently re-constituted by a re-construction and reformation of the Lords themselves as a final Court of Appeal.

Mr. GORDON said, it was not always that the Lord Advocate and he concurred in the same views; but they certainly did concur last year in holding that the very best Appellate Court for Scotland would be the House of Lords. He quite admitted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was entitled to say that the circumstances had been changed, and that he might now come to a different conclusion. But, at the same time, he (Mr. Gordon) ventured still to think that it was desirable to retain the House of Lords as the ultimate appellate jurisdiction for the three kingdoms, and he did not give up the hope that the Committee might yet come to that conclusion. It was admitted that the question of the appellate jurisdiction as constituted, or intended to be constituted, under this Bill, was attended with very great difficulties indeed, and it was certainly from no unwillingness that this measure should pass that he threw out the suggestion that it would be well to excise from this Bill all the different clauses which related to the appellate jurisdiction, leaving that matter for further consideration; because, so far as regarded Scotland, for instance, it was only that day that the proposed changes had been placed upon the Notice Paper. Speaking as a Scotchman, he still entertained the opinion he expressed in 1872. He did not know what was the opinion of the profession of which he had the honour to be a representative, nor did he know the opinion of the Bench with reference to the proposed change, and he would not press the point further, because he understood that these changes would not be moved in this Committee, and that the Bill would afterwards be re-committed for that purpose. If there was one principle more dangerous than another in the constitution of a Court of Appeal, it was to have three or two concurrent Courts of Appeal sitting, which might lead to different decisions. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General said they should have a sufficiently numerous Court of Appeal. But the greater the number the greater weight it gave to his objection. What he objected to was that the body being so numerous they could not expect it to be a select body. A great advantage in the House of Lords was that they got the highest legal intellects sitting there as a Court of ultimate resort. Another great advantage was that they had not only the highest intellect sitting on the judicial Bench, but they had also the highest legal and forensic ability applied to the arguments submitted to that Bench. He ventured to say that it was an advantage to have the highest forensic opinion addressed to the pleading of a case, and that it was better it should be removed out of the groove into which too often the junior members of the Bar—those who did not occupy the highest position—were apt to lead it. Because, observe what was now proposed to be done. They were obliged to have a numerous Court of Appeal—18 Judges or more. For what purpose? In order to dispose of some 300 or 400 appeals. The Judges would therefore be employed in the adjudication of points which would not be of great legal importance; whereas in the case of an ultimate appeal to the House of Lords, the appeal related only to a limited number of cases—limited as regarded generally the importance of the interest at stake, or with reference to the general interests involved in the point of law which came before the Court. It was of importance not only to the individual concerned that they should have but one Court of final decision; but it was of importance to the law, and if it was important to the law, it must be of importance to the litigants. Therefore, he ventured to think that the Government was not adopting a right course in making what were now called those intermediate appeals final appeals, and thereby shutting out the final decision of the supreme appeal Court, which had hitherto discharged its duties with satisfaction.

Mr. Gordon

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, the Committee were now discussing what was discussed on the second reading—namely, the propriety of abolishing the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), who often gave the House new reasons, had given that night this as a new reason for the abolition of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords—that as intermediate appeals were to be abolished the number of appeals to the Appellate Tribunal would thereby be greatly increased and the House of Lords could not undertake to deal with that increase of Appeals. As the Committee had agreed that in the case of England the House of Lords' jurisdiction should be transferred to a new Tribunal, and it was agreed that that new Tribunal should also deal with appeals from Ireland and Scotland, it was idle now to ask for the postponement of the Bill in order that the question about Scotch appeals might be further considered.

MR. WHALLEY appealed to the Government to yield to the arguments which had been advanced in favour of postponing the clause so as to give time, even if it were until next Session of Parliament, for calm and careful consideration of a subject which contemplated such important changes in the present system of administering justice.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he would withdraw his Motion for the postponement of the clause.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BOURKE moved, in page 3, line 5, to leave out "five ex officio Judges thereof, and also." He did so upon the authority of Lord Campbell, who had said it was wholly incompatible with the duties of the Chiefs of the various Courts to render any assistance in hearing appeals.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment, and said, with respect to one of those Judges—the Lord Chancellor—it would be impossible to strike him out as one of the ex officio Judges, he having been always accustomed to hear appeals. [Mr. BOURKE: Then I except the Lord Chancellor.] He (the Attorney General) did not understand why the heads of the various Courts should not sit in the Court of Appeal when they had the opportunity of doing so. Almost invariably one of the Chiefs presided in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the present Lord Chief Baron attended occasionally in the Privy Council and had this week been present at the sittings of the House of Lords. These distinguished functionaries ought certainly not to be extruded by statute from the Appeal Court, to which, when they could attend it, they would contribute both dignity and weight. He hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment.

MR. STAVELEY HILL supported the Amendment. The argument that the Chiefs sit in the Exchequer Chamber did not apply in this case. The constitution of the Exchequer Chamber was the Judges of two Courts sitting on the judgments of the third Court. It was necessary in that case that the judicial strength should be as great as possible. Without mentioning personal instances, or the present Chiefs, it was well known that the heads of the respective Courts, though quite able to keep their own Courts in order, were often selected for political quite as much as for legal eminence, and were not the best fitted to serve in the Court of Appeal. It was also better to keep that Court distinct from the Court below, so that a case on appeal might be res integra presented to new minds.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he could not concur with the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment, nor with the hon. and learned Member who supported it. In his opinion, the Chief Judges of the Common Law Courts, and the Judges of the Equity Courts named in the Bill, would be a great source of strength to the High Court of Appeal.

DR. BALL, while appealing to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bourke) to withdraw the Amendment, expressed great doubt in regard to the attendance of these ex officio Judges, and hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General might see fit to strengthen that part of the Appeal Court which was composed of the Ordinary Judges.

MR. BOURKE, yielding to the reasons given against his proposal, said, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, and, with the permission of the Committee he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RAIKES said, he had an Amendment upon the Paper in reference to the number of the Judges which it was proposed should constitute the High Court of Appeal; but as his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Matthews) had a similar Amendment, he would give way to him, and would not press his own Amendment on the consideration of the Committee.

MR. MATTHEWS moved, in page 3, line 6, to leave out "nine," and insert "six" Judges, of whom to constitute the High Court of Appeal. What was wanted was a Court sufficiently numerous to sit in two Divisions, and not too numerous to sit as one Court. He was not committed to any particular number, but thought that nine, as fixed in the Bill, was too many. Further, he could not see any advantage or strength to be gained by selecting paid members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to form part of the Judicial Bench of the High Court of Appeal. Did the Government think it would be satisfactory to the country to take away the ex-Indian Judges, who thoroughly understood the difficulties of Indian law, to act as Judges in the High Court of Appeal? He deprecated the addition of four paid members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council to the Appellate Tribunal. An effect of such appointments would be to lower the salaries of the other Judges. What they wanted was to get Equity and Common Law Judges in the composition of the tribunal.

Amendment negatived.

MR. MATTHEWS moved, in line 12, after "Chancery," to leave out to "1871" in line 14, the object being to exclude the salaried Judges of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from being members of the new Court of Appeal.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 12, to leave out from the words "the existing Judges," to "1871," in line 14. —(Mr. Matthews.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 62; Noes 12: Majority 50.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had given Notice of an Amendment which he did not mean to press; but he must express his deep disappointment at the course pursued by the Government in regard to the Equity element in the new Appellate Tribunal and in the Court of First Instance, and also his belief that their niggardly and penurious mode of starting a great scheme would cause it very soon to break down.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (for the ATTORNEY GENERAL) moved in page 3, line 14, to leave out from after "three" and insert

"other persons as Her Majesty may be pleased to appoint by letters patent, such appointment may be made either before or after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, but if made before shall take effect at the commencement of this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MATTHEWS moved the omission of the words from line 21 to 35 enabling the Queen to appoint as additional Judges of the Court of Appeal persons qualified by statute to be members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or who having acted in Scotland as Lord Justice General or Lord Justice Clerk, or in Ireland as Lord Chancellor or Lord Justice of Appeal, should signify their willingness to serve.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL opposed the Amendment. There were, no doubt, Judges in Scotland and Ireland who would follow the example of a very distinguished ex-Lord Chancellor of Ireland—Sir Joseph Napier—who constantly served as a member of the Privy Council.

MR. GORDON regarded the terms upon which the English and Irish Judges were empowered to give their gratuitous services in the Court of Appeal—namely, that they should not thereby prejudice their right to receive a pension as being one of the coolest conditions ever inserted in a Bill.

Amendment negatived.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL proposed the addition to the clause of the following words—

"Every such additional Judge who shall have been a Lord Chancellor hereafter for the first time appointed to that office, shall be deemed to have undertaken the duty to serve as such additional Judge until he shall have served as Judge for the period of fifteen years in the whole in all or any of the following offices (that is to say): Lord Chancellor, a Judge of any of the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, Probate, High Court of Justice or Court of Appeal."

Mr. Osborne Morgan

The object of the Amendment was to place future Lord Chancellors on the same footing in respect of pension as the Common Law Judges. This was important, as, if a time arrived when changes of Ministry were frequent, they might have several comparatively young ex-Lord Chancellors, and under the Bill as he sought to amend it, the country would not lose the benefit of their services. He trusted that this Amendment would receive the favourable consideration of the Committee.

MR. JAMES confessed he did not understand the Amendment. He presumed, in the first place, that no present or ex-Lord Chancellor would be affected by it. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL assented.] He agreed with the principle that a Lord Chancellor, who was usually appointed for only a short time, ought to give his services to the country; but the clause seemed to be hastily drawn. "Until" seemed to refer to the future; but ought it not to read "unless he shall have served?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was quite willing that the words should be "unless and until." If any other words could be suggested on the Report he should be quite ready to consider them.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY trusted that the Committee would not adopt an Amendment which would put an indignity upon the person called upon to fill one of the highest—if not the highest—office in the State. The effect of this Amendment and a subsequent clause would be to make it imperative upon every Lord Chancellor to bind himself when he went out of office to serve as a junior Judge in the Court of Appeal, over which he formerly presided, until he had made up the period of 15 years, or else to forfeit his pension. Now, the position of Lord Chancellor was very different from that of an ordinary Judge, and the effect of the Amendment would be that it would be no longer sought after, as hitherto, by men of the highest eminence at the Bar.

MR. HENLEY asked whether there ought not to be some limit as to age. A Lord Chancellor might be appointed at 65, and was he to undertake to act as Judge of Appeal until he was 80? He doubted whether that would be a wise provision, because he could answer for it that people "wore out." ["No!"]

There ought to be some age at which a man might retire from a duty for which he was incompetent.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it had not been the practice in England to fix any age at which the Judge should retire. They performed their duties until they were disabled by infirmity. In the case put by the right hon. Gentleman the obligation would be upon the Judge to complete his term of 15 years unless he was prevented from sitting by "any reasonable impediment." If he were 80 years of age and his powers were failing, that would be a "reasonable impediment."

MR. CAWLEY observed, that as long as the Lord Chancellor was a political officer there was a marked difference between him and the other officers. He thought that the present proposal would be an indignity to the Lord Chancellor, and prevent the best men seeking that office.

MR. JAMES trusted that the Solicitor General would postpone the consideration of the Amendment.

MR. HINDE PALMER did not think it was desirable to make a bargain with a high officer like the Lord Chancellor; but he thought they should rather trust to his good feeling to voluntarily undertake the duties. He thought the suggestion to postpone the Amendment until Clause A. was reached was a valuable one.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that at present £5,000 a-year was granted to a Lord Chancellor on his retirement from office without any contract being made between him and the country. Therefore, there was no use in speaking of enforcing a contract where no contract existed. But it should be remembered that a Lord Chancellor was often appointed in the prime of life, and what the Government wished was that it should become a matter of positive obligation that upon his retirement from office he should give the country the benefit of his, perhaps, very valuable services. If therefore the Bill passed in its present shape, it would become a matter of contract that a Lord Chancellor, on his retirement, should serve on the Court of Appeal, and he did not see that there was any indignity whatever, or anything hurtful to the feelings of any eminent person in such a proposal.

MR. DISRAELI said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had misunderstood the point before the Committee. The argument was not as to the feelings of certain eminent persons; what the Committee had to consider was the interest of the country. He (Mr. Disraeli) thought that it was not for the interest of the country that such an arrangement as the hon. and learned Gentleman described should take place. We called upon a man who was making a very large income at his profession to renounce it and take office, with all its responsibilities. That office might not last long, and he would have to calculate in what position he would find himself at the close of that career. Now, £5,000 a-year was not an extravagant estimate of what such a man was entitled to, or what he would have to lose by accepting office. If the State made hard bargains, men of commanding ability would refuse to take office, and it would have to be offered to men of secondary capacity, who would eagerly accept it. Before the Act introduced by Lord Brougham, Lord Chancellors on their retirement had £4,000 a-year, without any restriction or condition whatever, and when Lord Brougham increased the pension there was really no condition laid down, though in introducing the Bill he gave utterance to some vague and indefinite observations. What they ought to do was to give a Lord Chancellor retiring upon a pension the right if he chose to become a member of this Court; but to make his pension dependent upon his future services would be a most unwise step. There might be physical, mental, or moral circumstances which would make it undesirable that a person leaving a high political office should enter at all into professional service, and this proposition would make it a matter of necessity. He hoped the Committee would not sanction the Amendment.

MR. JAMES said, that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman furnished a strong reason for postponing the consideration of the present subject.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought it would be convenient to postpone this discussion till they came to Clause A, when the whole subject might be considered on its merits. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) seemed to think that every retiring Chancellor if he had served a day in the office was entitled to receive a pension of £5,000 a-year, without the obligation to perform any other judicial duty; and that at the time when they proposed to strip the House of Lords of all judicial duties. He entertained a very different opinion, and would contend that it was desirable to apply to Lord Chancellors the condition of this Amendment. In the meantime, however, it was desirable to postpone the Question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 7 (Vacancies by resignations of Judges and effect of vacancies generally) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Qualifications of Judges. Not required to be Serjeants-at-Law).

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 14, to leave out from the word "Provided" to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. Matthews.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not agree to the omission of the words. There was no reason for maintaining Serjeant's Inn. In reply to remarks which had been made, he would say that Judges were not "visitors" of the Inns in the ordinary sense of the word; they had no original or initial jurisdiction, they had an appellate jurisdiction in the matter of discipline only. In respect to finances they were perfectly powerless, and had no control. In the single instance of the discipline committed to the benchers over the members of the Bar, there was an appeal to the Common Law Judges, and to them only. He did not apprehend any inconvenience from Judges having to sit in appeals upon the conduct of different Inns of Court. Of course, a gentleman belonging to any one Inn would not sit as Judge in an appeal upon the conduct of that Inn.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON, as a member of the ancient and honourable order which was attacked by the Proviso before the Committee, protested against the proposal contained in the clause. A Serjeant-at-Law could take a brief from any person; whereas a Queen's Counsel could not, unless he had the licence of the Crown to do so. The Serjeants were the ancient and legitimate leaders of the Bar, the persons who were essentially the people's counsel, and whose creation was quite independent of anything like political or party influence. He strongly objected to the certain extinction of the order, which would be effected by an enactment to the effect that in future it should not be necessary for barristers to become members of Serjeant's Inn before ascending the Bench.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 39: Majority 46.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Provisions for extraordinary duties of Judges of the former Courts).

MR. MATTHEWS moved in page 6, line 12, after "year," to insert—

"Provided always, That the expenses of the Judges who may be commissioned to go circuits as hereinafter provided shall be borne and paid in like manner as the expenses of the Judges who go the winter circuit are now borne and paid."

By the Bill all the members of the High Court of Justice were put on the same footing at £5,000 a-year; but while the Common Law Judges had to go on circuit at considerable expense, the existing Vice Chancellors did not; he thought that they ought to have their expenses allowed them the same as the Judges who went on winter circuit.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the Amendment related to a red letter clause, which was to be moved as a new clause.

Clause agreed to.

PART II.

Jurisdiction and Law.

Clause 13 (Jurisdiction of High Court of Justice).

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN moved in line 30, after "Commissioners," to insert—

"13. The Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

"14. The Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Durham."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the hon. and learned Member was not in his place when the matter was discussed previously, and explained that his object would be attained by an Amendment of Clause 22, from which would be eliminated words that restricted the changes to be made in the administration of the law to the newly-constituted Courts. By striking out the names of those Courts the administration of the law would extend to the two Chancery Courts of the Counties Palatine. They had not the remotest intention of abolishing the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster—a very good Court, and one they could not attempt to take away without having the people of Lancashire fairly up in arms against them.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was glad to hear the Solicitor General's admission as to the character of the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine, which was one of the very best possible tribunals in the whole kingdom. He might add that the Court of Common Pleas of the County Palatine had become just as popular as the Court of Chancery; and the same argument applied to both of those tribunals.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS then proposed to omit in line 26 the words "The Court of Common Pleas of the County Palatine of Lancaster," observing that the popularity of the Government in Lancashire was not great, and it certainly would not be increased if they destroyed the Court of Common Pleas there. There was a great desire in Lancashire to know whether, under the Bill, the Assizes would be held there more frequently.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 26, to leave out the words "the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster."—(Mr. Cross.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. WEST said, he could not support the Amendment, because he believed that Bill not only continued the benefits conferred by the Court of Common Pleas in the County Palatine of Lancaster, but would extend them to all the other great and populous parts of the country.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON opposed the Amendment, and said, the existence of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster did not in any way benefit the suitors. It ought not to be withdrawn from the operation of the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed that the question was not one for lawyers but for suitors, and they were in favour of the retention of the Courts. Every case tried in the Court of Common Pleas cost the suitor £10 or £12 less than the cases tried in the other superior Courts.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he could not support the Amendment, as the Court was merely a nominal one, and the machinery which was the valuable part of it, would be continued under other provisions of the Bill.

MR. CAWLEY said, that he would agree to the clause if it were shown that the advantages which Lancashire derived from the existence of this Court would not be taken away, but really extended to other parts of the kingdom.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL agreed with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cross), that the question was one rather for suitors than lawyers. There was no intention on the part of the framers of the Bill to interfere in the slightest degree with the benefits which this Court conferred. The whole jurisdiction of the Court would be exercised as it was at present, except that it would be exercised by Judges of the High Court sent as Commissioners of Assize. All the local advantages arising from the machinery of the Court would be preserved by other clauses in the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Judges did not try causes in the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster as Judges of the Court, but by virtue of the Commission under which the Assizes were held. The position of the attorneys practising in the Court was peculiar, and, if the Court were abolished they would be entitled to compensation. Had that question been considered? He did not want to leave the case of Lancaster dependent on the chance of passing provisions, which would confer on other counties advantages corresponding to those which Lancaster derived from its local Court, because such provisions would threaten the agency business of the London attorneys, and therefore might be successfully opposed by them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the case of the attorneys practising in the Court of Lancaster was worthy of consideration and should have it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 129; Noes 95: Majority 34.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 14 to 16, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 17 (No appeal from High Court or Court of Appeal to House of Lords, or Judicial Committee).

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY moved to postpone the consideration of the clause. The question whether the jurisdiction of the House of Lords should be immediately abolished must, he argued, mainly depend on the constitution of the new Court of Appeal, and the way in which its functions were to be exercised. He had on the Notice Paper a Motion for the omission of the clause altogether, and he had three reasons for giving that Notice; his first and chief reason was that the jurisdiction of the House of Lords as a Court of Final Appeal for English causes ought not to be abolished whilst it was retained for Scotch and Irish causes. As originally constituted, the Bill applied only to England; but the Government had since accepted the proposal of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), making it applicable to Scotland and Ireland also; his first objection to the clause was consequently removed. His second reason was that, in many cases it was desirable to have the means of rehearing an appeal. The Bill at present contained no provision for a rehearing, but there were several Notices on the Paper of Amendments to effect that purpose; should no such provision be inserted in the Bill it would be undesirable to part with the existing right of rehearing by the House of Lords. His third reason for objecting to the clause was that it was expedient to retain the present jurisdiction of the House of Lords until there was a reasonable certainty that the proposed Court of Appeal would work well. For the present, however, he would content himself with moving the postponement of the consideration of the clause.

Mr. Assheton Cross

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 17 be postponed."—(Sir Richard Baggallay.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman wished this clause to be postponed upon three grounds. With the first ground for postponement he need not trouble himself, because it was admitted that it had disappeared, it having been admitted on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) that the three kingdoms should have the same Court to which their final appeals should be presented. The second ground which the hon. and learned Gentleman urged for postponement he could not help thinking was peculiar. The hon. and learned Gentleman wished to preserve the means of having an appeal, before the final Court was applied to; but one of the objects of the Bill was to prevent any appeal to an intermediate tribunal. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had admitted that it was desirable to abolish the Intermediate Courts of Appeal. The third ground upon which the hon. and learned Gentleman asked for a postponement of this clause was still more curious—namely, that it should be postponed until it was seen how, by the later clauses, this jurisdiction was to be exercised. He (the Attorney General) should have thought it was plain that the Committee should make up their mind in the first instance whether or not they would transfer en bloc this jurisdiction, and that the next question they should deal with was the question how that jurisdiction should be exercised in various circumstances. For some 100 years there had been two co-ordinate Courts of Appeal in this country, yet there had been no conflicting decisions; and, therefore, though there was a metaphysical possibility of such a conflict, as practical men the objection was hardly worth considering. He would urge upon the hon. and learned Gentleman to act upon the principle of common sense, and be guided by experience. The question of maintaining the jurisdiction of the House of Lords had already been discussed, and he hoped that, for the saving of public time, the decision already given by the House would be accepted.

MR. NEWDEGATE: As the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General has made an appeal to men of common sense, perhaps I may be allowed, as one not learned in the law, to make a few remarks. The hon. and learned Gentleman says, that inasmuch as this House has passed the second reading of the Bill, we are not at liberty again to consider the propriety of abolishing the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. But when the House agreed to the second reading of the Bill, it constituted a Court of Appeal for England only, and since the House passed the second reading it has been decided that the final Court of Appeal this Bill would create, shall extend its jurisdiction to Ireland and Scotland, and include Scotch and Irish Judges. Now, although Englishmen may have such confidence in their own Bar and their own Judges as to be perfectly content with the Court of Appeal first constituted, however much they may regret to see the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords abandoned, the Court of Appeal which we are now considering is an indefinite quantity, inasmuch as we do not know exactly what additions are to be made to that Court. With respect to the addition of the Scotch Judges, much as I respect their learning and judgment, when they are concerned in the administration of the law of their own country, I have always heard that the Scotch law is different from the law of England; and although Scotch Judges have sometimes, when Peers attended in the House of Lords to adjudicate upon English appeals, I have heard grave complaints of English causes being judged by Scotch Judges. Then, with regard to the Irish Judges, it is idle to attempt to conceal the fact that influences are operative in the appointment to the highest judicial offices in that country, which, happily, are not operative in England. We know that scenes have occurred in the Court of Chancery in Ireland such as have never been known to occur in the Court of Chancery in England; and the addition of Irish Judges if made to the new Court, will tend to shake the public confidence in that Court, which confidence, if it exists at all, is a confidence of wonderfully recent growth. There is another moot point. The only argument which has been used for the abolition of the jurisdiction of the House of Lords is, that the House of Lords itself has upon the application of Her Majesty's Government given it up. I have asked several Peers whether they knew the real reasons adduced in favour of the appellate jurisdiction being abandoned. No one single Peer has been able to give me a satisfactory reason in answer to that question. I was told that when the Bill got into Committee the jurisdiction was given up; but no Peer to whom I have spoken on the subject has been able to inform me why it was given up. I entertain the greatest objection to this proposal, which appears to have been carried by misfeasance, and for this reason. I have the highest respect for the Judicial Bench; but the historical examples in this country of Courts of Final Jurisdiction not amenable to Parliament, and not connected with the House of Lords, are not favourable. Judges are excellent persons, no doubt; but they are all the better where they have that increased sense of responsibility which connection with one of the Houses of Parliament entails. There is historical evidence of the abuses which are recorded against the Court of High Commission in the times of the Stuarts, and that although there were from 26 to 42 Judges in the Star Chamber, it likewise closed its career in disgrace. Such are the examples that we have of Final Courts of Appeal separated from the House of Lords! I hold another, and it may be an erroneous, opinion; but I hold this—that the Courts connected with such a body as the House of Lords gain, from daily association, an amount of practical knowledge, and a sense of the responsibility constantly incumbent upon them, that are not possessed in the same degree by any Court which is separated altogether from the Upper House of the Legislature. It may be said that this is an old-fashioned objection. Nevertheless, it is a practical one, and comes home to the common sense of the people of this country. Although this House seems inclined to proceed so jauntily with the Bill, I am convinced that the country is not prepared for the great change which is now proposed. I am confident that the country looked forward to another alternative, and it was this—that the learned persons who are to constitute the Court of Appeal, as now proposed, should be made life Peers. That measure was proposed by Lord Russell. It was sanctioned by the late Lord Derby, and has the highest authority in its favour. ["No, no!"] Yes, I say that it was sanctioned by the late Lord Derby, for, although he voted against the creation of life Peerages, not limited to Judges, his speech stands on record, and uncontradicted by himself, that, had the limitation to Judges, who should assist the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, been proposed, that proposal would have received the cordial assent of the late Lord Derby, as it had the advocacy of Lord Russell, the recommendation of Lord Granville, and the assent of a large proportion of the House of Lords. All such considerations as these may seem slight to lawyers entirely occupied with the technical procedure of the Courts, and who do not trouble themselves to regard the constitutional questions which are involved; but we, who represent those, who are to be the suitors and the subjects of the jurisdiction of this new Court, whose fortunes and whose fate are to be finally decided by this Court of Appeal, look more gravely into these questions; and I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Richard Baggallay) who has proposed the further consideration of this subject, and should he divide the House, either in favour of the postponement or the rejection of this clause, he shall have my hearty support.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 145: Majority 38.

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 149: Majority 51.

MR. CHARLEY moved that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press the Motion. The Committee had already divided, and the clause was now in such a position that the Government might fairly ask that they come to a decision upon it.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK explained that had he known the opinion of his right hon. Friend he would not have put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, and he begged to apologize for having done so.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 93: Majority 61.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved that the Chairman do report Progress.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE, &c.

BILL—[BILL 199.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Stansfeld.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH moved an Instruction for rendering compulsory in England and Wales the Highway Acts of 1862 and 1864. He might inform the House that turnpike trusts were falling in every day, and it was therefore a proper time to remove the injustice that now existed and place the charge for the repair of highways on a larger area; and, at all events, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would appropriate the carriage and licence duty to defray the repairs of the public roads.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to make provision for rendering compulsory in England and Wales the Highway Acts 1862 and 1864."—(Lord George Cavendish.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he had always objected on principle to permissive legislation of the kind contained in the Highway Act, for by such legislation the House shirked its own responsibility and placed an unpopular duty on the shoulders of others. At the same time, he was not prepared to support the Motion of the noble Lord to make the Highway Act compulsory, for that Act had not worked so satisfactorily as it was at first hoped it would, and it ought not to be made compulsory throughout the country without any attempt being made to remedy its acknowledged defects. He understood the Government were about to assent to the proposal; but he was certain that such an attempt to force an imperfect Highway Act upon those numerous places which had not yet adopted it would be most unpopular.

MR. COLLINS remarked that the whole of our highway legislation had been completely changed by throwing the maintenance of turnpikes on the parishes. Now that hon. Members had the opportunity, they ought to make turnpike roads, which were not parochial roads, a charge upon the district. He hoped the House would accept the Instruction of the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire.

COLONEL BARTTELOT protested against a measure of this importance being proceeded with at so late an hour in the morning. If the Government were going to assent to this Instruction, he would use every means in his power to resist the progress of this Bill, and he now begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT GALWAY opposed the Instruction to the Committee, and seconded the Motion for adjournment.

MR. HIBBERT said, the position in which parishes were placed by the discontinuance of turnpikes rendered it necessary that some better arrangement should be made. It was the intention of the Local Government Board to have dealt with the subject of turnpikes and highways this Session, but they had not had the opportunity of doing so; and therefore they would, as a step in the right direction, support the Instruction of the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire. He would not, however, oppose the adjournment of the debate. The time had come when it was impossible to continue the roads under parish management.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON expressed his regret at the Government having consented to an adjournment of the debate, which he regarded as tantamount to throwing over the noble Lord's proposition altogether for the present Session. There was no necessity for such a course, as all that was asked was that that should be made compulsory which should never have been made permissive. All permissive legislation was unsatisfactory, and led to confusion.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, he had not the least wish to press the proposal against the feeling of the House, or to snatch a division upon it. He thought that if there was to be an adjournment it had better take place at once.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH was sure the noble Lord had no desire to steal a march upon the House.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought that this was a matter of which the country ought to have full notice, and he would suggest that the Government should embody the propositions of the noble Lord in a Bill with any Amendments of their own.

MR. BRUCE said, he could not undertake that the Government would introduce a measure of their own for that purpose.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

JUDICIAL PEERAGES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD REDESDALE, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that for the advantage of this House and of the suitors thereto, and for the honour of the legal profession, Her Majesty will be pleased to sanction the erection of the offices of Lord High Chancellor, Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer of England into Baronies which shall entitle the holders of those offices to writs of summons to Parliament by tenure thereof under such titles as Her Majesty shall in each case be pleased to summon them; and that such writs of summons as aforesaid shall make the persons receiving the same, although they may not continue to hold the said offices, Peers of Parliament for life, without remainder to the heirs of their bodies; and that in the event of Her Majesty being pleased at any time after such writ shall have been issued to create the person sitting under the same a baron by patent under the same title, with remainder to the heirs male of his body, the barony so created may, if Her Majesty shall be so pleased, take precedence from the date of the first writ of summons directed to such person."

said, he would remind their Lordships that 22 years ago—namely on the 15th of June 1851—he gave Notice of a Motion of a precisely similar nature to that which he was now submitting to their Lordships; but meeting with no encouragement at the time he had abstained from bringing it forward. He made that observation for the purpose of making their Lordships aware of the fact of his having entertained his present opinions on the subject for so long a time, and because he thought it ought not to be treated as a party question. From that time forward he had always held a decided opinion upon the subject, which was that he strongly objected to life Peerages. What he always advocated, and what he now advocated, was official Peerages—Peerages which would be granted on account of the high office a person might hold, and on the consideration that the presence of such a person in their Lordships' House would be a matter of great advantage to them. He believed that those Peerages could be created quite irrespective of party consideration, and the result would be a deserved honour on the Gentlemen whom his Motion included, and a great gain to the legislative resources of that House. They were no novelty, for the Church had from the earliest period been represented in the House in that way, and the Church being no more closely allied to the State than to the Law, it would be equally advantageous for the Law also to be represented. In 1856, the question of life Peerages was for the first time brought under their Lordships' consideration in the case of Lord Wensleydale, and their Lordships very properly resisted the attempt that was made to introduce life Peerages. He approved that decision, for an unlimited introduction of life Peers would have been fatal to their Lordships' independence. Lord Russell's Bill four years ago sought to avoid that objection by restrictions on the number and modes of creation. The Select Committee on the Appellate Jurisdiction which was appointed after that decision recommended the strengthening of the legal element by the appointment of Deputy Speakers, paid officers of high character with life Peerages; but the Bill founded thereon, after passing through that House and passing a second reading in the other, with the support of Lord Palmerston and the present Lord Chancellor, fell through, owing to the lateness of the Session, and to objections to the creation of new paid officers of that House. The official Peerages which he now proposed would be held by men with salaries enabling them to sustain the position, and he had included the Lord Chancellor; for in many instances persons who had accepted the office with an hereditary Peerage would have preferred on their appointment, in consideration of a large family and small means, a Peerage for life. Life Peerages unconnected with office would give no security that the House would be benefited, and were therefore objectionable. It might be asked whether he would have any objection to an extension of the principle upon which his proposition was based. He was prepared to do so to some extent. For instance, he should be willing to extend his Motion to the holder of any high office in Scotland whose attendance in Parliament would not be incompatible with his other duties; for the House had derived much assistance from his noble and learned Friend (Lord Colonsay), who was conversant with Scotch matters; but the office of Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in Scotland was at present not connected with the Law. Men qualified by holding high legal offices would be a valuable addition to the House, and that the more so from the fact that it was proposed to include Scotch and Irish Appeals in the operation of the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill. As to colonial Governors, whom Lord Russell's Bill proposed to admit, nobody denied the advantage of their being Members of that House, and giving information on colonial subjects; but the number of the Peerage rendered it easy to find Peers willing to accept colonial Governorships, and it would be undesirable both for the colonies and for that House that there should be any notion of sending out Commoners in order to qualify them for Peerages. It might lead to persons equally qualified, but already Peers, being passed over. The Bill also proposed the admission of persons who had sat 10 years in the other House; but many hon. Gentlemen sat there on account merely of their wealth and desire for social position, and it was not ordinary men whose admission here was desirable. He attached no weight to the objection that the Chief Judges would have no time to assist in Parliamentary business, especially as, if the Judicature Bill passed, they would become Appellate Judges exclusively. After the charges preferred from the Bench against Parliament of careless legislation, it might be an advantage to have the Chief Judges in the House, responsible in some degree for what was done, and there could be no constitutional objection, for Chief Justices had always been deemed eligible for Peerages, and had sometimes held them. He was anxious to keep such Peerages free from any stamp of inferiority, and he proposed that the wives and children of such Peers should have the same rank as those of hereditary Peers; as, also, that if an hereditary Peerage with the same title was afterwards granted, it should date from the patent of life Peerage. Above all, the honour should lie in the office and not in the Peerage, as was the case with members of the Episcopal bench. In conclusion, believing that what he proposed would add great weight and value to the deliberations and decisions of that House, and that the plan he had hit upon for carrying that proposition out was the best that could be adopted, he recommended it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that for the advantage of this House and of the suitors thereto, and for the honour of the legal profession, Her Majesty will be pleased to sanction the erection of the offices of Lord High Chancellor, Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer of England into Baronies which shall entitle the holders of those offices to writs of summons to Parliament by tenure thereof under such titles as Her Majesty shall in each case be pleased to summon them; and that such writs of summons as aforesaid shall make the persons receiving the same, although they may not continue to hold the said offices, Peers of Parliament for life, without remainder to the heirs of their bodies; and that in the event of Her Majesty being pleased at any time after such writ shall have been issued to create the person sitting under the same a baron by patent under the same title, with remainder to the heirs male of his body, the barony so created may, if Her Majesty shall be so pleased, take precedence from the date of the first writ of summons directed to such person.—(The Lord Boscawen.)

LORD DENMAN said, he could not concur in the proposals of the noble Lord. He thought it was not the time for such a change, and that whatever advantages it might confer upon the House could be just as well obtained without it. The Judges were always ready to assist in the appellate jurisdiction of the House; and in his opinion it would be a very equivocal honour to confer upon them to place them in a social position which they did not covet, and which in many instances might be beyond their means. He hoped the Motion would not be adopted. It was inopportune to submit it when the Judicature Bill was altering everything, and itself being daily altered. Lord Hatherley, in 1856, declined a Peerage, and it would be awkward if, after the Motion was adopted, Judges declined, for want of time or other reasons, to accept these Peerages, which could not be considered any very great honour to receive.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I stated the other day that I thought at the time, and that subsequent reflection had confirmed my opinion—that it was a great misfortune for the House that the question of life Peerages was decided adversely. I have always felt the Resolution in Lord Wensleydale's case a great blow to this House, and I am glad to find from the Motion of the noble Lord, that the subject is still in your Lordships' minds, and that it may possibly bear fruit. At the same time, I feel some hesitation upon the subject, for although, considering the position in which the question was left by your Lordships' decision, I think the noble Lord's Motion is perfectly correct in point of form, and there is no doubt that—supposing the proposal to be accepted—the most appropriate mode of proceeding in the matter would be by means of an Address to the Crown, yet I see great objections to it. One thing we ought to consider is not only how far any proposal of the sort is sufficiently mature and in itself defensible, but whether it has a reasonable chance of success in the other House; for it is undesirable, and a harmful thing, that anything affecting the character and constitution of this House should be discussed and canvassed there, if there is no likelihood of any practical result. We should therefore well consider the steps we are taking, before we recommend the Government to bring the matter in a legislative shape before Parliament. With regard to the statement of the noble Lord in his Motion, that the carrying out of the proposal will be of advantage to suitors, there seems to be a slight anachronism in that, inasmuch as your Lordships have already passed a Bill depriving yourselves of your judicial functions to a certain extent, and that Bill has been amended in "another place," by striking out all the remaining judicial functions of this House; therefore if the measure passes in that shape, suitors will not derive much benefit from the creation of those legal life Peers, inasmuch as there will be no suitors appealing to the House. Moreover, there is no provision in the Motion for insuring a Law Peer from Scotland or Ireland. The noble Lord appears inclined to meet that by the somewhat clumsy expedient of adding, not an actual Scotch Judgeship, but an office held at this moment by a layman, a Member of this House. I cannot agree with the noble and learned Lord (Lord Denman) when he says that it is not an honour to be created a life Peer of this House. It was argued in Lord Wensleydale's case, though I always scouted the idea, that there would be some feeling of superiority on the part of hereditary Peers towards eminent men entering this House in virtue of high qualifications. With regard to the honours of the legal profession, it stands deservedly high; and it is no reason for making an alteration to represent it as "for the honour of the legal profession." One objection to the proposal is, that it passes by other professions whose representation here would be an undoubted advantage. The noble Lord thinks it would be unwise to take any step lessening the inducement to select Peers from colonial Governors. That may be very well for us to say; but it is certainly not a reason which will recommend the exclusive character of his proposal to the House of Commons. This Session we have had few debates of any interest; but we have had debates in which late colonial Governors have contributed very much to the information of the House. If we have some eminent colonial Governor—even a man pre-eminent among Governors—who happens not to be a Peer, owing to a large family, or to not having large savings—and it is difficult for a Governor to have large savings—it is surely undesirable that he should be excluded any more than an eminent lawyer. Take another case. The noble Lord (Lord Blachford) made a speech the other day, and was followed by Peers on both sides, who not only praised its admirable character, but said that he from his accurate knowledge of the subject, was the only man in the kingdom by whom it could have been made. I do not, therefore, understand why we should adopt a system by which we exclude persons of these qualifications who have a large family, or an insufficient landed estate. The scheme, moreover, would not have applied to Lord Kingsdown, whose assistance in appeals was an inestimable advantage. I have no doubt life Peers would be an advantage to the House, but I think the best way would be to leave the Prerogative of the Crown undisturbed. I do not remember that in Lord Wensleydale's case anybody ventured to deny that it was in the Prerogative of the Crown to make life Peers. I believe it would be very much controlled, as stated the other day by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), by public opinion. As Lord Lansdowne said, the Prerogative of the Crown might be safely trusted in matters of the sort to a control by the new prerogative of public opinion. I know the jealousy which your Lordships then entertained, and the feeling which actuated legal Members. Lord Campbell asked what the legal profession had done that it was to be humiliated in that way? I believe your Lordships feared that life Peerages would make it easier for a Minister to ask, and more difficult for the Sovereign to refuse, an enormous and unwarrantable creation of Peers for the purpose of swamping the House at any particular moment, and thus obtaining a majority on any particular question of the hour. I think that fear an unreasonable one. Exactly the same weight of responsibility would exist with regard to creating life Peers as hereditary Peers, and that feeling would restrain the Sovereign as much in one case as in the other. It would be infinitely better even to restrict the number, and prevent the exercise of the power in an unwarrantable and unconstitutional manner, than to confine the Peerages to four legal offices. Lord Russell's Bill restricted the whole number and the number of annual creations, and that would be better than the noble Lord's proposal. He proposes that the wives of these Peers should be Peeresses, and their children have titles of courtesy. That takes them out of the category of the Episcopal Bench, which is the only analogy the noble Lord tried to make out. Bishops, moreover, represent property, which would not be the case with the Judges, who would represent nothing but stipends. The noble Lord thinks hon. Members of the other House of great wealth and desirous of social position would exercise great pressure on the Government to make them Peers. Is that pressure at all diminished, however, by its being open to the Government to make them hereditary Peers? One advantage of life Peerages is, that it prevents persons who themselves have every claim to a seat here from transmitting their Peerages to persons who may be excellent in their way, but may not have the eminent qualities of their fathers, and lack the means of keeping up in any proper degree the dignity of the Peerage. I should much prefer to life Peerages attached to offices some restriction on the number of life Peers at one time, or on the annual creations. There are advantages about life Peerages which are patent to view; but the subject involves many difficulties so grave that I cannot give my support to the proposals of the noble Lord, and I do not think it desirable that legislation should take place in the direction they recommend. Under all the circumstances, therefore, I do not think it advisable that the noble Lord should press his Motion for an Address.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I think the objections which the noble Earl has offered to the Motion show very little zeal for a measure he professes to support; or else it suggests the idea that he has in the background some more revolutionary proposal of his own. The noble Earl seems to object to one proposal, because the time is not propitious; and another does not suit him, because it does not go far enough. One of his objections to this scheme is, that we ought to have it in a shape likely to pass the House of Commons, and that this scheme would not pass there. Now, the House of Commons is a very favourite bugbear, which the Government keep for the purpose of frightening us. Some time ago I proposed a certain alteration in the Ecclesiastical Courts of Appeal, when I was told it would certainly wreck the Bill in the House of Commons; that though the principle was quite right, the Bill so weighted would never pass. This evening I hear that that very proposal has been passed by the other House with perfect unanimity. The noble Earl does not sufficiently appreciate the difficulties which surround the question, and the reasons which induce the advocates of life Peerages to support the limited proposal of the noble Lord. No, doubt, the real fear is, that if the principle should be more extended, the independence of this House may be seriously tampered with. This House has always looked with great jealousy on giving Ministers the power of advising the creation of an unlimited number of Peers. Every Sovereign has naturally a deep aversion to loading the Peerage unnecessarily for all time with Peers created to meet some present emergency. That makes the Sovereign very jealous of allowing the Prime Minister of the day—himself a merely temporary phenomenon—the power, for a temporary object, to mortgage to all futurity the honours in the gift of the Crown. It is a very serious responsibility, and every Minister feels it. It is to the weight arising from the perpetuity of the Peerage that we owe the fact that the power of creating Peers, apparently so unlimited, has in reality been so seldom used for influencing our deliberations. If, however, the Sovereign knew that the results of the Act would not last for ever; that it would not be stamped in indelible characters on the history of the country, but that a few short years would dispose of some few aged men, would bury in oblivion his own facility in conceding the temporary demands of the Minister, and that the mode by which the crisis was surmounted and the crisis itself would be alike forgotten by posterity, the responsibility would be much lighter. The advocates of life Peerages have to satisfy the House that the power will not be used for the purpose of controlling it, and I am convinced that the House will never recede from its decision in 1856—that it will never trust an unscrupulous Minister, backed by some transient popular agitation, with the power of humiliating this House. I should have been very glad had Lord Russell's Bill passed, though I felt at the time there were objections, the force of which reflection and experience have not diminished. The temptation of the Minister to confer Peerages on those whom he does not like to put in a responsible office is now considerable. If he knew, and the Sovereign knew also, that he was not thereby pledging the future interests of the country, do you imagine life Peerages would not be habitually created as a means of securing influence? Bribery, it is said, has passed away—namely, money passing from hand to hand—but has it entirely disappeared from our institutions in the form of a mark of distinction for political support? Unless the standard by which Ministers are habitually governed is raised higher than it is now, it would be dangerous to give a Minister an unlimited power, which might be used for stocking these benches with some of the most incompetent Members of the House of Commons. The noble Earl quoted me, as saying that no Minister would be so lost to his duty, or his reputation, as to appoint men to high judicial offices for mere party purposes. I think we have got beyond that. The interests concerned are so large and the injury and the injustice would be so cruel, that no Minister would dare to appoint incompetent men to administer justice. But in this case, the injury would not be so apparent, and a Minister who would shrink from appointing a Judge from party motives, might not shrink from rewarding the steady votes of a worn-out partizan. The noble Earl asks the reason for confining the measure to lawyers. The reason is that half-a-loaf is better than no bread. Supposing the paramount object of bringing men of proved ability is secured, I have no objection to go beyond the limits of the law; but let us try this proposition, and admit eminent Judges, and go further hereafter, if it proves advantageous. We should thus decide the vexed question, whether life Peers would diminish the influence of the hereditary Peers, which I believe to be a bugbear. After all, we have those who may be considered life Peers—namely, men who come here by their own merit and not by hereditary descent; and, as one of the caste who, according to that hypothesis, would be injured, I have never found hereditary Peers depreciated. In point of fact, this House within its walls, is the most democratic Assembly in the world. As to colonial Governors, let us wait awhile and try this experiment. If it answers, we can go further; if not, we shall have done no harm. This is not the time when we should be wise in rejecting such a proposal. I cannot help feeling that had Lord Russell's Bill passed in 1869, we should not now have lost the appellate jurisdiction. In the long run in England, whatever traditional rights or powers may be, jurisdiction will ultimately be fitted to the strength of the back that has to bear it, and in proportion as we are strong to do our work, we shall get more work to do, and in proportion as we are strong to exercise the power, we shall have power to exercise. I cannot feel altogether satisfied with the present state of things. Nobody impeaches the capacity or ability of this House; but as to the extent to which, in comparison to our numbers, attention is shown to our work, I fear no candid critic would say we are wholly above reflection. While the attendance year by year diminishes, the work we have to do seems to diminish too, and I sometimes think there is a race for extinction between the two, and that it is an even bet which will disappear first, the work which the Assembly has to do, or the Assembly which does the work. I am satisfied, however, that there might be abundance of work for us to do, and that should this proposal result in fresh talent being introduced into this House, we shall have ample opportunity afforded us for availing ourselves of its assistance. I am afraid that the change that appears to be impending over us through the operation of the Judicature Bill will tend largely to diminish the number of legal Peers in this House, because lawyers of eminence will not have the same inducements as before to accept Peerages, and the consequent result to the reputation of the House as a Legislative Assembly will be most injurious. That prospective evil may, however, in some degree be met by the noble Lord's proposal being carried into effect. I trust, therefore, that we shall not, by rejecting the proposition, indicate to the country that we value our privileges more than our usefulness; but that we shall rather show an intention on our part to welcome, with the utmost earnestness, any change in our constitution which will strengthen our voice as a deliberative, revising, and legislative body, and so increase our usefulness to the country and the probability of the permanence of the House. In conclusion I beg to express an earnest hope that the House will agree to the proposal of the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that having had the misfortune to be the principal means of rejecting the Bill of the noble Earl (Earl Russell) in 1869, he wished to make a few observations upon the subject. He did not think that that was the proper opportunity to discuss the proposal to create life Peerages generally, inasmuch as the terms of the noble Lord's Motion were strictly limited. He must, however, enter his protest against the statement made by the noble Marquess that the House of Lords as at present constituted did not and could not do its duty.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: What I said was, not that the House was not competent to do its duty, but that its Members did not attend to it.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that having been a Member of that House for a much longer period than his noble Friend, he thought he was justified in taking objection to the statement made. He was prepared to prove, from the Papers which had been laid upon their Lordships' Table, that the House had attended to its duty more assiduously during the last three or four years than had been the case during the previous 20 years.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY remarked that the proposal concerned most nearly those noble Lords who in the course of nature might expect to remain in that House the longest time. He thought that the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) had been more than severe in the strictures he had passed upon the noble Earl (Earl Granville) who had shown his attachment to the principle of the proposal on more than one occasion. His objection to the proposal was that it admitted a principle without carrying it to its legitimate conclusion, for it admitted the principle, he would not say of life or official Peers, but of personal as opposed to hereditary Peers, but did little or nothing to carry it out. Then while it admitted English Judges it did nothing for Scotch. Yet on no one point was the evidence before the Select Committee of last year more unanimous than on the necessity of some Scotch legal representative in this House, not for judicial purposes so much as to conduct legal measures. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Colonsay) was only a happy accident. As regarded personal Peers the present proposal did not go so far as that of 1869. That Bill met with almost universal acceptance; it had hardly any enemy, it could hardly be said to have fallen in battle, it was stifled under the cold embraces of its friends. Its debates consisted in haggling over the number of Peers to be admitted, whether 14, 21, or 28 in seven years. The importance of that point seemed to him always over-rated, when it was remembered that Mr. Pitt had in two years created 35 hereditary Peers, and he supposed, though he heard the phrase with surprise, that Mr. Pitt was the revolutionary statesman alluded to by the noble Marquess opposite. However, the present proposal was not revolutionary. It was strictly speaking a return to what were commonly called the ancient lines of the Constitution — a return to the old alliance between office and title which was the origin of the very nomenclature of our titles. However, that was a small point. He should vote with the noble Chairman of Committees not for his reason that the present proposal was distinctly not one for life Peerages, but for the directly opposite one, that it was voluntarily or involuntarily an admission and affirmation of the principle of personal Peerages.

LORD CAIRNS, in making a few observations on the subject, said, he should endeavour as far as possible to avoid introducing any matters likely to give rise to professional controversy. He was anxious to correct the statement that had fallen from the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) with reference to the course that was pursued with regard to the Bill of 1869. That Bill, having passed through Committee, stood for its third reading, when, notwithstanding the fact that Her Majesty's Government had always professed themselves favourable to the measure, a letter from one of the then Members of the Government was published in certain of the public journals, in which he ridiculed the measure as a "mere tinkering of the constitution of that House," and the result was, that the Bill was lost. A measure of that kind was, however, he thought, desirable, and he should be very glad to see one introduced to their Lordships' House, carefully considered, and with all the restrictions which attached to the former Bill. But the question which he had on the present occasion to ask himself was, whether he could support the Motion of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees. With the Motion he agreed to a great extent, so far as it went. He was at the same time unwilling to vote for it, because it only touched the mere fringe of the question; and in dealing simply with one point of it, might create the impression that the rest ought not to be dealt with. He was therefore unable to vote for the Motion, while he was prepared to consider the principle that some mode of introducing official persons, such as those named in it, into the House ought to be adopted. Under those circumstances, the best course, in his opinion, which he could pursue was to move the Previous Question, for voting on the question "Aye" or "No" would be likely to give rise to misapprehension. He should, therefore, conclude by moving the Previous Question.

LORD COLCHESTER, in supporting the Motion, said, he had in the year 1869 voted against the Bill of Earl Russell for the creation of life Peers, and should a measure of the same kind again be brought forward, he should still be prepared to oppose it. He could not but consider the creation of life Peerages at the discretion of the Minister of the day an invidious task in the hands of a scrupulous and conscientious Minister, and a dangerous power in the hands of a Minister less conscientious and less constitutional, who might use it with detriment to their Lordships' House. They rejoiced to see the right rev. Bench sitting among them by virtue of their office; but it might be regarded in a different light if a power existed in the Minister of the Crown to decide whether each right rev. Prelate should or should not sit for life in that House. He regarded, however, the proposal of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees connecting the life or official Peerage indissolubly with appointment to high and responsible functions, to great and important individual as well as collective duty, as resting on an entirely different basis, and if it could be practically done, maintaining the principle that the Peerage should necessarily—not at the option of the Executive—be united to office, he should be glad to see it extended to other professions than the legal. He should be glad to see the Governors of our great colonies necessarily sit in that House on their return, though it might be very objectionable to give a power of selection for creation as life Peers among all Governors of colonies, great or small, at the pleasure of an Administration. Therefore, while holding that a Chamber mainly or wholly composed of life Members, as in some foreign countries, was not only an undesirable, but one of the least desirable forms of an Upper Chamber, as being a mere reflex of the Executive—while deprecating the introduction of a life element as such into that House, he was prepared to support the plan of an ex officio Peerage as proposed, and should have great satisfaction in voting in its favour.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought the House would do well to accede to the suggestion which had been made by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) who moved the Previous Question. For his own part, he should be very glad to see persons holding the high offices named in the proposal under discussion occupying seats in that House, and he should therefore be very reluctant to vote against any Motion having that object. But he was, on the other hand, very strongly impressed with the feeling that it would be wholly impossible to stop at so limited an extension as was proposed of Peerages to persons not sitting as hereditary Peers, and he must say that frequent and repeated tentative legislation as to the constitution of that House would be a serious evil, not to say a serious danger. It seemed to him that there was no slight concurrence of opinion in favour of the introduction of life Peers under such restrictions as might prevent abuse; but it was manifestly a different proposal to create a certain number of ex officio Peers; and it was impossible to deny that there were beyond the lines of the legal profession classes of persons to whom reference had been already made, such as Governors of Colonies, or Ambassadors and high diplomatic servants of the Crown, to whom it might fairly be contended that the proposal of the noble Lord might with advantage be applied. Fit persons to occupy seats in their Lordships' House on a similar footing might be selected from all those categories, and also from the naval and military professions, and he was quite prepared to say that the legal profession had already, and was likely to have, its full share of the honours of the State, as compared with other professions. It would be a somewhat invidious thing therefore, to make an exceptional rule in its favour as was now suggested. If, however, they travelled beyond the legal profession, it would be found an exceedingly hard thing to find other offices held with that permanency of tenure and that independence which their Lordships would wish to see if life Peerages were to be attached to them. It would be a great mistake, he might add, to suppose that in adopting the Motion the House would be following the analogy of the case of the right rev. Bench, the historical origin of whose title to sit in that House was not ex officio but as Barons by tenure, because, like the mitred Abbots, who, before the suppression of Monasteries, also sat in Parliament, they held great ecclesiastical fiefs from the Crown. There was, indeed, a variety of questions which would require consideration before the question could be dealt with in the limited form now proposed, and the House would, therefore, he thought, act wisely in adopting the course which his noble and learned Friend had suggested.

EARL GREY said, he was also in favour of putting the Previous Question. He fully agreed that it would not be wise to divide on the Motion. The question was a very important one, and the more they considered it, the more they must see the necessity there was for a measure of the kind. He fully recognized the danger indicated by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that the power of creating life Peerages, unless it was carefully guarded, would be liable to abuse; but, on the other hand, there was no slight danger—and perhaps even a more formidable danger—of an abuse of the power of making hereditary Peerages. In the course of the present century, he thought that latter power had been abused with great detriment to that House. There was, he felt persuaded, a manifest deterioration in that Assembly as regarded the disposition to attend to business, and that evil might be traced in a great degree to the fact that the House had become much more numerous. That House, owing to its peculiar character, was not fitted to be a very numerous Assembly, and a state of things had been produced by the cause he had described, in which after a certain period of the evening, it was often almost impossible to discuss interesting questions as they ought to be discussed there. He believed the tendency to abuse the power of creating hereditary Peerages since the commencement of the century had been gradually increasing. Lord Palmerston, however, had shown a greater abstinence on that point than the Ministers by whom he had been followed, whether they sat on the one side or the other of the Houses of Parliament. Probably the best remedy against the abuse of the power of making hereditary Peers would be found in the adoption under proper safeguards of the principle of life Peerages. The decision at which their Lordships' House arrived in 1856 on that subject had been referred to. In his opinion, looking at the nature of our Constitution and Government, no Minister was entitled to advise the Crown, as was done in 1856, to bring forth from antiquity a Prerogative which had not been used for 300 years. The fact that that Prerogative had been so long in abeyance was, he maintained, an insurmountable bar to its being used without consulting Parliament; and if, instead of creating Lord Wensleydale a life Peer, the Government of the day had taken that House into its counsels, and had pointed out how great was the object to be attained, how useful it would be for the character and dignity of the House, and how much it would conduce to the convenience of the public—if the subject had been dealt with in that manner, and if an angry feeling had not been raised by what was thought an unwarrantable invasion of the rights and privileges of that House, he was persuaded there would have been no difficulty in arriving at an amicable solution of the question, and the ancient practice of creating life Peerages might have been revived under such conditions as would guard against abuse. But although mistakes were made in 1856, it was not too late to deal with the matter; and he hoped that both the Government and those who sat opposite to them, would take it into their consideration and endeavour to arrive at some mode of attaining an object which from the discussion of that evening it appeared they all desired.

LORD REDESDALE, in reply, said, that it was difficult to raise the question in any other way than that which he had suggested; and in any proposition for creating life Peerages which might be made, the high legal offices referred to in his Motion ought to be clearly provided for. His proposal was free from any objection, and was an entirely constitutional mode of treating the subject. He had carefully avoided making that a party question, resting his Motion solely on the ground of what was best for the interests of that House and of the public. He had heard with considerable regret the remark of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary to the effect that if the Motion for an Address to the Crown were adopted it would receive an unfavourable answer. That, he thought, was not a proper method of meeting such a proposal. If the House expressed an opinion that it was desirable that Prerogative should be exercised in a particular manner, it would be most unfortunate if the answer of the Crown should be one which amounted in fact to telling the House to mind its own business. He was now very much in the hands of the House; but he thought their Lordships need not fear that it would meet with a response distasteful to them, although it might convey little or nothing to the House. He regretted that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) had suggested that the Question should not be put. It was to be regretted, he thought, that when a question of this sort had been brought before their Lordships, they should not express an opinion upon it. He was, however, entirely in the hands of the House, and if their Lordships thought they should go to a division, he should certainly prefer that course.

EARL GRANVILLE, in explanation, said, that the noble Lord had misinterpreted a portion of his (Earl Granville's) speech to which reference had been made in the noble Lord's reply.

A Question being stated thereupon, the Previous Question was put, "Whether the said Question shall be now put?"

Resolved in the negative.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had not called for a division lest the question might appear to have assumed a party character. He believed a considerable number of noble Lords would have voted with him; but under the circumstances their Lordships would probably think that he was exercising a wise discretion in refraining from asking the House to divide.

ALKALI ACT (1863)—PETITION FOR AMENDMENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD RAVENSWORTH, in rising to call attention to the defective provisions of the Alkali Act, and to present a Petition, numerously signed, upon the subject, said, that the Act was passed in the year 1863, and that its object was to diminish the quantity of noxious vapours passing from chemical works into the atmosphere, and especially to cause an effectual condensation of muriatic acid gas. This subject was one of very great importance; it affected the comfort and the health of a large portion of the community. Although there had been no public demonstration respecting the question, and no great public meeting had given expression to the grievances which those he represented complained of; yet he could inform their Lordships that within eight or ten days a Petition on the subject had received the signatures of some 500 gentlemen of high standing. Those parties complained of the defective provisions of the Alkali Act, and of the destructive effects upon public health and property which had been the result. They complained that the Act was not alone inadequate, but that matters were even worse than they were before its passing in 1863. Indeed, it appeared from the Reports of the Inspector appointed by the Board of Trade, and also from the result of an inquiry conducted with the sanction of the Board on the subject, that the mischief resulting to vegetation, and, consequently, to the health of the people, from the noxious gases generated in alkali and other works, had not been at all lessened since the passing of the Act. Of his own knowledge, speaking of the district of Tyneside between Newcastle and Shields he could say that so far from relief being afforded by the provisions of the Act, the mischief created was now ten times greater than it was before the Act passed. No one could read the last Report of the Inspector, that for 1871, which had been presented to Parliament, without arriving at the conclusion that the statute was inadequate to meet the existing evil. It appeared that the acids of sulphur, the most injurious of all, were totally untouched by the present Act, and the Inspector gave it as his opinion that it would be desirable to have a special inquiry into that subject. The Inspector stated that many complaints had been made to him of continued injury from deleterious vapours; but he believed that a great part of the injury was not done by muriatic acid, but by the sulphurous acids evolved from some of those works. Those acids were given out in great abundance, they were destructive to health and vegetation; and for a mile or two, and often more if the wind set in a particular direction, much damage was done, and the neighbourhood rendered almost uninhabitable. The sulphuric acid gas infected all the moisture in the air, and the most deleterious effect to health was the result. When the Government Inspector pronounced the present law to be defective, surely it was not too much to ask for the attention and assistance of the Government in supplying the defects of the existing Act. With regard to the nature of the remedy he would say that having, when in the other House, represented the two northern counties, he was not in favour of violent measures. The question was not one without difficulty; but the parties who suffered from these noxious vapours ought to have the power of obtaining redress. He appealed, therefore, to the Government to take into consideration what these remedial measures should be; but some means of diminishing the amount of sulphuric acids evolved from these works might certainly be devised without injury to the manufacturer. One suggestion was, that the Poor Law officers should give relief to sufferers from such works, and that they should have power to compel the offending parties to refund the money. He trusted that he had said enough to call the attention of the Government and the country to the evils that existed and the necessity of supplementing the existing law, so as to enable the Inspectors to deal with them.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he could bear testimony to the general accuracy of the statements of his noble Friend. In the neighbourhood of alkali works, trees were killed or stunted, and crops and vegetation generally were injured. With regard to the residents in the neighbourhood these vapours were destructive to comfort, and, as he believed, injurious to health. All this inconvenience was at a maximum within a radius of two or three miles of such works; but it was within his own knowledge that near St. Helens, in the direction in which the wind habitually blew, residences were made untenable at a greater distance—say four miles when the wind set directly in that direction. He by no means wished to be understood as saying that the Inspectors under the Act passed ten years ago had failed in their duty. He believed that the Inspectors did the utmost that the law enabled them to do, and the only means of meeting the evil pointed out was by increasing the powers with which they were armed. The Act only enabled them to deal with one particular noxious vapour—muriatic acid—and there was not only reason to believe that a good deal more of that gas escaped than was contemplated when the Act passed, but that other and still more destructive vapours were also set free to the injury of the neighbourhood. It might be asked why they did not prosecute for these nuisances. If these offensive gases came from one work there would be no difficulty in the matter, but where there were a number of works, by reason of their very number it was impossible to fix the responsibility on any one of them. Speaking as a resident in a part of the country which was subject to these annoyances, and whose health not unfrequently suffered from them, he ventured to say that a case had been made out which deserved the attention of the Government.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY remarked that in the north of Cheshire sulphuric acid was usually allowed to escape only in the night time. He would join in the desire for urgency in the preparation of a remedial measure upon the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, the late Lord Derby brought this subject under the consideration of the House in 1862, the consequence being that the Bill of 1863 was passed. That measure, as the noble Lord had explained, dealt only with the case of muriatic acid gas, but it undoubtedly appeared from the reports of the Inspector appointed under the Act that there were a number of other gases of a deleterious character which were deliberately excluded from the operation of the Act. It was necessary to legislate on this subject with extreme caution. The attention of his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board had been already directed to the subject, and he had given instructions for an inquiry into it. At present it would be premature to say what might be the best mode of remedying the evil, but he confessed that, speaking for himself alone, he entertained considerable doubt as to the advisability of carrying out the proposal made by Earl Grey to the Select Committee of 1862. The subject would, however, receive careful consideration on the part of Her Majesty's Government during the Recess.

SCOTCH AND IRISH PEERAGE.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD INCHQUIN in moving, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Returns of the present state of the Irish and Scotch Peerage, showing what Peerages have become extinct since the union of those countries with England, and what extinct peerages are now represented by inferior titles; the number of Scotch and Irish Peers without seats in Parliament; and the roll of English, United Kingdom, Scotch, and Irish Peerages at the respective dates of union, and at the present time; also, the number of Irish Peerages created since the Union, and the number of British Peerages conferred on Irish and Scotch Peers, and the years in which they were granted, said, he was induced to make his Motion in order that he might be able, at an early period next Session, to bring under their Lordships' notice the exceedingly anomalous and unsatisfactory position of the Scotch and Irish Peers, with a view to the removal of the disabilities under which they laboured.

Motion agreed to.

LAW AGENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 163.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that as it had already passed through the other House he did not suppose it was necessary for him to enter into the subject at any great length. As probably some of their Lordships were aware, the Bill was framed mainly upon the recommendations of the Law Commission of Scotland of 1868. At the present moment there were many peculiarities connected with the office of law agents, and their qualifications were not set down as clearly and as satisfactorily as they might be. The Commissioners accordingly recommended that whereas there then existed in Scotland various monopolies and special privileges of different corporations admitting law agents to practise, such monopolies should be abolished; that there should be one general examination and system of admission for the whole of Scotland; that anyone passing such examination should be entitled to practise in all the inferior Courts; and that anyone who passed a further examination should be admitted in the Supreme Courts. This Bill proposed to follow these recommendations, and, so far as related to the admission of law agents to practise, it would abolish all exclusive privileges. The simple object of the Bill was to create a uniform system of law agency all over Scotland. There might possibly be some matters of detail in the Bill which would give rise to discussion; but he did not know that the principle and main object involved would cause any difference of opinion. It had, in the main, received the approval of the legal profession in Scotland, although, as might have been expected, some of the privileged corporations objected to it.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD COLONSAY said, that various representations had been made to him respecting the measure. Some of them were to a great extent favourable; but many of them were quite the reverse. The object of the Bill he himself fully approved; but he feared that the manner in which it was proposed to carry out the object would not be fair to existing interests, and particularly to existing law societies. The recommendations of the Law Commission were very good, but, if he mistook not, they were exceeded in the Bill. He considered that in any alteration in the law which might be considered desirable, existing interests should be respected as far as possible. He did not see that that was done in the present Bill, and he should therefore reserve to himself the right to propose any Amendment which he thought proper. The last clause of the Bill—that which proposed to repeal the Procurators (Scotland) Act of 1865—was, he considered, open to much objection. However, in the present stage of the Bill, he should throw no obstruction in its way.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he concurred with all that had been said by the noble and learned Lord who had just sat down. He believed he was right in saying that there was a general feeling of dissatisfaction in Scotland with regard to the Bill—not with regard to its object, but with regard to the manner it was proposed to deal with some of the legal bodies most deeply interested in the subject. So far as the general principle of the Bill was concerned it was well enough. A gentleman well competent to speak on behalf of the legal opinion of Scotland, had sent him a letter in which he said that the passing of the Bill in its present form would be, in the opinion both of the Bench and the Bar of Scotland, highly injurious to those legal societies to which the noble and learned Lord had referred. It was an important question whether the Bill would benefit or injure such a body of persons as, for instance, the Writers to the Signet. If the Bill only lowered the status of those persons, it would, of course, be an injury to them, and it would also, he believed, be an injury to the public. It would be well to see, then, what was really proposed before agreeing to such a measure as that. He therefore was ready to support any Amendments which his noble and learned Friend thought would preserve the position and the character of those persons. Then there was the manner in which it was proposed to deal with the procurators. He considered that that was open to much question. There was, besides, the question of the Incorporated Societies. He believed that dealing with them was an after-thought. Such a clause was not in the Bill of 1872. If it was not thought proper to make such a proposition in 1872, he should like to know why it was proposed now. He considered that the clause should be as follows:—

"From and after the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, the Procurators (Scotland) Act (1865) shall be and the same is hereby repealed, but such repeal shall not prevent societies formed under the said Act from continuing to act as incorporated societies, and electing such office-bearers as they please, and admitting members on such terms as they see fit, provided always that it shall not be necessary for any agent admitted under this Act to become a member of any such society."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that all these things were matters of detail, which he hoped could be satisfactorily dealt with in Committee. The framers of the Bill were between two fires, because while one side urged that special interests should be respected, others urged that no privileges should be given to one body over another. He did not, however, think that these conflicting views need in any way interfere with the passing of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

CONVENTUAL AND MONASTIC INSTITUTIONS BILL.—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. WHALLEY begged to call the attention of the House to a subject somewhat personal to himself, and in doing so regretted the absence of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. McCarthy Downing), to whom it applied. That hon. and learned Gentleman on a recent occasion, in alluding to him, said that inasmuch as he had been brought before the Court of Queen's Bench for contempt of Court, and in a letter to one of the morning journals commented unfairly on the evidence, and imputed unworthy motives—

MR. BOWRING rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman introduced topics with which the House had nothing whatever to do.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was out of Order in referring to what had occurred in a debate during the present Session; but it was usual in cases like the present, where personal explanations became necessary, to grant considerable latitude. He must, however, remind the hon. Member that whatever might be the explanation required, the hon. and learned Gentleman to whom reference was made ought to be in his place.

FRANCE—TREATY OF COMMERCE, 1872.
QUESTION.

MR. MIALI asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, if the Treaty of Commerce with France, signed on the 5th November 1872, is not to be ratified, Her Majesty's Government will urge a permanent most favoured nation article, which shall effectually prevent the state of uncertainty which at present exists, as to the future of our commercial relations with France; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will urge the introduction of such improvements in the management of the French Customs, with reference to expertise and classification of goods, as were agreed upon in Paris between the Commissioners appointed by their respective Governments?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the Treaty of the 5th November last was referred, on the recent change of Government in France, to the Conseil Supérieur du Commerce de l'Agriculture et de l'Industrie, and until the Conseil makes its Report, which is shortly expected, no formal negotiations on the subject of the Treaty can be entered into; but the two Governments are exchanging unofficial communications, which it is to be hoped may facilitate the attainment of an arrangement satisfactory to both countries. It would be premature to state the nature of those communications; but the House may rest assured that the interests of British commerce, both as regards commerce generally and as regards the details of such matters as expertise and classification of goods, will be carefully watched over by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, who has full instructions for his guidance, and by whom the negotiation will be conducted.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CHIPPING NORTON MAGISTRATES.

QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to his remarks in answer to a question on June 6th, upon the conduct of the two justices of Chipping Norton for sending certain women to prison for an offence which he admitted was fully proved, with no evidence for the defence, under the provisions of an Act quoted, upon what authority he then stated

"That those justices, instead of sending the women to prison, ought either to have bound them over in their own recognizances to appear and submit to the sentence, when called on, or that it would have been quite competent for the magistrates, on the evidence before them, to convict those who had taken the most active part in the disturbance for an assault, and to fine them, enforcing the fine, if necessary, by imprisonment;”

and, as he further added,

“that neither of those courses appeared to have occurred to the magistrates, and the case did seem to show a very grave want of discretion,” whether he is prepared to state that either of those courses suggested by him would have been in conformity with the Law?

MR. COBBETT asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman did not think it would be well to order that the depositions taken before the magistrates and the summonses should be laid before the House, in order that it might form an opinion for itself on the whole merits of the case?

MR. BRUCE: I believe, Sir, that either of the courses referred to in the Question of the hon. Baronet, as also a third course—namely, the absolute dismissal of the case against some of the women charged—would have been within the competency of the magistrates. I did not make my statement on this subject without consulting one of the most eminent and experienced of the London Police Magistrates as to the Law, and as to the practice of the Magistrates in similar cases. Nothing is more common than to dismiss with a warning from the Bench persons charged with slight offences, or even less prominent participants in graver offences, although legally subject to punishment; and the practice of binding prisoners to appear on their own recognizances to receive sentence when called upon to do so is one frequently resorted to in the higher Courts of Justice, and occasionally by justices of the peace. The substitution of the charge of assault for a graver charge would be also within the competency of a magistrate to recommend. But when that is done the prisoner must, of course, be allowed the opportunity of rebutting by evidence the substituted charge. A large power is given to magistrates in the exercise of their functions, and I am bound to say they use it with great discretion and humanity. If they availed themselves of every opportunity they had to punish offenders, the country would require double the number of prisons it now possesses. It is a very serious thing to send a person to prison, and the magistrates, I am happy to know, exercise a wise and sound discretion in these matters. In reply to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett), I may say that in the Correspondence which has been moved for, the evidence that was taken will be found. Magistrates do not take the evidence in summary cases with the same accuracy with which they take the evidence in cases to be sent for trial, but the Correspondence that took place between the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Lieutenant of Oxfordshire contains the most correct version of it, and will be very shortly laid on the Table of the House.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON wished to know, If the right hon. Gentleman's attention had been called to two cases, in which it had been held that the magistrates had no such power of convicting for one offence a person summoned for another, as the right hon. Gentleman had suggested?

MR. BRUCE said, he had no doubt those cases perfectly represented the law; but he was informed, on good authority, that it was perfectly legal for the magistrates to dismiss a summons, and then to proceed upon another charge.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON gave Notice that he would bring the subject forward again, for the purpose of having it debated.

In reply to Mr. BOWRING,

MR. BRUCE said, he should prefer not to say what was the Lord Chancellor's decision upon the case until the Papers were before the House.

BOSNIA—ALLEGED OUTBREAK OF MOSLEM FANATICISM.—QUESTION.

MR. A. JOHNSTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What information has been received by Her Majesty's Government as to outbreaks of Moslem fanaticism in Bosnia; and, whether they contemplate any representations on the subject to the Sublime Porte, in concert with other Christian Powers?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: No information has been received at the Foreign Office, either officially or otherwise, as to outbreaks of Moslem fanaticism in Bosnia, and the latest despatches of Her Majesty's Consul at Bosna Serai make no mention of any such circumstance.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL—[Lords]—[BILL 154.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 3rd July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 18 (Power to transfer jurisdiction of Judicial Committee by Order in Council).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he wished to take that opportunity of giving some explanation with respect to a remark of his which had been the subject of some misunderstanding. In moving the second reading of the Bill, a statement of his as to the Judges occasionally reversing each other's decisions in the Court of Exchequer Chamber had given annoyance to some of those learned persons. Though he did not withdraw his statement, he begged to say that when he made it, he did not carry in his mind any living Judge.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving as an Amendment, in page 9, line 36, to leave out from "Council," to "thereto," in line 37, said, he wished to bring before the Committee a subject which was of supreme importance, and which well deserved the consideration of the House. It was one upon which a large number of hon. Members on his side of the House took a deep interest, for they were convinced the reform would be one that would be appreciated. By the section now before the Committee it was provided that Her Majesty might direct that all appeals whatever to Her Majesty in Council "except appeals from any Ecclesiastical Court and Petitions relating thereto," should be referred to the tribunal of Final Appeal, which this Bill proposed to constitute. He wished that the words he had quoted should be omitted, and that the great Court of Final Appeal should decide on all the appeals of the country, so that there should be one tribunal for all. At first Ireland and Scotland were excepted, because it was thought desirable not to overweight the Bill, and it was considered doubtful whether this House would accept the proposal to include them. But the House had shown itself willing to include Ireland and Scotland, and he now asked the Committee to include ecclesiastical cases also, and not to leave them to a separate tribunal, which would be weakened by the Bill, and would grow weaker and weaker as business was withdrawn from it. It could not be denied that the questions on which ecclesiastical appeals were raised were questions, not of altering the law of the Church or its doctrines, but of the construction of documents and contracts, and other matters which legal minds were peculiarly calculated to decide upon, and it gave an impression at present that it was rather a Court of Heresy than a Court of Law when there were ecclesiastical persons sitting upon the tribunal, and that cases were decided rather by a theological bias than by a strict interpretation of the documents before it. He had received letters from the clergy urging that the Amendment of which he had given Notice should be carried, and the Lower House of Convocation, which some might not give weight to as such, yet as a body of clergymen of great importance, had signified their desire that the final appeal in ecclesiastical cases should be given to the Final Court of Appeal for all other causes. That showed that those who were most likely to be interested or implicated in the tribunal for dealing with ecclesiastical appeals wished that it should be a purely legal tribunal. He begged to assure the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government and the hon. and learned Attorney General that he did not make this proposal in order to hamper or impede the measure. He had accepted the proposal that there should be one Court of Final Appeal, and it was on that ground that he wished ecclesiastical cases also should be referred to it. The questions to be brought before these tribunals were of a strictly legal character, and ought to be dealt with solely by legal persons. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would be able to accept the suggestion he had made, for while he knew he could not hope to carry it against them, he knew also that there was a vast number of people both in that House and out-of-doors who would be glad to see the Court of Appeal one and final. He therefore hoped they would give it their most serious consideration, and moved to omit from the clause the words which excepted ecclesiastical cases from the jurisdiction of the new Court of Appeal.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT supported the Amendment. There was great difference of opinion on both sides of the House as to the point of view in which these ecclesiastical questions were to be regarded, but the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) was one upon which persons of different opinions might come to the same conclusion. The questions to be raised were legal points of status and property established by statutory and legal authority, and they ought to be discussed by a strictly legal tribunal. In the present Appellate Court, the functions of Convocation were mixed up with those of a Court of Common Law, and apart from that, there frequently arose difficulty in constituting a Court under existing circumstances, and these difficulties would be removed and diminished if the whole of the appeals were appointed to be determined by the same tribunal. The existing state of things was extremely inconvenient, for he remembered that in the Voysey case, when the Archbishop of Canterbury was ill, the Archbishop of York unable to sit, and some objection was taken to the Bishop of London being upon the tribunal, that tribunal could not have been constituted at all if the Archbishop of Canterbury had not got better.

Dr. BALL also supported the Amendment, the operation of which was not analogous to the transfer of the Equity and Common Law Appeals to the Courts proposed to be constituted by the Bill. It was intended that in those cases which had been heretofore heard in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Judges should still continue to report to Her Majesty, and all Orders would be made by Her Majesty in Council. If the Order was made in ecclesiastical cases by the Judges, and not by the Queen, a serious question might be raised as to the supremacy of the law in Church questions, and as to the connection of Church and State; but as the circumstances were so different, and the Judges in such cases merely acted as the advisers of Her Majesty, there was no reason why they should not sit in the New Court of Appeal instead of in a room at the Privy Council Office. The fact of transferring the jurisdiction was entirely separate from the question of the conditions on which the transfer should be made, and the provisions which should be introduced with regard to the jurisdiction of the new tribunal. That was a question with regard to which not merely individual opinion but general opinion was to be considered. But the transfer of jurisdiction would by no means decide the question as to whether any of the Bishops should sit upon the hearing of ecclesiastical appeals. He did not think the jurisdiction of the Privy Council could be kept up; because when all but ecclesiastical cases were taken from it, there would be no object in introducing into the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council men who were eminent for their general knowledge of the law, and for their capacity to deal with legal questions. Seeing that the proposition made met with the approval of the clergy, and that the Lower House of Convocation desired such a tribunal, he should give the Amendment of his right hon. Friend his cordial support.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN supported the Amendment. He was very glad to find that on an ecclesiastical question he was in perfect accordance with the opinions expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy) a luxury which he could not often allow himself. Nothing could be more imperfect than the present appellate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical affairs. The only argument he had heard against the Amendment was that lawyers were not theologians; but neither were lawyers merchants or bankers. As well might it be urged that a Judge should not try a case of petty larceny unless he were himself a thief. The yoking together of Bishops and Judges on a judicial tribunal reminded him somewhat of the yoking together of those two useful animals whose acting in concert in that way was forbidden by the Levitical law. Without going so far as the late Mr. Justice Maule who had laid it down that to be a good Judge a man ought to have neither politics nor religion, he thought that many of the qualities which would go to make a good Bishop would make a bad Judge; and, certainly, the last cases that Bishops should be empowered to try were those which affected the clergy. The constitution of the Court would also be even more unsatisfactory for the future, because the four Judges who had recently been appointed to the Privy Council would now be transferred to the Supreme Court.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS observed that it was the birthright of every layman in this country, that the doctrines of the Church were laid down in certain documents which were binding upon the clergy, and the clergy were entitled to have these documents construed according to strict rules of law. He should, therefore, support the Amendment, and he wished to call attention to this—that in making the change it was absolutely necessary that it should be done in such a way that it should be properly done, and that at the same time the clergy should be satisfied. To satisfy the clergy, it should be provided that whilst the interpretation of the documents to which he had referred rested with the Appellate Court, that Court should not have power to pronounce judgment upon what had passed, but that this proceeding should be left to the Ecclesiastical Court below, in order that the latter might pass sentence. He believed that such a mode of proceeding would tend much to smooth the matter over.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE trusted that the Government would look with favour upon the Amendment; because, from a considerable knowledge of the clergy, he believed that there was a growing feeling in favour of some such an alteration in reference to the Court of Appeal in Church cases. The free way in which the Press and society criticized its judgments, so different from the respectful treatment with which the decisions of other Courts were received, proved that its constitution was defective. The combination of two very different classes of minds in the Judicial Committee was really very injurious both to theology and to law. The qualities that made a good Bishop would not tend to make a good Judge; for the very earnestness of character that formed the good Prelate was alien to the cold, impassive, judicial mind. The present Judicial Committee had many of the vices that characterized the old Court of Delegates which it replaced. Like that it was not a fixed Court, with a fixed number of Judges known beforehand. He hoped that the Government would attempt to define the procedure of the Supreme Court in ecclesiastical matters. When judgment was given, we did not get the whole mind of the members of the Ecclesiastical Court. However divergent their private opinions might be, the report of the Crown assumed that they were unanimous, so that the system might be called a gigantic specimen of "knock out." The Report selected merely the points on which the members of the Court might, by hook or by crook, agree. It was, in fact, a mere residuum left after boiling down the various opinions of the members of the Court, and did not command the immediate and spontaneous respect which other judgments did.

Mr. WHITWELL joined in the wish that the Amendment might have the assent of the Government, for the question was one which could not be allowed much longer to continue in the condition in which it now was.

Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE said, that for the reasons which had been given by his two right hon. Friends, it seemed to him that it would be absolutely necessary that they should include among the subjects of appeal to the Supreme Court those which were referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If they continued to refer such questions to an inferior tribunal to that which decided other appeals, the same weight would not be given to decisions in one case as in the other. No doubt, it would be necessary to consider in Church appeals what Court should ultimately be required to act on the sentence or decree, and it might be necessary to refer any such cause back to the Court which was originally constituted to deal with it. He would not argue the matter now, though he believed it to be a matter of very great importance, in reference to the welfare of the country and of the Church itself—first, that the tribunal to decide on appeal should be simply a judicial tribunal; and secondly, that the people of this country should know and feel that it was so. He believed that the decisions of such a tribunal would not lead to that confusion and disappointment in the minds of men which some decisions had lately given rise to, because it was imagined, very erroneously that they had been determining questions of doctrine. He hoped that the Government would take this matter into their careful consideration.

Mr. CAWLEY hoped the Amendment would be adopted. If an Appellate Court of the highest character had to deal with these questions, it would go a great way, leading to that reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts of an inferior kind which he was so anxious to see carried out.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, it was impossible not to be struck by the very remarkable unanimity of opinion which this Amendment had elicited from hon. Gentlemen whom on ordinary occasions he should expect to see down the two columns of a list of pairs. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) was so kind as to inform him last night that he intended to raise the question, and he then told him that he had every disposition to bring it under the consideration of his Colleagues; but he should be reluctant to introduce any change immediately into the clauses of this Bill, unless there should appear to be very strong grounds for making such a change. He also desired to have an opportunity of making the matter known to those Prelates who were immediately concerned in the decision of the question, and of obtaining their opinions. He attached great weight to the very remarkable concurrence of opinion on both sides of the House—he might almost assume, after what he had heard that day, that there was absolutely no difference of opinion on the subject. He had already taken the opportunity of consulting his own Colleagues, and this was not the first time that the question had come before them. Indeed, his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor had stated “in another place,” that his reason for being disinclined to assent to the proposal then made was the apprehension of charging the Bill with an excess of materials. He was sorry it was not in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to give a longer Notice of his intention; at the same time, he would not give the expression of his regret the form of animadversion. No doubt the acceptance of the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had induced the question, and it was necessary for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University to consider the ground well before he committed himself to any declaration on the subject. He did not think that it would be possible upon the merits to maintain the present Court. It was so framed that there was great difficulty in constituting the tribunal, and it was incessantly shifting its component parts. The same Judges did not always sit to try questions of this kind, and there was the suspicion that theological bias would creep into purely legal questions. And, lastly, the fact that it delivered its judgments collectively, so that we had no knowledge of the opinions of its separate Members, whatever were the merits or demerits of the system, was one which was entirely out of analogy with the rest of our judicial tribunals. The sentences, too, were usually pronounced by the Members of the Court respectively, and not by one member of the Court as an integral body. These were general considerations applicable to the constitution and working of the a Court before this Bill; but as had been observed, the introduction of the present measure virtually altered the position of that Court, and the question was whether they should retain that single rag of an isolated jurisdiction which the Court might not be called upon to exercise once in seven years. Although there had been a considerable crop of ecclesiastical suits and judgments lately, yet the result had not been of such a character as to give great encouragement to the multiplication of such suits hereafter. Therefore, taking a practical view of the matter, it would appear rather hard upon the public, when they had long ago come to the conclusion not to vote one shilling for purposes purely denominational, unless there was something very important beyond that mere consideration, that the paraphernalia of a Court and the charges for its officers should be kept up by funds from the Exchequer, simply on the chance that from time to time some ecclesiastical suit might crop up, with which this semi-animate Court might be called upon to deal. If they could refer the decision of these questions to the Appellate Court they would carry them to a Court which was wholly discharged from all consideration of the religious persuasion of its Judges. To some persons it might be an objection to the transfer of the business of the Ecclesiastical Court to the Court of Final Appeal, that only Judges who had received a peculiar training could deal with religious questions; but his opinion was, that men of honesty and integrity and legal competency, who had not received any peculiar training with reference to religious questions, would be well fitted to deal with ecclesiastical suits. If the Judges were men of perfect, upright minds and legal capacity, they would themselves best know how to define the limits of their own action, and how to mark the point at which they should regard the technical knowledge that was required, and then call in extraneous aid to their relief. He, for one, was ready cheerfully to commit to those Judges of the Appeal Court the decision of those questions, wholly irrespective of any question that might hereafter arise connected with the religious persuasion of this or that particular member of the Court. He thought that they should commit a great error if they were to attempt to secure even a shadow of religious conformity on the part of the Members of the Court, or to attempt anything in the nature of a test which would throw upon those Judges a character other than that of Judges. The question really was, whether it was the desire of the House that they should proceed in the matter by at once accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The Motion of the right hon. Gentleman was before them, and considering the extraordinary concurrence of opinion with which it had been received from so many considerable authorities—from persons of diversified views; and considering also that the Government could not see any serious difficulties in the matter—considering, too, the convenience of business, and that the other House would retain its independent action on the subject—he (Mr. Gladstone) did not feel himself justified in pressing for the withdrawal of the Amendment. He should, therefore, allow himself the satisfaction of concurring in what was so generally thought to be an improvement in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT hoped that, before the clause was passed, the hon. and learned Attorney General would tell the Committee something on a point which had not yet been raised, but which was extremely important with reference to Appellate Jurisdiction. It had been referred to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope). It had been the habit of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical cases, and, he believed, in all other cases, to give a unanimous judgment—that was to say, the judgment of the majority of the Judicial Committee was given. But the hon. Gentleman suggested that in the case of a conflict of opinion each of the Judges in the proposed Court of Appeal should give the reasons of his judgment. In that suggestion he (Mr. Vernon Harcourt) did not concur. He thought that in this Court of Final Appeal, the judgments should appear to be the unanimous judgment of the Court, and that it would not be advantageous in the case of a conflict of opinion between the Judges to have conflicting opinions of the Judges laid before the public. He did not wish to have this question settled now; but before the Bill left that House the question should be settled one way or the other.

Mr. BOURKE said, that although it was too late to oppose the passing of the clause he could not omit taking that opportunity of entering his protest against the transfer of the jurisdiction of the Privy Council to the New Court of Appeal. It would be a transfer not only to the New Court of Appeal, but a transfer to a Division of that Court; and he believed that the Colonies and India were quite satisfied with the way in which the Judicial Committee dealt with their appeals, and the proposition to transfer their Appeals to the New Court of Final Appeal would cause great dissatisfaction there. The Division of the Court of Appeal would not have the same authority that the Privy Council had, and he warned the Committee that the change would be disadvantageous to the litigants.

Mr. MACFIE said, he did not think there was any ground for the apprehensions which the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke) appeared to entertain with regard to the effect of this part of the Bill on our fellow-subjects in the colonies. The clause was not compulsory or mandatory, but merely permissive; and he felt sure it would never be put in force when either colonial or Indian appellants objected to the transfer of the jurisdiction.

Mr. WHALLEY observed that our system of law was essentially a system based, not on technical rules, but on common sense, and considered that it would be a fatal step to subvert the jurisdiction of the Privy Council and the House of Lords, by which that system was so well represented.

MR. GORDON joined with the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke) in protesting against the transfer of Privy Council cases to the High Court of Appeal.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 19 (Transfer of pending business); and Clause 20 (Rules as to exercise of jurisdiction) agreed to.

Clause 21 (Law and equity to be concurrently administered).

On the Motion of Sir FRANCIS GOLD-SMID, Amendment made, by inserting in page 12, line 29, before "in," the words "relating to or connected with the original subject of the cause or matter, and."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Rules of law upon certain points).

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL proposed an Amendment whereby the proposed alterations of the law would not be confined to the High Court of Justice and Court of Appeal respectively, but would be extended to all England, stating that if it was thought necessary words could be introduced, on the recommitment of the Bill, applying it to Ireland.

DR. BALL, in opposing the Amendment, called the attention of the Committee to the state of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts of England and Ireland, and in pointing out how differently it operated, said it was a strange thing that in two countries, separated only by a sail of four hours, vis à Holyhead, the lines of administration of the law relating to Admiralty jurisdiction, in matters of collisions between foreign vessels, were not governed by the same rules. In illustration of that, he mentioned a case of collision in the Pacific Ocean between a Swedish and an American vessel. One of those vessels arrived in Cork, which gave jurisdiction to the Irish Court of Admiralty. The Court pronounced its decision, after having heard the arguments of counsel, awarding damages; but had the ship arrived in an English port instead of an Irish one, the English Court of Admiralty would have divided the damages, in its decision, between the litigating parties. Should the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General be adopted, he hoped steps would be taken on the next stage of the Bill to extend its operation to Ireland, so that the administration of the law should be the same in the two countries.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MATTHEWS moved, in page 14, line 34, to leave out sub-section 2, providing that no claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee for any property held on an express trust shall be held to be barred by any Statute of Limitations. The sub-section imperfectly stated the doctrine of the Court of Equity, and it spoiled it in stating it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the sub-section made no alteration in the law. The words, which were not his, had been very carefully considered, and were designed merely to express the law as it stood.

DR. BALL said, he accepted the view of the hon. and learned Solicitor General that the clause did not make any change, and, therefore, he had not put down an Amendment; but the law worked great injustice in some cases of express trusts on mere incumbrances, which ought to be excepted from the rule that interest might be recovered on demand.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN accepted the clause as declaring the law, but thought the specific mention of special trusts weakened the general clause at the end of the Bill. If his hon. and learned Friend who moved that the clause be struck out went to a division he would give his vote in support of the Motion. He doubted, however, the advantage of doing so, for on a division the opinions of hon. Members who understood the subject were swamped by the votes of Gentlemen who had not heard a word of the discussion, and knew no more of the merits of the Amendment than the most ordinary persons who might be called in out of the streets.

MR. HINDE PALMER thought it useful to have a distinct point of law specifically laid down, notwithstanding the general clause at the end; but he thought the interpretation clause ought to define an express trust. The position of trustees was by no means an enviable one. If the clause was intended to make trustees more indefinitely liable than at present, he would propose its omission;

but its object appeared to be to leave the law much where it was at present.

MR. GREGORY said, the clause would be prejudicial in its operation.

MR. T. HUGHES thought that the wording of the sub-section was open to misconstruction, and that the sub-section was unnecessary.

MR. WHALLEY said, the Bill now before the Committee was a measure brought forward by the Government professedly to establish a Supreme Court of Judicature; yet it was a Bill that would not only alter the law, but would alter it in the most absurd and unsatisfactory manner. No more dangerous course than Her Majesty's Government were now trying to establish could possibly be. Where, he asked, did their authority for introducing such a Bill come from? They had abolished the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal; and with regard to the clause under discussion, no lawyer could understand it, and he was sure he could not understand a word of it. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had said truly that large bodies of hon. Members voted on Amendments about which they knew no more than the most ordinary persons in the streets, and in that he (Mr. Whalley) entirely agreed. Those hon. Members, when divisions were called for in the evening, rushed in from the dining-room and voted with their party. Not since the 14th century had so bold an attempt been made to supersede the Common Law of England. They abolished the House of Lords, and now they were aiming to supersede the Common Law—the greatest protection of the rights and liberties of the people; and in all matters of difference between it and equity to rule that equity should prevail. He felt in a state of trepidation, alarm, and anxiety on the objects of the proposal.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT opposed the sub-section as wholly unnecessary. It reminded him of the old story of making a large hole for the cat and a small one for the kitten. If there was no alteration of the law intended to be made by the sub-section, it was embraced in the general proposition that equity should prevail.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL held that the sub-section was necessary not to change, but to preserve the law. The question had been carefully considered by the highest authorities, and it was thought desirable to put in a special clause to declare that the abolition of Courts of Equity should not have the effect of depriving the administration of Equity of the valuable rule with reference to the Statute of Limitations not applying to express trusts.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY suggested that the sub-section should be omitted, and reliance placed on the general provisions of the 10th sub-section, as the former would probably give rise to doubts.

MR. AMPHLETT hoped the Government would not give them the trouble of dividing against the sub-section.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL thought the omission of the sub-section might be mischievous. It was sanctioned by a Committee which included men of the highest authority in the profession, and amongst them he would mention the names of Lord Hatherley and Lord Cairns, both of whom filled with distinction the high judicial office of Lord Chancellor.

Amendment negatived.

MR. GREGORY proposed, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 22, to leave out "Courts of Common Law," and insert "Court of Admiralty;" and in line 23, to leave out "High Court of Admiralty," and insert "Courts of Common Law." He thought the rule of the Admiralty should prevail especially as the same was the rule in all foreign Courts.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT supported the Amendment, as they ought, he thought, to guard against a conflict of law in respect to international matters.

DR. BALL thought neither rule ought to be retained, but that the Judge ought to be vested with a discretionary power to apportion the damage between them. He, however, preferred the Admiralty to the Common Law rule, and as it had been adopted by other countries, a power should be given to the Court to enforce it.

MR. JAMES said, he would vote for the Amendment, on the ground that it was desirable to maintain a rule of law which was well known to other countries.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS opposed the Amendment, as he preferred the Common Law rule to the proposed alteration.

MR. GORDON explained that the Scotch Courts acted on the Admiralty rule.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had been all along in favour of the Admiralty rule, but had yielded to the Lord Chancellor on the point. His own private opinion had always been in favour of the Admiralty rule; and as every member of the legal profession who had spoken, with the exception of the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Watkin Williams), had also expressed themselves in favour of it, he could not but assent to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of MR. HINDE PALMER, Amendment made in page 16, line 26, after "infants," by leaving out to and including "matter" in line 29.

On the Motion of MR. HINDE PALMER, the remainder of the sub-section was created into a separate sub-section.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 23 (Abolition of terms) agreed to.

Clause 24 (Vacations.)

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, in moving, as an Amendment, in line 10, to leave out, "upon any," to "hereinafter mentioned," in line 15, said, he had to bring before the Committee an unpopular subject, upon which he should probably have arrayed against him every member of his own profession in that House. But if the Bill were only to be framed in the interest and for the benefit of the lawyers, it would do extremely little for the cause of law reform. Up to the present moment, the Bill had done very little for the public, and everything that had been done had been accomplished for the lawyers. It had done very little to remove the long delays and the great expense of getting business transacted, which was the great object of having any Bill at all. One of the greatest difficulties of getting the law administered in that country, was the block of business, and the loss of judicial power consequent upon the fact that with reference to a great proportion of the business, it was altogether suspended for a third or fourth of the whole year. The judicial and administrative staff of the country was more expensive than all the public Departments of the State put together; and yet they kept all that plant and capital doing nothing for the period he had mentioned. When last he called attention to this subject his table was covered with letters from solicitors stating the hardships produced to individuals by the suspension of the administrative business of the Court of Chancery during the long vacation. These were some of the evils of the law which the Bill, in its present form, did nothing whatever to remedy, and he could not reconcile his mind to allowing it to pass without asking the House of Commons not to spend £1,500,000 on one of the most costly judicial systems in the world, and yet, practically speaking, to close the Courts against the public for so large a portion of the year. Therefore his Amendment was to leave out those words which made the alteration of the vacation dependent on the will of the Judges. He could see no fair excuse for the present system; and he thought it would be for the advantage of the public if it were put an end to. If there was to be no alteration in the vacation, except upon the report or recommendation of the Judges, it would never be shortened by a single day or hour. The clause authorized the alteration of the vacation, and that in itself amounted to an admission that the present system was not satisfactory. Of course, the Judges must have holidays; but surely, they might be worked in "shifts," like miners, so as to obviate the necessity of suspending the whole administration of the law for a considerable portion of the year. Perhaps it might be asked how the barristers could take their holidays if the Courts were constantly sitting. Well, barristers could easily take their holidays; but the truth was, that those who had control of the business were afraid lest in their absence other men should slip into their places. He had always noticed that somewhat inferior men who attended to business, did it almost as well as very superior men who did attend to it; and, considering that there were as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, he thought the public would gain by the change. The clause permitted the vacation to be modified, but it contained a Proviso, that that should only be done on the report or recommendation of the Judges, of the present day represented a lower amount of remuneration than in former times, and that the dissatisfaction felt on that ground was well founded. Under those circumstances, they recommended an increase in the present salaries. On the second point, the Commissioners were of opinion that in former times there existed good grounds for fixing the salaries in Dublin at the amount at which they then stood; but that, there was now sufficient evidence to show that even in the matter of house accommodation, the rents paid by persons in the same rank of life as the Civil servants were not higher in London than in Dublin. The Commissioners therefore came to the conclusion that there was no reason based on local considerations for giving to Civil servants in Dublin lower salaries than were paid to officers performing analogous duties in London. That was the Report of the majority of the Commissioners. Mr. Blackwood, one of the three Commissioners, an officer of the Treasury, did not feel himself justified in agreeing to the Report. He had made a separate statement on the subject, but in doing so, he said that his reason for not agreeing to the Report was not so much that he differed from the other Commissioners as to the conclusions at which they had arrived, as that, having regard to the orders from the Treasury, he did not feel himself entitled to report such general conclusions. Therefore, he (Mr. Plunket) submitted that, so far as the proceedings of that Commission were concerned, his case was proved. The statement he made last year had been entirely borne out by the facts. The Commissioners had found distinctly in favour of the two propositions for which he contended—that there had been an extraordinarily rapid increase in the cost of living in Dublin, and that the effect had been an absolute deterioration of the position of the Civil servants there, as well as relatively when compared with the position of those serving in England. Another objection raised last year to the case he had sought to establish was that, although the cost of provisions might be as dear in Dublin as in London, the household expenses otherwise were less; but that too had been entirely disposed of. The Commissioners had also inquired into some other matters. They attempted to draw a comparison between the position of commercial employés and that of the Civil servants; but they failed to find any close analogy between the two on which they could confidently rely, with the single exception of the Bank of Ireland—a quasi-national institution. The Commissioners were informed that within the last few years, the salaries paid by the Bank of Ireland to its servants had increased £7,000 per annum; that within the last few weeks there had been a dearth of well-qualified candidates for vacant clerkships, and that a further increase in the scale of salaries was impending. But it was argued that, after all, if they could get the work well done by the Civil servants in Dublin for the present rate of remuneration the Treasury ought not to pay more. The Commission found that there was now no lack of candidates for the Civil Service; that there was some tendency—though not to any great extent—among some of the Civil servants to leave Government employ in order to better their position elsewhere; but that, notwithstanding the existing complaint as to the inadequacy of the salaries, the work in the public offices at Dublin was well done for the present scale of pay. He would not now discuss the question as to whether there ought or ought not to be an increase of the salaries of the Civil servants throughout the three kingdoms; nor would he enter into the question of the general increase of the prices of all the necessaries of life further than to express his own belief that, unless some concession was made in consequence of the greater cost of living, and the greater hardships of the position of the Civil servants, even in England, the standard of these men's qualities, their abilities, and usefulness to the State could not long be maintained at the high point it had hitherto reached, and the necessary effect must be that the prestige of the service would suffer. He was now dealing especially with the case of the Civil servants in Ireland, and he prayed the House to consider the position in which they were placed—a position which was felt to be an anomaly, and, to a certain extent, an ignominy. The Commissioners said in their Report that the Irish Civil servants were appointed by the Crown in former times, and that Irishmen were generally appointed to Irish offices; but the competitive examination changed all that, and now if a candidate went up for examination and succeeded, he might, no doubt, go to any part of the United Kingdom to perform his duties. But how would this be found to work? Owing to the peculiar disadvantages of the service in Ireland it was only the worst of the candidates—those, in fact, who had no choice in the matter—who would go there. Now, that in his opinion, was a very anomalous position for men to be placed in, and he added that it affected the interest of the Irish public generally. They had no right to call on a young Irishman to leave his country and go elsewhere, and it was felt to be an indignity that there should be thus a kind of Pariah class in the service of Ireland. Such was the case since the application of the system of competitive examinations for entering into the service, and such would be the case for the future. But it was for the interests of the old Civil servants that he wished especially to plead. There was no sentimental grievance, it had the misfortune of being a real one. They were exposed to the greatest hardship. They had accepted a certain office with certain expectations, but owing to circumstances over which they had no control, their position had become greatly altered. What had been worth £300 a-year a short time ago was now practically only worth about £200; so that, instead of advancing in respect of income, they had been receding, and were daily less able to carry on the struggle of life. These Civil servants were obliged to keep up a certain position. He did not know whether it was the case in England or Scotland; but in Ireland they had been generally men of great respectability, some of them gentlemen moving in good society, and it was a hard thing that they should find themselves continually on the verge, he would not say of insolvency, but of getting into debt. Their position was becoming every day more intolerable; and many of them, he knew, were only waiting the result of the efforts that had been carried on now for several years in their behalf, to see whether it would not be better for them to throw up that line of life altogether, to forego the superannuation to which they had looked forward as the fruit of their long service, and try to begin life anew in some other occupation. With regard to the method of redress, the Commissioners suggested a classification of various offices of the service all over the Empire. As to whether that proposal was good or bad, he would not offer an opinion, and the Civil servants in Ireland did not pretend to suggest—much less insist—as to the means by which their grievances might be redressed. If the recommendations of the Commissioners to remedy the inadequacy of the present salaries, and to remove the inequalities which existed, were honestly carried out, the Civil servants would be perfectly satisfied. They submitted that they had a pressing and a painful grievance, which, indeed, had been fully established by the Commission issued by the Government, and they prayed that it might be redressed. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the 'Civil Service (in Ireland) Commissioners' having reported that the dissatisfaction on the ground of 'the general inadequacy of the present scale of salaries, having regard to the great increase which has taken place in latter years in the cost of living,' is well founded; and that 'there is no reason, based on local considerations, for giving salaries to Civil Servants stationed in Dublin less in amount than those assigned to persons in London performing analogous duties,' this House is of opinion that such general inadequacy of the present scale of salaries of the Civil Servants serving in Ireland should as soon as possible be redressed, and that they should be placed upon an equality as to remuneration with those performing duties in England corresponding in difficulty and responsibility,"—(Mr. Plunket.)

—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to point out, in the first instance, that the words "general inadequacy," as used in the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), did not mean what they would appear to imply when taken by themselves, but referred to the Report of the Commissioners, in which they said there was a general inadequacy, having regard to the great increase that had taken place in the cost of living. There was no finding in the Report of a general inadequacy of salaries, except in reference to that particular matter. He did not say that there was any ambiguity in the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, but still it was as well that the fact should be borne in mind. Strictly speaking, that was not an Irish grievance at all, as things were now managed, although Irish Members had been specially appealed to in reference to it. The Commissioners stated that in former days the offices in question were uniformly given to Irishmen, implying that it was reasonable they should therefore have been content to receive lower salaries. In that view he could not acquiesce, as he could see no reason why an Irishman should receive a lower salary than an Englishman or a Scotchman of the same attainments and ability. But it was not an Irish grievance, for the simple reason that those offices were no longer necessarily filled up either from Ireland or by Irishmen. It did not follow that because a man took a place in Ireland he should be an Irishman, and therefore Irishmen did not suffer any greater hardship in the case under the notice of the House than Englishmen or Scotchmen who were employed in the Civil Service in Dublin. He would observe, further, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had omitted from his speech and Motion one matter which was of some consequence—namely, that the salaries which were enjoyed by the Civil servants of the Crown were matters of contract. There was a contract between them and the Government, as representing the people, by which the Government was bound to the very letter to pay the Civil servant so much salary, increasing at a certain rate, and at the end of his service to pay him a certain pension for the remainder of his life. No circumstances whatever would justify a Government in attempting to deviate from that contract; they were absolutely and completely bound by it. Supposing the prices of provisions and necessities of life had fallen ever so low, nobody would dream for a moment of taking advantage of that in order to lower the salaries of the Civil servants; and yet it was assumed that it was not only justifiable, but absolutely essential, that if this contract turned out in respect of the prices of provisions at all against the Civil servants they should set aside all that portion of the contract which seemed to press hardly upon them, and should obtain all the benefits of that portion which was in their favour. He maintained, however, that the people of this country, who paid the Civil servants, were as much entitled to consideration in that House as were the Civil servants themselves; and that, as a general rule, they ought to adhere to contracts solemnly and deliberately entered into rather than assume that they might be set aside at any moment when the interested persons complained that they pressed hardly upon them. The hon. and learned Gentleman relied upon two grounds—first, the prices of provisions; and secondly, that the Irish Civil servants did not consider themselves paid at a rate equivalent to that paid to their brother Civil servants in England. With regard to the first, there was no doubt that there had been a considerable rise in the prices of provisions and the necessities of life, and that that pressed the harder upon a man in proportion to his poverty. That was assumed to be a sufficient reason for altering these contracts and re-adjusting the salaries; but, as he had said, there was no such agreement or arrangement ever entered into, and what was now asked was a matter of pure grace, and it ought to be carefully considered whether it could be entertained at all. They could not wholly put the principles of economic science out of the question in such a matter. It was tacitly assumed that the price of work of any kind was regulated by the price of provisions; but there was no greater fallacy than that. The price of labour was regulated by the number of persons seeking employment of a particular description, and the amount of employment available for them. At the present moment the price of physical labour was very much on the increase, whilst the price of intellectual labour—at least of that species—was very much on the decline, and these two things were happening coincidentally with a very large rise in the prices of provisions. How, then, could it be said that the price of labour should depend upon the price of provisions? There was a tendency not to a rise, but to a fall in the labour of clerks and persons of that kind, and for the simple reason that the country had by a large expenditure of public money forced the education of the people, and had consequently raised up a large number of competitors for that species of intellectual work. What the hon. and learned Gentleman asked was, that on account of the rise in the prices of provisions and necessaries of life, they should offer higher prices for labour when the labour market was actually falling. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought that, upon whatever grounds the House might accede to the hon. and learned Gentleman's proposition, it would not be on the ground of the rise in the prices of provisions. But then the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of a sort of symmetry that he seemed to require; he wished to have the payments made in England and in Ireland adjusted with reference to each other. The hon. and learned Gentleman said in his Motion, that the Irish Civil servants ought to be placed on an equality as regarded remuneration with those performing corresponding duties in England; but there were two ways of obtaining that equality. They might either raise the salaries of the Irish Civil servants to those of the English servants, or lower those of the English servants down to the level of the former. The latter course would satisfy not the wishes of the hon. and learned Gentleman, perhaps, but certainly the words of his Motion, and the portion of his argument that related to symmetry. If it were once attempted to regulate the salaries in Ireland, not in reference to the wants and the position of Ireland, but in reference to what was done in England, and to symmetry and equality of that kind, where did the hon. and learned Gentleman propose that they should stop? If the Government once began that process, they could not stop; they must go through the whole Civil Service, and must consider everybody's salary with reference to that of everybody else, and strike a mean. That would be perfectly symmetrical, but that it would be fair he did not believe. The question really was, however, what was to be done upon this subject. He had shown that they could not lay down the ludicrously false principle of basing salaries upon the price of provisions and necessaries of life, nor yet could they rely upon the speculative principle of equalizing or comparing all salaries, and striking an equality between them, which would prevent any Civil servant receiving a shilling until the whole service was put in the same position. But what they could do, and what he was sure would satisfy the hon. and learned Gentleman was this—they could not go into the question of a general rise of salaries, calculated on the price of provisions, for that would involve a perpetual fluctuation and change, because if a rise in the price of provisions must be followed by a rise in salaries, a fall in provisions would entitle the Government to claim a reduction of salaries; nor could they go into the question of comparing salaries, for there was a great diversity in the salaries of different offices. England was an old country, and it was a long time since she began to pay salaries. In earlier days people were not so particular about public money, and consequently the salaries of the older offices were high. Things had improved a little of late, and the salaries of new offices had been lowered. The hon. and learned Gentleman asked that they should be all put on a level, but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) said no; let them leave matters as they stood, and not attempt to make any sweeping change, which would only saddle the country with an enormous burden which was unnecessary and unjustifiable, for if they attempted to equalize, they must take the highest salaries and level up to them. He would say take the Departments as they stood; take the Irish Departments, for instance, and look carefully into them, not in reference to what there was in England, but to see what duties particular persons had to perform; and, above all, never attempt to raise salaries or to deal with Departments without carefully looking into all the circumstances, and the organization of each Department. They would look to the number of persons employed, and to the character and manner in which their labours were discharged, and when they had done those things they would consider the merits of each Department by itself, and deal with it in as liberal a spirit as they could. Into such a scheme the Government were ready to enter in regard to the Civil servants in Ireland, as they had already entered into with regard to England, and make use of the valuable information which they had received from the Commission. The Government were ready, either by the reduction of the numbers employed, or by better organization, to benefit the position of those Civil servants. There was one Department in Ireland—namely, the Registration Department—in which he admitted that the salaries were too low. If the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Resolution would assent to that case, the Government would be willing to meet him, but they strongly objected to entering into such a speculative inquiry as he had pointed out, an inquiry which would rather retard than promote the objects which they had in view. He thought that in that manner the hon. and learned Gentleman would gain all he could expect to gain by his Motion, and he hoped, therefore, that he would see that this was the best course to be pursued, and not press the matter to a division.

MR. MCCARTHY DOWNING said, that on entering the House, he was under the impression that the Government would at once accede to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) because it was only carrying out the recommendations of their own Commission. He was, however, much surprised to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer make such a speech in opposition to the Resolution. Anyone would imagine from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the question had never been debated before. The simple question was, whether the Irish Civil servants ought to be paid in the same proportion as in England for the same work. When the subject had been brought forward in April of last year, it had been treated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the same singular way, and in almost the same language, as he had just used. The right hon. Gentleman then expressed a hope that the matter would not be pressed in its then shape, and he had said the same that evening. He (Mr. Downing) at least expected that the right hon. Gentleman would tell them what would be done; instead of which, he had left them in exactly the same position as that they were in last April twelvemonths. Well, then, the House might naturally ask him why was the Commission issued at all? If, as the right hon. Gentleman said, it was to be considered as a mere matter of contract between the Government and the Irish Civil servants, why did the right hon. Gentleman assent to the appointment of this Commission?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

The Chancellor of the Exchequer now laid stress upon the stability of a contract; but the right hon. Gentleman did not always stand by his own contract, as, for example, the Zanzibar contract, under which the right hon. Gentleman consented to giving £16,000, although an offer had been made to the Government to execute their requirements for about £11,000. The right hon. Gentleman, with that generosity which always distinguished him, consented to give the larger sum, because he said the parties to it had already suffered a considerable pecuniary loss in anticipation of receiving the contract. He, now, however, took his stand on political economy, and, notwithstanding the fact that he was himself a party to the Irish Civil Service Commission, he now told the House it was not worth the paper it was written on, because the subject was simply one of contract. What the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin asked was, that Civil servants in Ireland should be paid at the same rate as Civil servants in England when they performed similar duties. It was no doubt true that under the competitive system young men might select either England, Ireland, or Scotland; but that was not the case with the older men who had grown grey in the Civil Service in Ireland, and whose claims he was now advocating. The Commissioners were called upon to examine into the differences between the rates of pay of English and Irish merchants' and solicitors' clerks, and, to their surprise, they found the rates of pay in Ireland were higher than those in England. The truth was, that the same amount of money would not purchase in Ireland what it would purchase in England. He had not expected that the Motion, founded as it was on the Reports of the Commissioners appointed by themselves, would have been met in this way by Her Majesty's Government. Why had a Commission been issued at all respecting the subject, if its recommendations were to be disregarded? The matter had been before the House since 1869, when a deputation waited upon Mr. Fortescue, then the Chief Secretary. Then an inquiry was promised, but faith had not been kept with the Civil servants of Ireland. The Gentlemen who reported on the subject were entitled to the fullest consideration of the Government, and he trusted their recommendations would have some weight in that House, and that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin would be carried.

MR. BRUEN said, that in these matters the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, according to his own evidence given yesterday before the Select Committee on the Civil Service Expenditure, was a dictator. When asked by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) whether the Treasury, as holding the purse-strings of the nation, had a controlling power over all the Departments of the Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had replied—"No; but the Treasury has control in this way—if they come to me for an increase of expenditure, I can refuse it." He objected to the matter being treated on the "hard-and-fast line" of a simple contract, into which the Civil servants entered at the commencement of their employment, and considered that those in Ireland were placed in a position of degradation by being placed on a footing of inferiority. All that the Irish Civil servants asked was, that they should be placed on a footing of equality with those holding similar offices in England. The right hon. Gentleman's argument that the salaries of the Civil servants in Ireland must be regulated by the labour market, must lead to this result, that qualification would be no longer a test of efficiency, but that all offices must be put up to a sort of Dutch auction, and the man must be selected who was willing to supply a vacancy for the least amount of remuneration.

MR. PIM, in supporting the Motion, said, the Report of the Commissioners showed that a lower rate of remuneration was paid to the Irish than to the English Civil servants, and nothing which had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer went in the slightest degree to show that such an exceptional scale of payment could with any degree of reason be maintained. What might have been fair enough 30 years ago, when the cost of living was less in Ireland than in England was not fair now, and a very good case for the increase of payment had been fully made out. The Directors of the Bank of Ireland had had to increase the salaries of the clerks, and would have to go much further in that direction. He considered the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be very unsatisfactory.

MR. OTWAY, in supporting the Motion, said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had, in his opinion, completely proved his case, and he should certainly vote in favour of his Motion. He wished however, before he sat down, to advert to one or two fallacies which were to be found in the speech of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They were fallacies which were calculated to have a most mischievous tendency, and greatly to deteriorate, if not, in time, to destroy, the character of the Civil Service. The right hon. Gentleman maintained that the price of provisions ought to have no effect on the salaries of those who were thus employed. A more pedantic theory when dealing with a practical grievance he had never heard propounded. He might quote in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the action of an authority which he would be likely to respect. The present Government itself had given in that very Session, the increased cost of living as a reason for increasing the pay of those engaged in our Dockyards. He might add that the Prussian Government, which was one of the most frugal in Europe, had increased the salaries of its Civil servants for the same reason 25 per cent; while the Government of Belgium had raised the salaries of the same class from 25 to 35 per cent. If the doctrine laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was adopted, they would have a discontented Civil Service, with all the mischievous consequences thence arising. The right hon. Gentleman further contended, that as long as they found men ready to accept the service at the present rates of remuneration they ought not to give any better pay. The result, however, of that would be, that they would have an inferior class of persons in those employments who were not bound by those principles of honour which guided the men now engaged in that Service. Then they would see what had been seen during the last few months—namely, men who had been long employed in the Civil Service of the country called upon to perform exceptional and responsible duties, and applying for adequate remuneration, and on being refused justice, disregarding honour and honesty, and disclosing to the public matters which they had learnt confidentially in their office. The theories of political economy which the Chancellor of the Exchequer put forward on those occasions were, he maintained, utterly inapplicable to a practical grievance like that, and if persisted in must produce most serious mischief.

MR. O'REILLY, as a Member of the Committee which sat upon the subject, denied that that Committee had reported that because the offices in Ireland were filled exclusively by Irishmen, that might be considered a fitting reason for giving them a lower remuneration. He agreed that the State ought not to pay more than it could get good adequate and fitting service for, but the increased cost of living had necessitated higher salaries; and it should be remembered that though at one time the cost of living in Ireland was lower than the cost of living in London, and that, therefore, a lower salary meant an equal remuneration, that was no longer the case. In answer to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that that was not an Irish grievance, because Irishmen did not fill those particular offices in Ireland, but held appointments throughout the Empire, he maintained that it was, nevertheless, an Irish grievance, and a serious one too, because if the present state of things continued unchanged, it would lead to those offices in Ireland being filled by the very worst class of men admitted under the system of competitive examination. The result of the inquiry he had made was, that the salaries were extremely unequal, and some of the best men were the worst paid.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that seven or eight hon. Gentlemen had advocated the cause of a class, and only his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that of the nation, and therefore the House would not grudge him the opportunity of stating his view of the subject. The speech of the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) was remarkable. He did not confine himself to the specialities of the Irish case; without any hesitation, with great decision, and with something like contempt, he flung over the whole argument of what he called political economy—that argument which maintained that public servants were to receive for serving the public the rate of remuneration for which they were willing to enter into the public service. That, he said, had done enormous mischief and ought to be entirely rejected, and he dealt very severely with the right hon. Gentleman, because the right hon. Gentleman expressed his adhesion to that principle. The hon. Member seemed to go upon the principle of making things pleasant all round, which was a delightful thing for Members of Parliament who sat for certain constituencies. ["Oh, Oh!"] He begged pardon of those who said "Oh," but he repeated that it was a particularly pleasant method for hon. Gentlemen to recommend, when a large portion of their constituents happened to be public servants. It increased the pressure upon them. That, however, was not the principle on which the Government, as the representatives of the people, were to act. The Resolution of the House of Commons did not absolve the Government from the duty of asking the House of Commons so to regulate the public charge that the people should be served on the most moderate terms which would secure efficient servants. That was the principle on which the Government had stood, and intended to stand; and if the House disapproved it, the remedy was in their hands. Those were the views with which they approached every question of the kind. His hon. Friend did not condescend to found himself on the specialities of the Irish case, the whole tenor of his speech leading to this result—that there must be a general rise in the pay of the Civil servants of the United Kingdom, because there was a general rise in the price of provisions. The question that was now being debated was the introduction of the thin end of the wedge. If on account of the rise in prices in Ireland, they were to vote an increase in pay, by parity of reasoning there must be a corresponding rise of salaries throughout the three kingdoms. No doubt, it was perfectly true that there had been a rise of certain prices in Ireland of late years, as there had also been a fall of other prices: but the real question that was raised was, that of the general rise of the salaries of the Civil servants of the State, based on the fact that there had been a rise in the price of certain commodities in a portion of the kingdom. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) appeared not to have heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he said that the right hon. Gentleman had declined to do anything. On the contrary, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in most distinct form, and with that lucidity of statement which never failed him, set out the two methods of proceeding which were before them. The Government did not deny that the salaries in Ireland required to be revised, but this process of revision, they thought, ought to go on from time to time all through the public service. He joined issue with the hon. Member for Cork and the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) when they said they would not be satisfied with this examination in detail. Those hon. Members were determined on an heroic operation—upon something which should impress the minds of the Civil servants with a sense of the magnificence of the manner in which they performed their duties. It was to that wholesale operation the Government objected. For 20 years they had been beneficially pursuing the course of revision which was now going on specifically in Ireland in several important Departments; and therefore the question was, whether the Government were to be driven from that method of operation, by which they could combine augmentation of salary with redistribution of duty, and by which they could frequently reconcile an economical result with an increase of remuneration to those employed, or were they to adhere to it in Ireland as they had done and meant to in England and Scotland? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) founded himself upon two main allegations; and in his (Mr. Gladstone's) opinion those two allegations he had not made good. His hon. and learned Friend founded himself on the recommendation of the Commission, and came to the conclusion, that it was right the Civil servants in Ireland should be placed upon an equality as to remuneration with those who performed duties in England corresponding in difficulty and responsibility. What he (Mr. Gladstone) contended was, that there was no such proposition in the Report of the Commission. They had reported that which to his mind, implied the contrary. The Commission reported that there had been an increase of prices in Ireland; and on that account there was a well-founded feeling of discontent at the amount of remuneration. But he (Mr. Gladstone) did not agree that because the Commissioners had so reported, the salaries should be raised. He would point out what was the immediate consequence of this doctrine. It would amount to this—that when there was an augmentation of prices, the life contracts which the public had made with its servants, and which they had accepted willingly and sought after eagerly, were to be altered in their favour. If they were contracts, they must be observed on both sides; if they were not, they must be observed on neither. If salaries were to be augmented because there was an increase of prices, even although it was shown there were plenty of efficient men still seeking and desiring employment, it followed that in the case of a fall of prices the salaries of Civil servants ought to be reduced; and there were those in the House who would remember a Motion was once made that on account of the reduction in prices there should be a diminution of 10 per cent in Civil service salaries all round. The contention on the other side was, that these salaries were to move up and down, according to the rise and fall of commodities. The Government contended, on the contrary, that the contract made with the Civil servants was altogether irrespective of the prices of commodities, and that the Civil servants were not entitled to ask for any increase of salary on the ground of any increase in the price of commodities. The hon. and learned Gentleman had founded his Motion on a sentence of the Report which implied that the Commissioners had reported that persons performing duties in England and Ireland of equal responsibility did not receive equal remuneration. The Committee, however, said nothing of the kind. They stated in the 24th paragraph of their Report, that in fixing the relative scale of salaries, the primary consideration was the comparative amount and importance of the business to be transacted, and the responsibility thereby incurred. They added, in another paragraph, that, according to that comparative importance and responsibility, the scale of salaries in Dublin would not rise as high as in London. If the exact contrary of the assertion of the hon. and learned Gentleman were not thus directly stated, he (Mr. Gladstone) affirmed, moreover, that it was expressed in the proposition to which the evidence they had taken conducted them. But there was a second allegation which the hon. and learned Gentleman made. The hon. and learned Gentleman drew a touching picture of the condition of the Civil service in Ireland. He said that the service was losing its prestige. Well, he (Mr. Gladstone) hoped that everybody who had got any prestige would lose it. ["Oh, oh!"] He was sorry to shock the sensitive feelings of hon. Gentlemen, but had they considered the meaning of the word? It meant "false and unreal reputation." ["Oh, oh!" and laughter.] If they would trace the word to its root they would find it simply meant "juggling"; but that, however, was a verbal digression, and he asked upon what evidence it was alleged that the credit of the Civil service had diminished in Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the pressure upon the Civil service was becoming worse and worse, and was now almost intolerable, and that the time was fast approaching when we should not have a sufficient number of qualified candidates for the various offices, while it had already arrived when the best members of the Service were quitting it to better themselves elsewhere. He (Mr. Gladstone) challenged that statement on the evidence appealed to by the hon. Member for Cork. The fact was, that the very best members of the public service were not adequately paid, and could not be, and hence many of them had quitted it to better themselves elsewhere. That had been the case, for example, with the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), who left the public service to occupy a high position in connection with one of the large railway companies. He (Mr. Gladstone) had often expressed that opinion, because if they were paid according to the scale they deserved, a crowd of average men would rush in to enjoy it. The real question was, whether that grievance, which was inherent in the Public Service, prevailed to a greater extent in Ireland than it did elsewhere, and, above all, was it increasing? Because that was the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman when he said that the pressure of circumstances in the service was becoming "intolerable." He (Mr. Gladstone) said, on the contrary, that it was a diminishing, and not an increasing evil, and he could show that from page 46 of the Report, to which he had been referred by the hon. Member for Cork, who, he thought, had not very carefully studied that portion of it. It contained the Returns from the year 1845 down to the year 1871. Calling that a period of 26 years, he (Mr. Gladstone) had divided it into two portions of 13 years each. During the whole period of 26 years there were 61 cases of Civil servants who had left the Service to take better positions elsewhere; and out of the 61 cases he found that 56 belonged to the first period of 13 years, and the remainder to the second period of 13 years. Thus, because 20 years ago, men were quitting the Service at a great rate, and because that movement had now ceased, the hon. and learned Member said it would be necessary to have, not a careful revision, but a wholesale augmentation of salaries in Ireland. So that the hon. and learned Gentleman's revolutionary proposition, as it might be called, was not borne out by the figures. The House had also been told that these gentlemen had grown gray in the public service. Was their's a very hard case? They were those who came into the public service at a time when their friends and adherents and Members of Parliament "wore the knockers" of the public offices by the assiduity of the process of solicitation in obtaining interest for situations in the public service for these gentlemen which was afterwards to be converted into an ingenious allegation of grievance. He had great respect for those gentlemen certainly, but he could not say that he thought their case was a strong one. It was not a case as between England and Ireland, or between Ireland and Scotland. The fact was that the duties of the Civil servants were more concentrated and arduous in England than in Scotland; and in Scotland, though less arduous and complicated than in England, they were, still, more so than in Ireland. Such work must be paid for in proportion as it was arduous and difficult, and if an average were struck, the pay would be highest in the country where, on the average, the work was most arduous. If it were shown, for instance, that in some poor district of England—say the South-western Counties—public servants were paid lower rates than in London and the most populous parts of the country, exactly the same remark would apply: their pay would be lower because the duties they performed were less arduous and less responsible. It was very well for hon. Members to indulge their natural feelings of kindness and bring pressure to bear upon the Government for an increase of public expenditure in this direction. But other considerations must be borne in mind. What was the state of things in the City of London at this moment? His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said it was doubtful whether the price of intellectual labour was not falling rather than rising. His right hon. Friend meant that as an opinion only, and was not proposing a reduction of salaries based on that opinion. There was, at any rate, much to show that if the price of clerical labour was rising at all, the movement was a very slow and insensible one. If the clerks of a merchant in the City of London struck work, would he find any difficulty in replacing them? At that moment 4,000 qualified clerks were seeking employment there and unable to obtain it. With what justice to those men were measures proposed—not for inquiry, because inquiry was disregarded and almost despised—but wholesale and sweeping measures for augmenting the rates of remuneration for public servants, when there were multitudes of respectable and competent men who would gladly, if they could, take the places of the very worst paid of such servants? He trusted the House would not be led into any such snare as that which had been laid for them. They must not be misled by the case of the Bank of Ireland. Why had that Bank raised its rates of pay? Because they were insufficient to attract a sufficient supply of qualified candidates; but in the case of the Civil Service, the Commissioners had reported that the rates now paid were sufficient for the purpose. And what was the use of a reference to Prussia, notoriously the most economical country in Europe, in which the salaries of public servants had been insufficient to keep body and soul together? [Mr. ORWAY: Not in proportion to expenses.] He joined issue with his hon. Friend on that point. The salaries of Prussian officials had been notoriously insufficient, and were connected with the want of a free organization in Prussian society, but for which such salaries never could have existed. When greater political freedom prevailed, and there arose a greater choice of employment, it was an absolute necessity to increase these salaries; and when a fair case could be shown, if the House would, by all means let the same course be taken here. By all means, even without distinct proof of that kind, let the Government be spurred and stimulated in the career of cautious and careful examination into duties and remuneration with a view to a better distribution of service—changes which resulted frequently in larger salaries, and in more efficient work done at less cost to the public. But let not the House ask the Government to do that which they could not honestly do—namely, adopt what he had called heroic measures, applicable to great masses of public servants at once—measures which, even if they conveyed momentary satisfaction to some of those whom they affected would before long lead to great financial difficulties, forfeit the title of the House to the approval of the public, and be found to constitute a great public misfortune.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN, who spoke amid continued interruption, said, he trusted the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) would not withdraw his Motion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister had in their speeches contradicted the principles of political economy with reference to this question. He knew by experience that the more salaries were reduced the greater was the number of applicants for situations, for the lower the remuneration the greater would be the number to whom it would be an object, and he did not understand why the members of the Civil Service in Ireland should be treated in the way they were. He wished the House to recollect that if this was not an Irish question in the way of putting it in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was certainly a question affecting the Civil Service in Ireland, and he could not recognize the airy distinction of the Minister. The right hon. Gentleman had applied the phrase “ludicrous” to the idea of taking into account the price of provisions as an element in regulating salaries. He should be glad to know a more substantial or applicable test in regulating salaries. He added there was another mode of equalizing salaries in the Civil Service—namely, by reduction. Let him try it in England and see how he would fare. He now submitted for the attention of the House a few instances of the relative salaries for the same offices in England and Ireland in the General Register Office in each Kingdom—

| | In London. per Annum. | In Dublin. per Annum. |
|-------------------------|--------------------------|--------------------------|
| | £ | £ |
| Secretary | 800 | 600 |
| Medical Superintendent | 700 | 600 |
| Superintendent | 700 | 400 |
| „ 2nd Class | 550 | 300 |
| Senior Clerk | 420 | 200 |
| Assistant Clerk | 280 | 150 |
| Messenger, 1st Class | 110 | 75 |
| „ 2nd Class | 90 | 60 |

In conclusion, he would ask the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin not to withdraw his Motion. If they were to expect equal loyalty they must have not only equal rights and privileges, but they must have equal pay in the two countries.

MAJOR TRENCH supported the Motion. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government in addressing the House and describing the salaries of the Civil servants in Prussia before their recent increase, spoke of them as “insufficient to keep body and soul together,” and said that their increase was therefore a necessity. That accurately described the position of a large class of Civil servants in Ireland, and especially applied to the National schoolmasters. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: They are not Civil servants.] If they were not Civil servants he did not know what they were. They were a large and respectable body of men, civilians who performed an important public duty, and who were paid out of the sums annually voted by Parliament. Their pay was wholly inadequate, and so was that of many other classes of Civil servants in Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the price of physical labour was on the increase, while that of intellectual labour was on the decline. That was true, but the increase in the former had been brought about through strikes and combinations. In Ireland the Civil servants had not struck or used illegal means to improve their situation. It might be said that his hon. and learned Friend who moved the Resolution had been deputed by them to lay their case before the powers that were. He had done so ably, and in his opinion he had not been answered. It had been stated that the rate of pay had nothing to do with the price of provisions. When those rates were first established, they were undoubtedly based on the cost of living of that day; but anyone who knew Ireland, knew that whereas everything was cheap 18 or 20 years ago, the prices of everything had now risen to nearly the English level. His own experience enabled him to attest that fact. He was stationed in Ireland 18 years ago and could compare the difference. The Prime Minister said that because Ireland was not so prosperous as England, her Civil servants should not be so highly paid. That was no argument. If she was not prosperous, it was that her resources had not been developed, or facilities given for their development. Her Civil servants were efficient, and if, with the improvement of the country more work should be thrown upon them they would not be found wanting; but take them as they were, they ought, as expressed in the Resolution of his hon. and learned Friend, to be placed on an equality as to remuneration with their brethren in England performing duties of corresponding difficulty and responsibility. The terms of the Resolution were just and right and he hoped and believed that it would be affirmed by the House.

MR. J. MARTIN thought the position taken on that question by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) was established by all the arguments—statistical, commercial, moral, and political—on the theory which was held in that House that they were an United Kingdom. He had been curious to hear what arguments the Government could put forward in opposition to that hon. and learned Member's Motion, because the Government also held the position that that was an United Kingdom; and all he would say as to the arguments they had adduced was that he had been very much amused by the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and very greatly amazed by the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 180: Majority 13.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the "Civil Service (in Ireland) Commissioners" having reported that the dissatisfaction on the ground of "the general inadequacy of the present scale of salaries, having regard to the great increase which has taken place in latter years in the cost of living," is well founded; and that "there is no reason, based on local considerations, for giving salaries to Civil Servants stationed in Dublin less in amount than those assigned to persons in London performing analogous duties," this House is of opinion that such general inadequacy of the present scale of salaries of the Civil Servants serving in Ireland should as soon as possible be redressed, and that they should be placed upon an equality as to remuneration with those performing duties in England corresponding in difficulty and responsibility.

ENTAILED AND SETTLED ESTATES
(SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 130.]

(*The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce,
Mr. Adam.*)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. GORDON said, he had received an assurance that as that was a Bill that involved the laws of settlement in England as well as in Scotland, it would not be proceeded with until it had been further discussed. Not only that, but he had been given to understand there was to be a morning sitting for that and the kindred English Bill upon the same subject, as the two ought to be taken together. He had received a distinct assurance to that effect, and he regretted it had not been kept.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he should be sorry if there was any misapprehension upon the subject. He was not conscious of having entered into any engagement reserving the Bill for a morning sitting, and all that was said was that the Bill would not be proceeded with at a very late hour, but the last discussion which engaged the House closed considerably before 12. If the Bill was kept for a morning sitting, great inconvenience would result, and they were anxious to get on not only from the fact that they were pressed by Scotch opinion, but that they were anxious to get the opinion of the House on the Bill. He must, therefore, encourage the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate to proceed.

MR. GORDON said, the Bill involved interests of the greatest importance to the two countries, and the Government ought to let the House clearly understand what it intended doing with regard to England. It struck him that if the proposals in the Bill with regard to the law of settlement were good for Scotland, they ought to be good for England also; and his own view was that legislation on the subject for Scotland ought not to take place until inquiry by means of a Select Committee should be made into the whole subject with the view of legislating for England as well. Do not let them interfere with vested rights, unless they could do so on just and clear grounds, common to both countries. The public had a deep interest in the Bill, especially in one provision of it, and in regard to that provision he wished to ask should there not be the greatest liberty given to heirs in entail to borrow money to improve their property at the ordinary rates of interest? Then, as to the law of mortmain. By a clause of the Bill it was proposed to get up a sort of law of this kind for the whole of Scotland. He had presented numerous Petitions against the Bill on behalf of numerous educational and other institutions. Many of those institutions were charitable, and they were excellently managed. Were they not to be allowed to hold real property? Was that the principle on which they were to proceed? He strongly objected to the 11th clause, which would extinguish the law of entail—a system which was well understood and prized in Scotland. Then they had introduced the law of settlement in England. Well, they had that already, and what was the benefit the Government expected would be derived from it? He altogether denied that he expected the House would go into Committee that night, and he hoped no steps would be taken until they considered the law of settlement in England, and resolved to put both countries on an equal footing.

THE LORD ADVOCATE doubted if he quite understood the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman. As far as he understood the views of the Scotch Members, they considered the Bill did not go far enough, and while they approved of it as far as it went, they hoped it would yet go farther. He did not, therefore, think that the opinions of his hon. and learned Friend with reference to the measure were likely to meet with much favour in Scotland. He maintained that the laws in both countries had been placed on an equal footing in that matter a considerable time ago, although there were things which might be done in England which could not be done in Scotland. A father, for instance, was tied up during the whole of his lifetime by the entail, and he could not move even with the consent of his son. This was done in order to benefit the unborn grandchild. He should propose, if it would please Parliament to pass the Bill, to enable any father, with the consent of his son, to deal with the estate in such a way as they agreed upon. The Bill, moreover, was not intended to prevent people being charitable to public institutions, but it was intended to prevent them from conveying part of the soil of the country to trustees to hold in perpetuity for charitable purposes.

SIR JOHN HAY said, hon. Members had not the least opportunity of considering the Amendments which the Lord Advocate had placed on the Table that night.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was not going to ask the House to proceed with those Amendments that night.

SIR JOHN HAY suggested that the Bill should be committed pro forma for the purpose of inserting these Amendments, and then reprinted in its amended form.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not accede to that course.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir John Hay.)

The House divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 65: Majority 45.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. J. LOWTHER moved that the House do now adjourn, as it was twenty minutes past 1 o'clock, and it was impossible to go on with the discussion of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. James Lowther.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Session was so far advanced that he must lose no opportunity of making progress with it. If they got into Committee, Progress should at once be reported.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GORDON expressed a hope that the Bill would not be proceeded with again for some days, in order that the people of Scotland might have an opportunity of seeing the Amendments which the Lord Advocate had laid on the Table that night.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, full opportunity should be afforded, and he would accordingly not take the Bill again until Thursday in next week.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

REVISING BARRISTERS BILL.

On Motion of MR. CHARLEY, Bill to amend the Law relating to the appointment of Revising Barristers and the holding of Revision Courts, ordered to be brought in by MR. CHARLEY and MR. HOLKER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 221.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock, till Monday next.

ARMY—THE EDUCATION OF OFFICERS. QUESTION.

LORD DE L'ISLE AND DUDLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether arrangements might not be made whereby gentlemen who have qualified for direct commissions, and who may have to wait for some considerable time before being appointed to regiments, might not be sent at once to undergo the prescribed course of study at Sandhurst? He regretted that a question of so much importance should not be brought under their Lordships' notice by some one more competent to deal with it—but what he objected to, in common he believed with the great majority of the military profession, was that young men entering the Army, having successfully passed their competitive examination, after being a year with their regiments, were sent to Sandhurst for a year's study. In fact, after being for a year recognized as regimental officers, they were re-converted into school-boys. This was said to have been adopted from what was done in Prussia. But what might suit the Prussians very well, where the whole system of training was arranged in conformity, he thought it would be found repugnant to the habits and feelings of young Englishmen. If the young gentlemen who had qualified themselves for direct commissions were sent to Sandhurst at all, it should be immediately after passing the competitive examination, when still accustomed to the restraints of scholastic life, and when they were more likely to render a strict obedience to the regulations. It was unwise, when they had had 12 months' acquaintance with regimental duties and with their brother officers to take them from their regiments and send them to a military seminary.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE replied that, as a rule, gentlemen who proved themselves qualified for direct commissions would obtain them without delay, and when any delay occurred, it was highly improbable that the interval between the date of their qualification and that of their appointment would be of sufficient length to enable them to complete the prescribed course at Sandhurst. He was happy to say that the gentlemen who qualified at the last examination would probably be provided with commissions within a very short time—probably within two or three weeks. This remark did not apply to a certain number who had passed for West India regiments or the Household Brigade. There were some cases, also, of gentlemen who might have obtained commissions without loss of time, but who had signified to the military authorities that they preferred to await a vacancy in some particular regiment rather than accept a commission in some other regiment actually vacant. It should be borne in mind that the last year or two had been exceptional, the new system having been introduced at a time when there were a very large number of names on the Commander-in-Chief's list, and when moreover a considerable reduction had been made in the establishment of officers, and the delay arising from these circumstances would not be likely to recur. It was intended in future to accept only as many candidates as there was a reasonable prospect of providing with commissions at once. The noble Lord's suggestion would involve the inconvenience of sending to Sandhurst young men waiting for commissions, together with those who had been a year with their regiments. Moreover, the limited accommodation at Sandhurst precluded the admission of a fresh class of students, and the course of study presupposed a year's military experience, acquired with the officer's regiment, without which the instruction provided would not produce the desired advantages. Whatever the House might think of the expediency of making the Sandhurst course the beginning of the officer's career, it was obvious that this and the existing system could not be tried concurrently.

LORD DE ROS said, it was incorrect to suppose the Military Education Commissioners recommended the present system, or that it was adopted in imitation of the Prussian, or any military system of education. When he, as a Member of the Education Commission, in common with his Colleagues, desired to obtain infer-mation as to military education on the Continent, they deputed Captain Hozier, who was an excellent linguist and well acquainted with the subject, to go over and make inquiries, and his Reports, printed in the Appendix, showed that nothing of the kind was practised in foreign armies. He could not conceive anything more injudicious than the present course. Young officers were taken away from their regiments just as they were acquiring a knowledge of their duties, and by an absence of 12 months at the College of Sandhurst would certainly on their return have forgotten much they had learned. Such, at least, was the opinion of some of the best lieutenant-colonels, whom he had consulted on the matter. The Duc d'Aumale had remarked that soldiers should not only receive military instruction, but should belong to a military family; should have a military home; where they know and were known to everybody. If this applied to the soldiers, it was still more applicable to the officers, but the 12 months at Sandhurst interrupted this thorough acquaintance with the regiment, throwing together a number of young officers strangers to each other, under no wholesome control of senior officers, whom they must look up to and obey during their future regimental career, and subjected to an anomalous academic discipline, as disagreeable to their feelings, as useless for any military training. Moreover, some of the existing arrangements were singularly injudicious. For instance, cavalry officers sent to Sandhurst were not allowed to take their horses with them unless they paid for their care and keep at an Inn, though every military man was aware that for any extended reconnoissances an officer without being mounted could learn nothing. Again, military administration and military law could be much better mastered with the regiment than at Sandhurst. Strategy was taught there, but this was beginning at the wrong end; and history and geography were unwisely omitted. As to geography, it was the element of all others most important in any military education. It could not be cultivated too early, and it was a study that must be followed up by an officer throughout his whole career. It was well known that if one thing more than another contributed to the late successes of the Prussians, it was the wonderful knowledge of the geography of France shown by their officers of all ranks. Moreover, the well-informed and the ignorant officer alike had to stay 12 months at Sandhurst, learning what could be better acquired with the regiment. He objected, as a professional man, to a system which was fraught with mischief.

LORD VIVIAN asked for an explanation of the statement that an officer could wait for a commission in a particular regiment? He had not understood that an officer was left any choice as to the corps with which he would serve.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE explained that it sometimes happened that a gentleman would desire a commission in a particular regiment, and took the chance of having to wait a little longer than would otherwise be the case.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he presumed the noble Marquess did not intend to convey the impression that a cadet had a right to a commission in a particular regiment. Hitherto appointments to first commissions had rested with the General Commanding-in-Chief, and no such thing had been heard of as a young officer having a preference for going into this or that regiment.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, no change had been made in that respect.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, he had heard from all officers with whom he had conversed an unfavourable opinion on the arrangement by which young officers after a year's service with their regiments were sent to Sandhurst for study. With the regiment, they were in the position of commissioned officers. After having passed their drill, they mounted guard, sat on courts-martial, acted as orderly officers, and were the companions and equals of their brother officers. A young officer was the object of the kindly interest of his brother officers, and with the prospect of an honourable career he viewed his regiment as his home, and felt indemnified for the home he had left. After 12 months all this was interrupted, and he was sent to Sandhurst, where the companionship of his equals in social life was not possible. Moreover, it was impossible in a year with the regiment to acquire the proper degree of efficiency, and Mr. Cardwell, in instituting this system, could not have been aware of the wise provisions of the Queen's Regulations.

LORD DE L'ISLE AND DUDLEY in reply, urged that officers awaiting their commissions should be allowed to go at once through the Sandhurst course, and that some other mode should be devised of instructing officers who had joined their regiments.

ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—EXAMINATIONS.

LORD DE ROS, who had given Notice to call the attention of the House to the selection of subjects periodically published for examination of candidates for Woolwich Academy; and to ask, If the general officer at the head of the Academy is at all consulted in preparing that selection; and to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of the four last published lists of subjects, said, that seeing Romeo and Juliet among the subjects announced for a recent examination, he wrote to his friend, Sir Lintorn Simmons, whose practical character, as an officer, he knew, to ask what had induced him to sanction it. Sir Lintorn Simmons replied that he had no voice in the matter. The Royal Commission on Military Education, adopting the Duke of Wellington's principle of examining candidates to see whether they had had the proper education for gentlemen, recommended the abolition of the Council of Military Education, and the appointment of a Director-General of Education, for which post his Royal Highness had selected General W. Napier, a highly accomplished and esteemed officer. Now, surely, the choice of subjects ought to be, to a certain extent, in his hands, or the Civil Service Commissioners should, at least, consult him in the matter. He noticed in the list Chaucer, Spenser, the Epistles of Horace, and other authors from the perusal of whom a taste was likely to be formed in after-life, but who inspired distaste when imposed, as a study, on young men who saw in them no immediate practical utility. In Mr. Edgeworth's admirable work on professional education, this proposition was argued with great ability. Lord Stanhope's History of England or History of the War of Succession would be much more suitable; but what possible effect could the study of Romeo and Juliet have upon the scientific and mechanical education of Woolwich? He also noticed, among the subjects for examination, the Areopagitica, which—though he was aware that the Areopagus was a Greek tribunal—puzzled him, and it was not till after vainly consulting several dictionaries that he found that the word Areopagitica was said to have been originally derived from some tradition of a trial of the God Mars for homicide, which trial was conducted by Twelve Gods and Goddesses, when six being on one side and six on the other the accused was acquitted. This seemed a precedent for the recent proposal of the noble Earl (Earl Russell) as to Irish juries. Moreover, as soon as this curious list of subjects was published, the crammer came forward to "coach" his pupils in every detail of the works so fancifully selected—a very unwholesome system. He could not think that the selection of subjects was at all suited for young men studying for the Army, and as their Lordships were practical judges on the subject, he thought he should have their support in urging a more common-sense view as to the propriety of issuing subjects for the examination of Woolwich candidates of more elementary nature, and more likely to be of service in preparing them for the course of instruction they would be required to pursue in the academy of Woolwich, which was specially intended for training cadets for the service of Engineers and Artillery.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the subjects of examination for admission to the Royal Military Academy were laid down in the Regulations for first appointments in the Army. Those Regulations were framed upon the Report of a Royal Commission, of which the noble Lord was himself a Member, as also were Sir Lintorn Simmons (the present Director General of Military Education), General Napier, and Lord Northbrook. The examination was conducted, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission, by the Civil Service Commissioners, who selected the period of history and the particular authors prescribed for each examination. The Commissioners notified their selection to the Director General of Military Education, who published the particulars in the newspapers or otherwise, and who had an opportunity—of which he sometimes availed himself—of signifying to the Secretary of State any objections he might possibly take to the recommendations of the Civil Service Commissioners. The Governor of the Royal Military Academy was not, however, consulted. The authors were selected generally with reference to the period of history prescribed by the Civil Service Commissioners. He should be able to place in the hands of the House the list of authors for the last four examinations, when the House would see that, with the exception of one or two classical plays of Shakespeare, and of parts of the works of Chaucer—the authors selected either had reference to the events which took place during the period of history selected, or else the works were written during that period of history itself. He confessed that he had listened to the noble Lord opposite (Lord de Ros) with feelings of surprise. He objected to the selection of Romeo and Juliet. Now, it was just conceivable that the noble Lord might anticipate with apprehension the effects of reading the balcony scene upon the imagination of some young lieutenant. But when the noble Lord went on to profess his surprise at the selection of the Areopagitica, and to ask the House what that treatise was, he confessed to feelings of bewilderment. With regard to the intention of these examinations he might remind the House that they were not intended as tests of the military acquirements of a candidate. The Royal Commission took this view, and their Report contained these words:—

"To the general character of the entrance examinations recommended by us we have already alluded. They have been designed with a special reference to the curriculum adopted at the most advanced of our public schools, and with the express intention of enabling the competitors to come straight from one of those establishments to the examination hall, without having occasion to resort to any intermediate place of study."

"Moreover, as we have already observed, it is very desirable that no instruction should be rendered purely technical until after the foundations have been laid of a sound liberal education."

That was the view of the Royal Commissioners, and he thought it was a sound one. It was a misapprehension to consider the examinations as forming any part of the course of military education. Their object was, not to test the military acquirements of the candidate, but to ascertain whether his general culture fitted him for admission to the Queen's service. He agreed with the noble Lord's condemnation of "cramming," but the new system tended in an opposite direction. If the candidate had to take up the whole of English literature or history he would resort to a system of "tips," or a memoria technica, and his acquaintance with the subject would be only superficial; whereas the specification of a particular period and particular authors gave him a fair chance of acquiring a solid groundwork in an important part of our history.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN BILL.

(The Lord Henniker.)

(NO. 185.) THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^d (according to Order) with the Amendments.

LORD HENNIKER said he had again to propose the Amendment which he submitted on the Report. Reformatory schools were under inspection, and were under the Secretary of State for the Home Department. They were placed under general rules and regulations, part of one of which was that—

"The secular instruction shall consist of reading, spelling, writing, and ciphering, and, as far as practicable, the elements of history, geography, social economy, and drawing. It shall be given for three hours daily."

The rules for industrial schools made the same provision. The Secretary of State had power to deduct from the grant if these rules were not complied with. Under these circumstances there was surely a sufficient safeguard that the children would be properly educated. The intention of the Education Act was not to interfere with these schools, and he certainly would have inserted a clause in the first instance had he not imagined they were exempted from the restrictions of the Bill by virtue of the Acts under which they were established. As to the particular school he had mentioned in Northamptonshire, where the labour of the children was let, he found the educational portion of the instruction spoken of most highly in the last Report of the Inspector, as indeed it was in most cases in other schools throughout England and Scotland. The Bill would affect but very few children, it was true, as the account given of the admissions to reformatory schools in 1871 would show. Out of 1,575 admitted, all but 28 were above 10; 1,340 (or about three-fourths) were above 12, and 760 (or nearly half) were above 14 years of age. In order, however, to avoid interference with special Acts, and with the good work which these schools were doing, he proposed this clause. He must remind their Lordships that, if the clause of exemption was not inserted, children in these schools could not profit by the exemptions of the Bill, for no doubt schools would be provided everywhere within two miles, and in this case, under the interpretation clause, they could never qualify for a certificate of attendances or of proficiency; and no one could say for a moment that children ought to be educated away from the reformatory school to which they had been sent—in fact, no manager would consent to such a course being adopted. In deference to the opinion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond), so good a friend to education and to this measure, he would gladly have proposed an addition to the clause. There was a great deal in the objection of the noble Duke, but he found it almost, if not quite, impossible to meet it. For the reasons he had stated, and after representations made to him by experienced managers of reformatory schools, he did not think it right that these schools should be included in the Bill, and he hoped their Lordships would agree to the addition to the clause for the purpose of exempting them.

Amendment moved, at end of Clause 10, insert—

“Nor shall the said provisions apply in the case of any child for the time being detained in a certified reformatory school or in a certified industrial school within the meaning of the Reformatory Schools Acts, 1866 and 1872, and the Industrial Schools Acts, 1866 and 1872, respectively.”—(The Lord Henniker.)

After a few words from the Marquess of SALISBURY, the Marquess of RIPON, and the Duke of RICHMOND,

Amendment agreed to.

Further Amendments made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

ARMY—MILITIA RESERVE.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the conditions under which militiamen were induced to enrol in the Militia Reserve

Force during the years 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872 may not be annulled retrospectively as proposed by paragraph 1, clause 38, of the Auxiliary and Reserve Forces Circular, dated War Office, 21st April, 1873; but that the operation of this clause shall commence only from the date of its issue. The noble Lord the Under Secretary for War had, on the 18th of June, been asked a Question by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Exeter), respecting the amount of bounty which was refused to men of the Militia Reserve who enlisted in 1868, and whose term of service did not expire till after the training of 1873; and he (the Earl of Galloway) must say that the answer the noble Lord gave in return to the Question was anything but satisfactory. He thought, indeed, that something like a breach of faith—unintentional, no doubt—had been committed by the War Office towards the men who had enlisted in the Militia Reserve. In 1868, it was thought advisable to establish a new military force called the Militia Reserve. The conditions of entering it were that an ordinary militiaman who met with the approval of his commanding officer, and who had been two years in the force, might be enrolled in the Militia Reserve, whereby he became available for drafting into any regular regiment during his five years in the event of either actual or imminent declaration of war. The point in dispute was the amount of emolument this man became entitled to after enrolment in the Reserve. The original Order was issued on the 9th of May, 1868; and that was followed by an explanatory Memorandum on the 23rd of April, 1869. He maintained the meaning of the original Memorandum was the man should be paid £1 on attestation, and £1 at the close of every subsequent training during his Reserve engagement; but in the explanatory Memorandum the second “£1” was omitted. But without this the Memorandum had no meaning whatever. The understanding these men believed to have been come to with them was that they should receive £1 on entering and £1 a year for each of the five successive yearly trainings which they agreed to serve. In 1868, they were enlisted, and would consequently be entitled to £6 in 1873. Hitherto the men had received their £1 every year; but on the 23rd of April in the present year an Order was issued from the War Office stating that to preclude misunderstandings as to the Militia Reserve bounty, the Militia Reserve man was only entitled to receive for his five years' service a total of £5. The men would not understand this as a performance of the engagement made with them. It must be remembered that ordinary Militiamen made many sacrifices in entering the Reserve force. In the first place, at the end of four years' service he received £1 6s.; he got on being enrolled 15s., which made £2 1s. Added to this he generally got a free gift and the price of his kit, which made altogether about £6. He contended that under all the circumstances of the case the decision of the War Office was a breach of faith, and he hoped it was not yet too late to rectify it. It might be followed by very serious consequences. For example, the regiment which he had the honour of commanding, assembled last week, but the number of men absent amounted to at least 40 per cent. He would have to join in the course of the following week, and what was he to do? He was told by a high military authority that he ought to arrest and punish those who absented themselves as so many deserters; but how was he to accomplish that? In the first place, the police did not display any great energy in arresting deserters from the Militia, because they did not now receive any reward for exercising that part of their duty, and he feared that in many cases they sympathized with the offenders. There were already many grievances alleged, and if this one were added he thought this old constitutional force would dwindle away to a considerable extent.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the conditions under which militiamen were induced to enrol in the Militia Reserve Force during the years 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872 may not be annulled retrospectively, as proposed by paragraph 1, clause 38, of the Auxiliary and Reserve Forces Circular, dated War Office, 21st April 1873, but that the operation of this clause shall commence only from the date of its issue.—(The Earl of Galloway.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the difficulty, in so far as it had practically arisen, was limited to those Militia Reserve men who engaged in 1868, and whose engagement expired this year. After the conversation which took place some time ago he had communicated with his noble Friend opposite, and had also referred to the documents. The question was under what contract did those men engage. The terms of their engagement were to be found in the Act of 1867, and in the Regulation of 1868, which was signed by Sir John Pakington. When he gave his answer to the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Exeter) at that time, he believed that the engagement was for a service of five years in consideration of a payment of £5. He still believed that this was intended, and he should not despair of bringing forward a good technical argument for refusing the sixth £1 to those men who had only five trainings. But this was not a case for such technical arguments. The Government were dealing with an important force, whose education as a rule was not very high, and any appearance of bad faith was to be avoided. Acting under this view, he had laid the documents before the Lord Chancellor, and begged him to advise him what was the contract apparent upon the face of the papers, regardless of technical construction. The noble and learned Lord had advised him that its obvious interpretation did not exclude the payment of a sixth £1 to those men who had engaged in 1868 on account of the training of 1873. They would therefore receive the sixth £1, not as a matter of right, but because Her Majesty's Government thought that if there was a doubt as to interpretation that doubt should be ruled in their favour. As a consequence, all the Militia Reserve men similarly circumstanced, and who engaged after 1868, but before the issue of the Circular of 1873, would get their sixth £1 if their fifth training was held within the period of their engagement. This difficulty would, he trusted, not arise in the case of future engagements, because a Bill was now in progress whereby Her Majesty's Government proposed to extend the service in the Militia Reserve from five to six years, with a bounty of £6—£1 for each year's liability.

THE DUKE OF BUCKLEUCH expressed his great satisfaction at hearing the statement of the noble Marquess, because there was great dissatisfaction among those men when they were told they were not to receive the bounty this year. Whatever might be the noble Marquess's estimation of the education of these men, they were at all events shrewd enough to form a judgment as to their rights.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

PREVENTION OF FRAUDS ON CHARITABLE FUNDS BILL. (No. 122.)

(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to put an end to those fraudulent cases in which, under the name of charitable associations, certain persons succeeded in obtaining money from the public, which they misapplied, and spent for their own purposes. The Charity Organization Society, of the labours of which he could not speak too highly, had clearly shown to what an extent the fraudulent system to which he referred was carried. That Society had a local committee in almost every district in London, and had done everything in its power to bring offenders to justice. As to the associations against which its efforts were directed, their committees consisted, for the most part, of mere dummies, the names upon them representing persons who had no existence. In a vast number of instances there was only one man, having a small room, who issued reports and collected money, which he spent after his own fashion. The present law was not sufficient to deal with this matter—as in the instance of the Bible and Clothing Society, which had been prosecuted by the Charity Organization Society. It was shown that very considerable sums of money had been received by that society; but as it was proved that a certain number of Bibles and a certain quantity of clothing—merely nominal—had been purchased, it was relieved from the charge of obtaining money under false pretences, and the charge was dismissed; and he feared the result would be the same in most cases, the law being imperfect. He had a list of 16 of these societies whose receipts averaged, he found, £13,410 a-year, and he believed he was within the mark when he stated that between £300,000 and £400,000 per annum was raised in that way throughout the country. It was desirable, then, he thought, that the law should, as far as possible, be brought to bear on abuses of that kind, for the perpetration of which the penny post, the telegraph, and other modern improvements afforded increased facilities. To meet the evil he proposed that every charitable society should keep proper books of account, containing particulars of all money or goods received by them, the names of the donors, and the manner in which all moneys received have been applied, a register of all officers, agents, and others; and should in every prospectus or report, declare where these registers might be inspected. He further provided for the inspection of these books by any person interested, or his agent; and that it should publish yearly a balance-sheet to these provisions; and to that every honest society would not, he felt sure, have any objection to submit. Their Lordships would observe that he did not propose the enactment of any new law, but for an application of existing laws—such as the Larcenies Act, the Charitable Trust Act, and the Companies Act—to cases of abuse which were not adequately dealt with by the existing law. It might be contended that it would be better to have the societies registered; but he did not think the registration of Friendly Societies had produced any great effect in the prevention of frauds; in fact some of the greatest frauds had been practised under cover of the Friendly Societies Act; while as to the argument that there was no good reason why the Legislature should try to protect people against the consequences of their own folly, he would merely observe that a woman had only the other day been sent to prison with hard labour merely for procuring money by fortune-telling, while the law also stepped in to protect shareholders against fraud. If their Lordships gave a second reading to the Bill he did not propose to press the measure any further this Session, but he desired to have it circulated throughout the country, with a view to effective legislation, if possible, next year.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had no doubt of the excellence of the noble Earl's object in bringing forward that measure: but he thought the mode in which he sought to accomplish that object was open to great objection. There were a large number of people who chose to intrust their money for charitable purposes without taking the least precaution to ascertain the character of the persons to whom they intrusted it, or the reality of the object for which the money was asked: and by this Bill it was proposed to protect those people by placing every person, whether innocent or guilty, under a series of restrictions and regulations which would be intolerable. The noble Earl had referred to a considerable number of societies in London: but he would ask him to consider what the effect of the Bill would be upon many of the small charities in country districts? Take the case of a parochial clothing fund, in which the wife of the parson associated with a few other ladies in the parish to benefit the poor. These ladies would be required by the Bill to keep or cause to be kept a book or books containing particulars of all moneys or goods received by them; particulars of the manner in which all moneys received by them had been paid or applied: to keep a register of all officers, agents, collectors, and all other persons, whether paid or unpaid, who might be in any wise employed by or assist in the management of such charitable association. They were further required to allow donors to inspect the register and all other books or documents for at least two hours during every day in which the office of the association was open for business, and also to send them every year a report and balance-sheet, giving full, true, and particular accounts of all receipts and disbursements. Any person contravening these provisions was to be liable to a penalty of 40s. for every offence. It was very hard to impose those severe restrictions on persons who were pursuing a laudable object in various parts of the country. If the noble Earl could not devise any other remedy except by harassing and worrying those innocent people, it would be better to let fools remain unprotected. Clause 4 declared that any person who, among other things, destroyed, altered, mutilated, or falsified any book or paper belonging to any charitable association, should be liable to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for any period not exceeding six months. So that if a clerk within the office of a charitable association tore up a paper he might be sent to prison for six months. Again a like penalty was imposed on those who published or occurred in publishing any written statement or account which turned out to be false. The impression left upon his mind by a perusal of the Bill was that it had not passed through the hands of a Parliamentary draftsman: the penalties proposed were out of all proportion to the offences dealt with; and any clear case of fraud such as was here provided against would be much better dealt with by the ordinary law.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR agreed that the Bill, however excellent in intention, was entirely impracticable, and it was a serious question whether their Lordships should give it a second reading. The effect of passing it would simply be that no man or woman of sense would have anything whatever to do with any charitable institution. Let their Lordships only conceive of excellent charitable ladies in town or country, not accustomed, perhaps, to business, if they "omitted, or committed in omitting, any material particular in any book of account or other document," being liable, without the option even of a fine, to be kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding six months, and if the offence were repeated, to be sentenced to penal servitude for a term not exceeding seven years.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that after what had fallen from the Lord Chancellor, he would not press their Lordships to read the Bill the second time. But it was no encouragement to any person wishing to remedy a flagrant and admitted abuse to find himself at the outset met, not with the support which he might have expected, but with language such as might make him shrink from his attempt.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR assured the noble Earl that he did not attribute to him, but to the draftsman of his Bill, the provisions which he had criticized. The noble Earl would admit that those who were responsible for the administration of the law, and for advising either House of Parliament as to the effect of Bills to amend the law, ought to be most careful before they committed themselves to provisions of the nature of those to which he had referred, and that if they were of opinion that more harm than good would be done by them, it was the duty of one occupying his position to point out that such, in his opinion, would be the effect of the measure.

Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, 'till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE—LETTERS OF THE PRIMATES.—QUESTIONS.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the public admission by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York that there is "a real danger" of "a considerable minority of the clergy and laity of the Church of England desiring to subvert the principles of the Reformation," and to their assertion in the same document that "the very existence of our national institutions for the maintenance of religion is imperilled;" and further to the fact, that 480 clergymen of the Church of England have petitioned Convocation in favour of the revival in the Established Church of Sacramental Confession, of an order of Confessors, and of many other services and ceremonies abolished at the Reformation; and, whether he will be prepared to introduce a Bill next Session, in accordance with the Second Report of the Royal Commission on Ritual, passed by a large majority of the Commissioners, whereby "a speedy and inexpensive remedy shall be provided for parishioners," against the introduction into their parish churches of certain practices at variance with the usages and principles of the Established Church, and "the bishop shall be bound to inquire into" the formal complaints of parishioners, and "to enforce summarily the discontinuance" of all such illegal practices?

MR. GLADSTONE: Of course, Sir, the Government has obtained the same information on the subject referred to as has the rest of the public, through the medium of the public journals. But we have obtained officially no information, and we do not think that the subject comes before us in a manner connected with our public responsibilities. In regard to the noble Lord's second Question, which no doubt refers to the Report of the Commissioners on Ritual, dated in the year 1868, in that Report the Commissioners offered certain recommendations in regard to the relations of the Church, and the regulations in respect to the introduction of vestments, lights, and incense. As I understand, I do not imagine that that particular question has any connection with the subject-matter of the noble Lord's first inquiry. But when the noble Lord asks me whether the Government will be prepared to bring in a Bill next Session, in accordance with the Second Report of the Royal Commission on Ritual, I am bound to say that the Government have not taken into their consideration what Bills they may or may not introduce next Session. In respect to the subject itself—namely, that of protecting members of the congregation of the Church of England against any alteration in regard to matters of ceremonial —that, I admit, is a sound principle. That is the principle on which I understand the recommendations of the Commissioners were based. Probably the noble Lord's information is as good as mine when I state that neither the present nor any former Government has ever moved to bring in any Bill on the subject. As I understand, the reason given for not doing so was that it was supposed that the questions which were pending in the Ecclesiastical Courts would lead to a settlement of these matters; but upon neither of the subject-matters of these Questions has the Government received any communication from the leading Prelates or heads of the Church.

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, in consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply which has just been made by the First Minister of the Crown, I beg to give Notice that, unless at the opening of next Session a Bill on this subject is brought forward, either by the Government or by some hon. Member who is more experienced than myself, I shall, at the very beginning of the Session, move for leave to introduce a Bill to give a speedy and inexpensive remedy against the introduction and continuance of practices contrary to law in churches belonging to the Church of England as by law established.

MR. WHALLEY said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the attention of the Government had not been drawn to this subject. ["Order!"] It would, however, be in the recollection of the House that he himself introduced a Bill for that very purpose. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the hon. Gentleman, although he might make an explanation, if he thought it necessary, could not say anything which might give rise to a debate.

MR. WHALLEY said, he only wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether, if the Bill were again brought forward, he would give it his support? Its object was to restore to the laity the power of prosecuting, instead of leaving it in the hands of the Bishops.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry, Sir, to be obliged to state that my attention was never drawn to the hon. Member's Bill. The Question of the hon. Gentleman appears to be quite different from that of the noble Lord opposite. I confinied my reply to the matters to which the noble Lord directed my attention, and if the hon. Gentleman will place on the Paper, in such a manner as I can understand it, any Question he may wish to put to me, I will take care to answer it.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL CORBETT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the counties in which it is proposed to raise fresh regiments of Militia have been selected on account of an unusual increase in their population; and, if not, whether that will be carefully considered, so as to avoid the hardship which would be inflicted on those districts if they should be at any time called upon to provide the extra quota by ballot; and, whether the quota can be legally altered in some counties only, and not over the whole Country?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, The recruiting proposed is entirely voluntary, and the increase of existing regiments, or the creation of second battalions in any county, will depend upon its recruiting capacity, as tested by voluntary enrolment. No change is intended in the liability of any county to supply men by ballot, while we can obtain enough under the present system.

THE CHOLERA—QUESTION.

MR. DENT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he will issue without delay, to Sanitary Authorities, plain directions as to the precautions to be taken for preventing the spread of Cholera, and also instructions as to the treatment of the disease, should it unfortunately reach this Country?

MR. STANSFELD: Sir, Plain directions as to the precautions to be taken for preventing the spread of Cholera have been prepared; but we do not propose to do what has never been done before to my knowledge—namely, to give directions to the medical men in the various localities as to the treatment of Cholera.

ARMY—ARTILLERY—CONVERSION OF CAST-IRON GUNS.—QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be true that the conversion upon Palliser's plan of cast-iron 32-pounders had proved so successful as to have induced the Ordnance Authorities to order the heavy 68-pounder smooth-bore cast-iron guns to be converted upon the same system into rifled 80-pounders; Whether he would state what number of cast-iron guns had been converted up to the present time, and also in round numbers how many cast-irons guns there are in the various fortifications, arsenals, and dock-yards at home and abroad which are available for conversion into 80-pounders, 64-pounders, and 56-pounders; Whether the old smooth-bores are not quite useless, and the converted guns thoroughly efficient in every respect; And, if Sir William Palliser had perfected the construction of the converted gun to such an extent by experiments made at his own expense that no alteration or improvement had been made in his plans?

Sir HENRY STORKS: Sir, the conversion of cast-iron guns into rifled ordnance has been going on since 1868, in accordance with the recommendations of the late Ordnance Select Committee, whose Report, dated the 29th of January, 1868, was presented to the House of Commons by command. The conversion into 64-pounders commenced in 1868, and the order for proceeding with the heavier 80-pounder guns was given in 1870. 1,146 guns have been converted up to the present time, and there are, in round numbers, between 8,000 and 9,000 cast-irons guns at home and abroad which are available for conversion, if required. The converted guns are efficient weapons, but smooth-bores are not quite useless. Extensive experiments were made with converted guns at the public expense before they were adopted into the service; other experiments were made at the cost of Sir William Palliser, and the grant awarded to him was accepted by him in full discharge of all claims.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—NEW APPOINTMENTS.—QUESTION.

Mr. WHITE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it be the intention of the Government to introduce this Session a Bill in accordance with the last recommendation of the Second Report of the Civil Services Expenditure Committee, enacting that, no vacancy in a salaried office in any of the establishments therein referred to, be permanently filled up without the previous consent, in writing, of the First Lord of the Treasury for the time being; and that every person so appointed shall take his office, subject to such alteration as to its salary or pension (whether on superannuation or abolition) as may be determined by Parliament, and laying down a Rule as to rate of compensation on the abolition hereafter of offices in judicial establishments?

Mr. GLADSTONE in reply, said, that the Report of the Committee made certain recommendations as to the measures to be adopted until the establishments in question had been revised. This matter would be carefully considered by the Government, who sympathized entirely with the Committee as to the purposes they had in view; but, on looking closely at the subject, he had found there would be very considerable difficulty in framing a Bill with an expectation of passing it with general satisfaction at that late period of the year. He did not say the Government would not take that course; but they had deemed it right to consider whether the objects in view could not be attained by an arrangement between the Lord Chancellor and the Judges in whose hands the matter was placed. His noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor was at present, therefore, in communication with those Judges on the subject, and he hoped to be able in a short time to state whether they had succeeded in effecting an arrangement.

SUNDAY TRADING PROSECUTIONS—SUNDAY OBSERVATION AMENDMENT ACT, 1872.—QUESTION.

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of William Garner, who has been sentenced to seven days' imprisonment for selling a penny bottle of gingerbeer in the parish of St. Pancras, in default of payment of seven shillings fine and costs; whether his attention has been called to the numerous prosecutions in three London parishes against the humbler class of Sunday traders; whether he intends to propose any modification of the existing Law and, whether he intends to propose the renewal of the Sunday Observation Amendment Act of 1871, which expires this year?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, William Garner was prosecuted with the sanction of the Chief Commissioner of Police by the parochial authorities of St. Pancras, and sentenced to pay a fine of 5s. and 2s. costs, or, in default of payment, to seven days' imprisonment, not for selling a bottle of ginger-beer, but for exercising his trade as a bird-seller on Sunday, the 23rd of June. He had been three times previously convicted. On the first occasion he was let off with a fine of 1s., and each of the other occasions 5s., the full penalty, which was paid. On the occasion referred to it was proved that his shop was full of customers, and as he would not pay the fine he was sent to prison, from which he was released in the course of three days on paying the fine. I have communicated with the magistrates acting for the districts in which Sunday trading is most rife, and with the Chief Commissioner of Police as to the working of the Act of 1871. All concur in stating that the Act has been enforced with moderation, and that, while it does not interfere with the legitimate wants of the working population, a very considerable improvement has been made in the order and decency of the streets after half-past 10 o'clock on Sunday mornings. The following is an extract from the Report of one of the police magistrates acting for Southwark—

"When it is remembered that less than two years since 'The Cut' was a notorious Sunday market and fair, the resort of from 20,000 to 30,000 people collected from all parts of London, where costermongers, sham auctioneers, toy-sellers, quack medicine vendors, and dog and bird dealers vied with each other in noisy clamour, when the streets were impassable to vehicles, and blocked against foot-passengers resorting to their several places of worship, I consider the contrast which the same thoroughfare now presents of comparative freedom and quietude after half-past 10 in the morning is a sufficient compensation for the trouble and anxiety which have undoubtedly been occasioned to all the authorities concerned."

I believe that these results have not been obtained without numerous prosecutions; but the result has been a general acquiescence on the part of the costermongers and the large majority of the shopkeepers with the law as enforced in these districts. I do not, therefore, propose to make any modification of the existing Law, and I do propose to renew the Sunday Observation Amendment Act, 1871.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR gave Notice that he should oppose any renewal of the Act.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1872—HEALTH OF THE PORT OF LONDON.

QUESTION.

MR. CADOGAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he can inform the House what steps, if any, the Corporation of the city of London have taken in fulfilment of their duties as the sanitary authority of the Port of London under the Public Health Act of 1872?

MR. STANSFELD in reply, said, there had no doubt been some delay on the part of the Corporation, who were the sanitary authority of the port of London, in fulfilling their duties under the Public Health Act of 1872. But some arrangements had now been made by the sanitary authority. One of Her Majesty's ships had been placed at the disposal of the Corporation by the Admiralty, for the purpose of a hospital ship, and would be moored off Gravesend. A duly qualified medical practitioner had been appointed to take charge of that ship, with authority to appoint an assistant medical officer if necessary, and two ship-keepers would reside on board with their wives, who would act as nurses when required. Every precaution had been taken, and in cases of emergency the Directors of the Seamen's Hospital at Greenwich were prepared to receive a limited number of cholera cases. Arrangements had also been made for the treatment of dangerous infectious diseases.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—BILLS WITHDRAWN.

QUESTIONS.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is the intention of Government to proceed with the Bank of England Notes Bill this Session; and, if so, when it will be put upon the Order Sheet in such a position as to give reasonable chance of its coming on?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I am sorry to say that we do not see any probability of being able to obtain from the House during the present Session the degree of attention which this measure deserves and would require; and that being so, we do not intend to proceed with it. The Question seems to afford a suitable opportunity of referring to several other Bills, as it will be a matter of convenience to hon. Members that their attention should not be claimed by subjects which there is no intention of carrying to a practical issue. The first Bill to which I will refer is No. 7, on the list for second reading—the Trade Marks Registration Bill. That is a measure with respect to which the President of the Board of Trade is of opinion that it will not be in his power to pass it during the present Session, and his intention therefore is to withdraw it. The Prevention of Crime Bill stands No. 15 on to-day's list for Committee; and upon that subject my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary observed the state of opinion in the House on the occasion of the Second Reading. He has accordingly been considering the expediency of consolidating the Law upon that and upon cognate subjects connected with the Prevention of Crime Acts—the Penal Servitude Act and the Convicted Prisoners Acts. Bills are now in operation for the purpose of consolidating the law on these subjects; but it will not be practicable to introduce them, at least not to prosecute them, during the present Session, and therefore he looks to endeavour to deal with them during the coming Session. No. 16 is the Bank of England Notes Bill. No. 17 is the Building Societies (No. 3) Bill. It is not intended to proceed with that Bill during the present Session. Nor with the next on the list, the Fisheries (Ireland) Bill. No. 20 is the Public Prosecutors Bill. That is a subject of great importance, but requiring much attention, and probably more time for discussion than can be given to it in the present Session. We do not, therefore, propose to proceed with it. That makes in all six Government Bills, now upon the list, which we propose to remove from the list, and which will not appear in it after to-night. As I am upon the procedure of the House, I have to state, with reference to the Vote of the House on Friday night, upon the salaries of the Civil Service in Ireland that, in redemption of the pledge we gave, it is our intention to appoint a Departmental Committee, which will examine into the position, emoluments, and conditions of service of the Civil Service in Ireland, and will go through such of the different establishments as may apply for examination into their cases.

MR. ANDERSON said, that owing to the reply just given respecting the Bank of England Notes Bill, he would give Notice that, early next Session, if they had another, he should call attention to the subject of the Currency and again move for a Committee to inquire into the subject.

COLONEL STUART KNOX asked the right hon. Gentleman to state, What were the intentions of the Government with respect to the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) (Judges) Bill? Most Irish Members were about to go off to the Assizes, and surely it was not intended to proceed with a Bill of that importance in their absence?

MR. GLADSTONE: My noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland is considering the subject of the Bill, and will be prepared very shortly to state his intentions.

MR. DISRAELI: There is another Bill, No. 22 on the Orders, the Consolidated Rate Bill, and I think we understood from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that it would be withdrawn.

MR. STANSFELD: Yes, it will not be proceeded with.

MR. DISRAELI: It will be convenient to the House to know what Business will be taken at the morning sitting to-morrow.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Judicature Bill.

In reply to Mr. DILLWYN,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he intended to withdraw the Building Societies Bill which stood in his name; but should on the first day of next Session introduce a measure drawn on the same lines.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1872—THE THAMES PILOTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any provision has been made to provide compensation to the River Thames Pilots in consequence of the late influx of a class of men empowered by a recent Trinity House by-law to underbid them in pilotage charges; whether it is true that the change complained of was petitioned against by the Shipowners of the Port of London, and that the new men themselves have been systematically and notoriously breaking the law for years past; whether any inquiry has been made into the fate of the "Chillingham Castle," which vessel was lost in or about the month of February last, with all hands (twenty-six persons in number); and, further, if any inquiry is intended to be made into this case?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1872, the Trinity House were empowered, with the consent of the Queen in Council, to relax within the whole or part of their district the then existing law which compelled every pilot to demand, and every shipmaster to pay, a fixed rate for pilotage services. The Trinity House have, accordingly, within a part of their district—namely, between Gravesend and London Bridge—relaxed that rule, but only with respect to ships exempted from compulsory pilotage. The Trinity House have also obtained by Order in Council powers to licence a qualified class of men who are to be available for that particular service only; but the other licensed Thames pilots are not debarred from being also employed on that particular service, and are now, under the Act of 1872, enabled to pilot exempted ships at the same reduced rates. These men can consequently, if they wish, prevent themselves being underbid by the new class of men, and no provision has been made for compensating them. Nor was any compensation thought due under the circumstances. Generally speaking, the newly-licensed men have been for a long time employed in piloting ships above Gravesend without being licensed, and the trade of the Thames could not get on without them. It was for the purpose of bringing these men within the law and under the control of the duly constituted pilotage authority, that the law was altered. Certain shipowners and underwriters of the City and Port of London appear to have petitioned the House of Commons in 1871 against the change; but Parliament thought fit to pass the Merchant Shipping Act, 1872, which gave to the Trinity House the powers they have recently exercised, and no objection appears to have since been made by shipowners. The Correspondence on the subject will be found in Parliamentary Paper, No. 349, of last Session, and in another Paper of the previous Session. An inquiry has been ordered into the loss of the Chillingham Castle, and the matter is now in the hands of the Solicitor to the Board; but, unfortunately, the vessel disappeared with all hands.

SCOTLAND—SHERIFF SUBSTITUTES (SCOTLAND) SALARIES.

QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, as the Committee on Civil Services Expenditure have now reported, it is the intention of the Treasury to resume consideration of any applications for increase of salary which may have been made by sheriff-substitutes, in accordance with the assurance recently given in this House, that such applications would be considered on their individual merits.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, we are quite ready to consider these applications when they are made.

BALLOT ACT—UNIVERSITY ELECTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. HARDCASTLE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, seeing that the Ballot Act does not apply to University Elections, it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to regulate the time for holding Elections for the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin, such time being not now regulated by any Act of Parliament?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the hon. Gentleman was quite right in believing that the Ballot Act did not affect the University Elections except as regarded the personation of electors. The Government did not think there was any reason to regulate the time of holding Elections for the Universities in consequence of the passing of the Ballot Act.

SANITARY STATUTES (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the President of the Local Government Board for Ireland,

Whether he will cause to be prepared and will lay upon the Table of this House, Digests of the Statutes in force in Ireland relating to urban and rural sanitary authorities, similar to the Digests of Statutes on these subjects in force in England which have lately been presented to Parliament?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, that the Act now in operation did not apply to Ireland. It was therefore thought better to postpone the consideration of preparing the Digests of the Statutes in force in Ireland until the necessary Act was passed, which he hoped would take place before long.

FRANCE—THE COMMERCIAL TREATY.

QUESTION.

MR. BROCKLEHURST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay upon the Table of the House, the Correspondence and Papers adverted to in the Queen's Speech between the English and French Governments relative to the termination of the Commercial Treaty of 1860; and, the Correspondence and details of the communications that have passed between the two Governments upon the compensatory and other duties under the Treaty of Commerce with France, signed on the 5th of November, 1872; together with the negotiations and proceedings of the Commissioners appointed thereon at Paris?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, a great deal of the Correspondence relating to the termination of the Treaty of 1860 has become superseded by the recent course of events in France. Her Majesty's Government will, however, lay before the House before the end of the Session, the Reports of the proceedings of the Tariff Commission at Paris, and such other Papers as may be of interest and can properly be communicated to the House without interference with the negotiations now being undertaken at Paris.

EDUCATION—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, When his Report for this year will be delivered; whether in future years it could be presented before the Education Estimates are discussed; and, whether the Evidence taken by the Endowed Schools Committee will be circulated before the Bill is brought on for a Second Reading.

MR. W. E. FORSTER in reply, said, that the Education Report for that year was now being printed, and he believed it would be delivered in a day or two. He was exceedingly anxious that the Report should be delivered at an earlier period of the Session, and before the Education Estimates came on for discussion. That course, however, had been found to be impossible that year; but he trusted to be able to make arrangements with Sir Francis Sandford by which he hoped the Report would be presented in future in May. He was told the evidence taken by the Endowed Schools Committee would be in circulation by Thursday. The second reading of the Bill dealing with the question was down for that night, and unless he was urged to the contrary he would ask for a second reading, on the understanding that nothing more would be conceded by it than that the Reform should be continued, and that ample opportunity should be afforded for the discussion of the measure on some future occasion. If such an arrangement as that were not acceptable to the House he was afraid the second reading must be postponed. In any case, however, the time at which the Elementary Education Act Amendment Bill would be brought in must depend upon the progress made with the Judicature Bill.

INDIA—THE 28TH REGIMENT—THE INDIAN MUTINY MEDAL.

QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the War Office to grant the Indian medal to the wing of the 28th Regiment engaged in the operations in the Gulf of Cutch, against the towns of Beyt and Dwaka, in the month of October, 1859, in accordance with the terms of the General Order headed Bombay Castle, and bearing date the 26th of June, 1867 (No. 412 of 1867)?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that it is not intended to grant the Indian Mutiny medal for the Dwaka and Beyt operations, because the Government of Bombay and the Commander-in-Chief in India have reported that these operations were quite unconnected with the Indian Mutiny.

SCOTLAND—CIVIL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked, Whether the Committee charged with the consideration of the salaries paid to the Civil Servants in Ireland would also consider those paid to the Civil Servants in Scotland?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, all those things must come in succession, and that, undoubtedly, the claim of Scotland would be quite as strong as the claim of Ireland.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL—[BILL 154.]—(Lords.)

(The Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 4th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 24 (Vacations).

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 10, to leave out from the words "upon any" to the words "hereinafter mentioned," all inclusive, in line 15:—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. RYLANDS, in supporting the Amendment, said, that Parliament had a right to ask that the vacations of the Judges, who were public servants, and who as such were paid for their services, should not depend upon their own absolute decision. If the Amendment were carried, he believed it would tend to satisfy the demands of the public, who had a right to complain that the Courts were so long closed to suitors.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON protested against the low view which the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) had taken of the subject. He had spoken of the Judges as he might have spoken of clerks behind a counter. The hon. Member's tone was, that because we paid the Judges they ought not to be trusted with a voice as to the vacations. But their salaries, he would observe, were by no means the entire compensation for their labours and services. The honour and dignity of the Bench were important items and one part of the remuneration which attracted men of eminence to fill Judicial offices. At the same time, he thought that the Courts of Law might make such arrangements that suitors should no longer be kept waiting for three months for the decision of their causes. To leave the Ministers to fix the vacation of the Judges would be to leave these arrangements to those who had not the requisite knowledge, and who, as Ministers of the Crown, ought not to have the smallest control over the independence of the Bench. He should have no objection, however, that Parliament should legislate on the subject.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he was informed that of the two Vacation Judges, while the Common Law Judge sat in London, the Chancery Judge did not, so that persons who had to make application to the latter had to go to Carlisle, or wherever he might appoint. That was a glaring fault; and he held that during the Vacation the Chancery Judge should be bound to sit in London.

MR. HINDE PALMER thought the hon. and learned Attorney General might virtually accede to the Amendment by allowing it to stand thus—"Her Majesty in Council may make rules." Of course, Her Majesty would not make rules without consulting proper persons.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, there was nothing very serious in the Amendment, and there were some Amendments which he intended to propose, which he hoped would meet all the reasonable requirements of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt). It was, however, due to the profession and the Judges that the accurate state of the case should be known. At present, the vacations were fixed by Act of Parliament, and everybody took his situation, and everything was conducted on the footing which the Act of Parliament had fixed. He was not, therefore, disposed to allow that a change of that kind should be made by any authority short of Parliament, or some authority to which Parliament had delegated the power. His hon. and learned Friend had told an amusing story about Vice Chancellor Shadwell administering equity in his bath; but the truth was, that the Vice Chancellor while taking a bath was once called on to grant an injunction, and having finished his bath he did so. His hon. and learned Friend had remarked that thus far the Bill had done everything for the profession, and nothing for the public. That statement did not accurately describe the effect of the first 24 clauses of the Bill. If, however, the profession suffered, it would have to get on as best it could; and as he had full confidence in the pugnacity of Englishmen, he thought the profession would get on very well. Neither did he think it at all fair or accurate to say that the vacations had all been regulated, with a view to keep the business in the hands of a few people, and disregarding the general mass of the profession. His hon. and learned Friend did not like to see the Judges trusted with fixing the vacations; but the only alternative which had been suggested was, to place the matter in the hands of the Government, which in that case really meant the Lord Chancellor, for the Lord Chancellor was the man to whom the Government would naturally look for advice, and the Lord Chancellor would never act without consulting the Judges. It was far better to say what was really meant, and the clause was therefore drawn in plain terms; for if the Committee meant that those at the head of the profession should have charge of the arrangements, it was better that they should say so. Some rather strong and extravagant statements had been made by his hon. and learned Friend. It was not correct to say that there was a terrible collapse of business, and, in fact, that nothing was done during the Long Vacation. A great many very important Courts were going on until the middle of September. The circuits were going on, and many important avenues of business were open up to that time. His hon. and learned Friend had forgotten that in Chancery, the Accountant General no longer existed, and that the Paymaster General's office was always open, and there was no longer any difficulty in getting out large sums of money. Then there was a Vacation Judge who sat and attended to all pressing business. About the Vice Chancellors he had not the same individual knowledge; but he felt sure if it was the Vice Chancellors' duty to sit during the vacation, they did their duty. He had heard distinguished Equity lawyers say that the Court of Chancery was always open, and that if you wanted any real damage remedied or wrong prevented you could always get it done in the Long Vacation. But the Courts of Common Law were governed by ancient and obsolete rules which could scarcely admit of justification now, and he saw no reason why those Courts should not be as accessible during the Long Vacation as the Equity Courts. It was right, therefore, to say that something more should be done, and that Law should not cease any more than Equity. But what did the Bill propose to do? Why in the very next section it said—

"Provision shall be made by Rules of Court for the hearing during vacation by the Judges of the High Court of Justice and the Court of Appeal respectively of all such applications as may require to be immediately or promptly heard."

And the 36th section provided that any Judge of the said High Court of Justice might, subject to any rules of Court exercise in Court or in Chambers all or any part of the jurisdiction vested in the said High Court in all such causes and matters, and in all such proceedings in any causes or matters as before the passing of the Act might have been heard in Court or in Chambers respectively, by a single Judge of any of the Courts whose jurisdiction is hereby transferred to the said High Court, or as might be directed or authorized to be so heard by any Rules of Court to be hereafter made. In all such cases, any Judge sitting in Court shall be deemed to constitute a Court. If what his hon. and learned Friend wanted was that there should be no period during the Long Vacation when either at Law or in Equity wrongs should remain unredressed, he was prepared to agree with him; that was perfectly reasonable, and it was provided for in the Bill. But if his hon. and learned Friend wanted that there should be no difference between the Long Vacation and the rest of the year; that there should be no break, but a permanently sitting Court, only with a relay of Judges and counsel, he was utterly opposed to him. It was an unreasonable request, and he could give no countenance to it. He frankly admitted that there was an objection to the present state of things, and that it was only reasonable it should be removed if possible, so far as it was not already removed by the Bill as it stood. He did not think the vacations were unreasonably long, and felt satisfied, that it was true economy to keep matters as they were at present in that respect, as he did not see that we should be a bit the better for killing off all our Judges by working them too continuously. Every country with which he was acquainted found vacations necessary; and he believed they were true economy. He was quite willing, however, to make certain alterations in the clause, so as to provide that the consent of the Lord Chancellor would be required before the recommendation of the Judges could be carried out. There ought to be some one who would be responsible to the public for any change that was made, and who, when any question was raised, could say—"I am the person by whose authority or under whose consent the thing was done." He therefore proposed, after the word "herein," to insert "with the consent of the Lord Chancellor." He was also prepared to make another alteration. He believed the present vacations were quite long enough, though not unreasonably long, and he would add a Proviso to the clause, declaring that the total duration of the vacations should never in any case exceed the time now given to them. Further than that, he was not prepared to go. He did not believe that the Judges as a body would be insensible to calls of duty.

Dr. BALL said, he did not know what would become of the unfortunate Law Officers if they were worked all the year round. Human beings must have some rest, and nothing would be gained by abridging the vacation. He was opposed to interfering in any manner with the present system of leaving to the discretion of the Judges what should be the limit of the vacation, believing, as he did, that they were totally incapable of doing anything that they did not consider to be justified by the requirements of the case. No ground whatever had been shown for interfering with it.

In reply to Mr. T. HUGHES,

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that, in consequence of the change which had been made relative to the Accountant General's Department the Paymaster

General's office was open all the year round, and there would be no difficulty in payments being made in the case of infants coming of age during the vacation, or in other cases of a pressing nature, in which payments had been ordered. With regard to the presence of an Equity Judge in London during the vacation, he hoped arrangements would be made to provide for that; but he did not think it would be desirable that provision should be made in that matter by Act of Parliament. He must again assert that the public had benefited by all the law reforms of this century, and he challenged the hon. and learned Member for Oxford to prove his assertion to the contrary. He was by no means unprepared or unwilling to accept the criticism of the hon. and learned Member that his own diction was occasionally more forcible than elegant; but he would remind the hon. and learned Member of the proverb about those who live in glass houses. As to his statement about there being as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, it must not be forgotten that you must catch your fish; you must not get rid of those who are fit on the chance of finding others in the wide expanse of the sea. It was an undeserved slur on the Judges to say they consulted their own interests in preference to those of the public. All the present Judges had accepted office under statutes by which the vacations were secured to them. If the Judges and the Queen in Council did not do what was right, the hon. and learned Member could bring in an amending Bill.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, it was hardly worth while noticing the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, who had the advantage in the matter of diction, while his degree of earnestness in the matter of law reform was sufficiently well known. No answer had been given to the question whether the Vacation Vice Chancellor would remain in town; all that had been conceded was that on the whole Carlisle was a little too far off for a Vacation Judge's residence. In the present state of the law, if a Vice Chancellor had wrongly refused an injunction, injustice might be done for months before there could be an appeal; and as the Judges had hitherto so interpreted the law as to allow of a Judge being at an inaccessible distance, what security was there they would not continue to do so, and why should not security be taken in this Bill? As to the alteration the hon. and learned Attorney General proposed to make with reference to the duration of the vacations, it was no great concession to say that they should not be made longer than they were at present, considering that, taken altogether, they extended to some four months in the year. The 36th clause provided that one Judge should on occasions do the business of two Judges. Well that might be, but what was wanted was to strengthen the 25th clause. Why need the 21 Judges all work together and all stop together? He was glad the Attorney General did not endorse the interests of peace theory of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. E. Lewis), who managed to enjoy his own vacation without closing the office of the firm of solicitors with which he was connected.

MR. LOPES said, he was never more astounded than in hearing it proposed that the Judges should have a vacation extending over four months. In his opinion, speaking of the Common Law Judges, ten weeks would be amply sufficient vacation. Practically the Long Vacation was only of about ten weeks' duration, and there was a Judge always sitting in Chambers in London during the whole of that time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would agree to the insertion of words in the following clause, to the effect that provision should be made for the hearing of cases when necessary during the vacation in London and Middlesex.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he would beg leave to withdraw his Amendment in favour of that proposed by the Attorney General.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

Clause 25 (Sittings in vacation).

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Clause amended by the insertion of the words "in London or Middlesex," at end.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Jurisdiction of Judges of High Court on circuit).

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, there were, under the existing administration of the law, five separate commissions—namely, of Assize, Nisi Prius, Oyer and Terminer, General Gaol Delivery, and a General Commission of the Peace, under which the business was transacted on circuit, and in that system the Judicature Commission recommended a change. At present, where issues of law and fact were raised, the issues of fact were tried and disposed of by Judge and jury; but the questions of law were decided by the Judges sitting in Banco at Westminster. By the clause, however, as he read it, it was proposed that Judges might be sent down into any district, and there decide all issues, both of law and fact, however raised. He thought such a course most undesirable, and that as it stood, it was calculated to have the effect of decentralizing the High Court at a time when such a course was most unwise and unnecessary. Were Judges to take their law libraries with them to those districts? Without the authorities, it would be undesirable for them to be called upon to decide important and difficult issues of law, and he saw no reason for removing the tribunal constituted to decide such questions of law from Westminster, and he would therefore move an Amendment to leave out in page 17, line 37, the words "or of law, or partly of fact and partly of law."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, his hon. and learned Friend had, to his mind, altogether misunderstood the clause. He had no idea that, under the clause, questions of law would be decided by the Courts sitting in Banco in the country; but what the clause intended was, that when a Judge of the High Court went into the country to try issues before a jury, he would be clothed, under certain restrictions, with the whole power of the full Court, including questions of law, subject to appeal. That was a leading principle of the Bill, which the Amendment, if carried, would mutilate.

MR. LOPES thought that on questions of demurrer the matters ought to be submitted to the full Court sitting in Banco at Westminster.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL signified his assent.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, after what the hon. and learned Attorney General had stated, he would, with the assent of the Committee, withdraw his Amendment.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

MR. WHALLEY said, the measure was one of the most revolutionary that had ever entered into the mind of any lawyer or statesman to conceive. It was a reversal of all practice and of every theory on which all practice existed. He had never heard of such a thing before, as that a Judge should have power to decide questions of law in district Courts. It was proposed, too, by the Bill, that where there were questions of variance between Law and Equity, that Equity should prevail. At present, the country had a tribunal constituted of four Judges sitting in Banco at Westminster, to whom questions of law raised and reserved at trials were submitted, and he had never heard any expression of dissatisfaction with their decisions; yet it was now proposed to delegate the power of the full Court to one Judge, sitting in a district Court, to decide upon what might be a most important question of law.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RATHBONE moved an Amendment, the effect of which would be to empower any delegation from the Supreme Court going Assizes to decide upon issues both of law and fact, on the application of the plaintiff.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had no objection to the Amendment, if it were so modified as to place both parties to the suit in the same position.

Amendment amended accordingly, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 27 (Sittings for trial by jury in London and Middlesex).

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved as an Amendment, in page 18, line 4, before "Middlesex," to insert "Lancashire;" and in line 9, before "Middlesex," to insert "Lancashire," and said, his object in proposing the Amendment was, that when the Judges arrived at Liverpool, they should continue to sit there until all the assize business was over. The causes which arose there were of far more importance than to be slurred over in the hurry-scurry of an Assize.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he admitted the grievance, but if Government yielded to the hon. Gentleman's request in respect to Liverpool, it would be impossible to resist similar proposals from Leeds, Bristol, Birmingham, and other large towns, so that the question came to this, whether they were to have a central Court and a central Bar, presided over by highly-trained Judges, or whether they were in different parts of the country to set up Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction with those at Westminster. The question had been much debated by the Judicature Commission, the majority of whom, after full consideration, were opposed to the setting up of provincial Courts. The Bill was accordingly framed on the view opposed to that taken by the hon. Gentleman, and the House of Lords sanctioned the Bill. He (the Attorney General) under those circumstances, felt it his duty to oppose the Amendment, which went to the root of the Bill; but he admitted that he performed that duty reluctantly, as those persons might be aware who had read the observations he made on the subject during last autumn. However, he hoped that, under the Bill, there would be a greater economy of judicial power, and that some more rational arrangements might be made.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that having heard the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he was willing to withdraw the Amendment, but hoped the Government would do all in their power to effect its object.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON suggested that when the Government came to consider the question of the re-adjustment of the circuits, they should appoint a separate circuit for Lancashire, in order that the numerous causes which arose in the great commercial cities in that county might be disposed of without unreasonable delay.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 28 (Divisions of the High Court of Justice).

MR. RAIKES moved as an Amendment, in page 18, line 21, to leave out sub-section 1. Its effect would be to restore to the Common Law Divisions the precedence over the Chancery Divisions of the High Court which the sub-section had deprived them of.

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 21, to leave out from the words "one division" to the word "division," in line 28.—(Mr. Raikes.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he regarded the question raised by the hon. and learned Member as of slight importance, and he trusted that he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. RAIKES said, that under those circumstances, he felt bound to say a few words in support of his Amendment. It was generally understood in this country that the Lord Chief Justice of England had precedence over all other Judges except the Lord Chancellor, and in the Bill as originally introduced by Her Majesty's Government, the Division of the High Court over which the Lord Chief Justice was to preside, was made the First Division. In consequence, however, of the Amendment which was proposed by Lord Cairns, whereby the Lord Chancellor was made President of the High Court, being carried, it was thought fit that the Chancery Division, over which he was to preside, should take the first rank, and, accordingly, the Common Law Division over which the Lord Chief Justice was to preside, was reduced to the second rank. Since the Bill had come to that House, however, an Amendment had been adopted under which the Lord Chancellor was no longer a Member of the High Court, and under those circumstances the Presidency of that Court would again devolve on the Lord Chief Justice and therefore the Common Law Division over which he presided should again take the first rank.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to point out that by the Bill, for the first time in that kingdom, they were putting the Court of Chancery, which was a mere excrescence on the Common Law of the Land, and had, in fact, been a curse ever since it had been created, in a position of precedence and dignity before the Common Law Courts. He protested against that precedence being decided upon, without a word of explanation on the subject being offered by the Law Officers of the Crown.

MR. GORDON also remonstrated against the course the Government were pursuing.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had intended to show no want of respect either to the Committee or to the hon. and learned Member, and begged to remind hon. Members that although the Lord Chief Justice of England had precedence over all the Equity Judges except the Lord Chancellor, all the Equity Judges had precedence over all the Puisne Common Law Judges. The part of the clause now objected to had been carried by Lord Cairns in the other House, and was in no way dependent upon the position which the Lord Chancellor would hold in the High Court. Moreover, seeing that all the Courts would be amalgamated in a short time, he did not regard the question of precedence as being of much importance.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY said, that if a Division were taken, he should support the clause as it stood.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had never heard so extraordinary a statement as that the Court of Chancery was superior in dignity to the Common Law Courts.

MR. AMPHLETT thought if it was desirable the Bill should pass, it was undesirable to press Amendments which were not of great importance.

Question put, "That the words 'one division shall consist of' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 13: Majority 35.

On the Motion of Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Amendment made in page 18, after line 20, by leaving out sub-sections 1, 2, 3, and 4, and inserting the following sub-sections:—

"1. One division shall consist of the following judges (that is to say): the Master of the Rolls, who shall be President thereof, and the Vice Chancellors of the Court of Chancery, or such of them as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal;

"2. One other division shall consist of the following judges (that is to say): the Lord Chief Justice of England, who shall be President thereof, and such of the other judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal;

"3. One other division shall consist of the following judges (that is to say): the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, who shall be President thereof, and such of the other judges of the Court of Common Pleas as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal;

"4. One other division shall consist of the following judges (that is to say): the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, who shall be President thereof, and such of the other Barons of the Court of Exchequer as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal."

MR. C. E. LEWIS said, that if the clause were adopted as it now stood, the old divisions between Law and Equity and the old designations of the Law and Equity Courts would be perpetuated. There would still be the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Exchequer, Common Pleas, Probate, and Admiralty. That fact would, he could not but think, tend to prevent the effecting of that which was the main object of the Bill—namely, the fusion of Law and Equity. They ought not to inscribe any distinction on the portals of the High Court of Justice, and no sufficient reason could, he thought, be assigned for crystallizing those old distinctions, and he should therefore—with a view to the several Divisions of the High Court being known by numbers rather than by names—move that in page 19, line 14, the word “Chancery” be omitted, and the word “First” substituted.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 14, to leave out the word “Chancery,” in order to insert the word “first.”—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that while he did not disagree with it, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. The question had already been considered and disposed of on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), who moved that the titles of Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas should be abolished. That Motion was fully discussed, and it was rejected on a division. It would be going over the same ground to discuss and divide upon the present Amendment.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY hoped that, notwithstanding the verbal opposition of the hon. and learned Solicitor General to the Amendment, he would get the assent of his Colleagues to that which was evidently his own view of the question. There might be some reason for retaining for the present the titles of the heads of the Courts, but what reason was there for retaining for all time the titles by which Law and Equity had always heretofore been separated? He thought that if the Courts were respectively called First, Second, Third, and Fourth Divisions, the object of amalgamating Common Law and Equity would be more readily promoted. It was desirable to get rid of everything indicating that any Court had a particular class of business appropriated to it.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not agree that a previous division precluded the Committee from dealing with the Amendment, but would admit there was some strength in the argument as to the House of Lords.

MR. GORDON said, he agreed that that the best way of securing amalgamation was to get rid of the present names, and to distinguish the Divisions by calling them First, Second, Third, and Fourth. If the present distinctive names of the Courts were kept up, the Bill would soon have to be amended by another measure.

Question put, “That the word ‘Chancery’ stand part of the Clause.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 20: Majority 35.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 29 (Power to alter division by Order in Council).

MR. VERNON HARCOURT moved, as an Amendment, in page 19, line 36, to leave out “upon any,” to “hereinafter mentioned,” in line 38. The clause was an important one. In giving power for the reduction of the number of Divisions, the clauses provided ultimately for the diminution of the harmony which it was desirable should prevail in the transaction of the business of the Court. It was under that clause that that transformation would be effected, and it was made absolutely dependent on the Council of Judges. He thought Her Majesty in Council should recommend the reduction of the Divisions. Under the clause, the Order must be laid before Parliament to be confirmed; it was, therefore, really a Parliamentary enactment, and he did not see why the initiative should be reserved for the Council of Judges.

MR. GREGORY said, it would be a severe duty to impose upon the Judges, to ask them to decide upon their own extinction, and he thought it had much better be left to the Queen in Council.

MR. LOPES hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would not give way to the Amendment, as the Judges were, of all persons, the most competent to decide upon the organization and arrangements of the Divisions.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clause was absolutely necessary to the working of the Bill, and it was important that the words in question should be retained exactly as they stood.

Dr. BALL said, that when the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) became a Minister of the Crown he would use his power ruthlessly; and if it were only as a protection for themselves, some weight ought to be given to the Judges.

Mr. JAMES thought that, if the matter were left to the Judges, there would be no alteration made in these Divisions at all. It was delegating to those who ought to be reformed or altered, the power of altering or reforming themselves. He preferred the clause as it was proposed to be amended, under which it would be left to the Queen in Council, without consulting the Judges, to arrange for the Divisions of the Court.

Mr. F. S. POWELL deprecated the tone in which the Judges were spoken of by hon. Members of the Bar, and considered that great deference ought to be paid to the opinion of those eminent persons, who were by far the most competent to decide upon such a matter as this. Indeed, it should be left to them to decide upon what the course of business should be in their own Courts.

Mr. WHITWELL trusted the hon. and learned Attorney General would accept the Amendment.

Mr. AMPHLETT hoped the Government would adhere to the clause, which only enabled the Executive to do that by Rules and Orders which they might do by Act of Parliament.

Mr. SERJEANT SHERLOCK thought it would be a strange thing if such an alteration as that now proposed were to take place without consulting the Judges. That was an alteration in the system of the law which should be suggested, if at all, by the Judges themselves in the first instance.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, in replying generally to the objections made to his Amendment, said, that if the decisions were left to the Judges the clause would be utterly worthless.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, Amendment made in page 19, line 44, after "purpose," by inserting—

"And such order may provide for the extinction of the offices of any of the Judges who are constituted presidents of any of the divisions which may be reduced, and of the salaries, pensions, and patronage attached to such offices, notwithstanding anything in this Act relating to the continuance of such offices, salaries, pensions, and patronage."

The Attorney General

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved, as an Amendment, line 8, at end of clause, to add—

"Provided always, That the total number of the Judges of the Supreme Court shall not be increased by any such Order."

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that as the Amendment raised the whole question of the number of the Judges, he would take the opportunity of calling attention to the pledges given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General on the occasion of the second reading of the Bill. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had put down an Amendment asserting the expediency of having a Judge who was conversant with the practice and doctrines of Equity attached to each of the Divisions. His hon. and learned Friend thought he advised the withdrawal of the Amendment on the ground that it would stereotype the distinction between Law and Equity, said the Government proposed that instead of the provisions in the Bill, there should be left to the Queen not an unlimited selection, but a selection with certain qualifications of persons not from the Common Law Bar, to fill the places of the three Palace Judges in the Court of Appeal, and in making that announcement he had stated that he hoped it would afford considerable satisfaction to him (Mr. Morgan). Well, the announcement did afford him considerable satisfaction, but that satisfaction was short-lived. He understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to mean what he said, and he withdrew his Amendment. In fact, he fell an easy prey to the bland and honeyed words of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Next day the hon. and learned Solicitor General said to him, "Don't be too sure of your three Equity Judges." He was sorry he did not prefer the vinegar of the Solicitor General to the oil of the Attorney General. In what way had the Government fulfilled their pledge? In the first place, these three Equity Judges were reduced to two, then they dwindled down to one, and now this one solitary Equity Judge, who also might be taken away by-and-by, was to be purchased at the expense of a Vice Chancellor. That proceeding had placed him in a very embarrassing position, for he could not help feeling that to a certain extent he had been "jockeyed" by the hon. and learned Gentleman. Moreover, by the Bill, as it now stood, at least six of the Judges of the High Court must either die or resign before the hon. and learned Gentleman could give effect to his other promise that one Equity lawyer should be appointed to each Common Law Division, because no vacancies were to be filled up until the Judges were reduced to 12. He belonged to a profession to which the public proverbially attributed more of the wisdom of the serpent, than the innocence of the dove; but if ever there was a dove who had been outwitted by the wisdom of a serpent he was that unfortunate bird. They were told by the poet that—

"When lovely woman stoops to folly
And finds too late that men betray,"

the only course for her to pursue was to retire from the scene altogether; now, whether he had stooped to folly or not, he certainly had found that men betray, and therefore, the only course that seemed to him now open, was to withdraw his numerous Amendments, and retire as gracefully as he could. Before doing so, however, he wished to record his opinion that he did not think that way of playing fast and loose with one of the staunchest supporters of the Bill was the best way either to facilitate the passing of the measure, or to raise the character of the Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, if his hon. and learned Friend misunderstood the very plain language which he used he could not help him. When his hon. and learned Friend spoke of being "jockeyed" he should have taken more pains to ascertain that there was some foundation for the accusation than he appeared to have done. He had not the slightest desire to withdraw what he had said on the second reading. No one of common understanding or common fairness of mind could draw such an inference as his hon. and learned Friend had done. He said then, and he repeated now, that there was a strong part in the Equity case, and, speaking in the presence of the head of the Government and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he stated that they were prepared to consent to the charge for three new Judges if they should be required. But he took pains at the same time to explain that he gave no pledge that these three men were to come from the Equity Bar. What he said was, that it would be wise to extend the power of selection to persons other than Members of the Common Law Bench. What right then had his hon. and learned Friend to make such an attack on him as he had done, or to talk of "oil" and "vinegar?" What right had he to make an attack of that sort upon an honourable man in the presence of honourable men, and to say that he had been "jockeyed?" What had he said, or what had he done that a man of honour need be ashamed of? The right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) without any communication with him, moved an Amendment which was accepted by the Committee, and the result was that one of the new Judges might possibly be an Irishman, and another a Scotchman. But was it impossible that an Irishman might be a good Equity lawyer? He repudiated with indignation the charge made against him by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and challenged him to show that there was any foundation for that charge.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was under the impression that the Attorney General's conscience was not at ease in the matter. He believed that 99 out of every 100 of the constituents of hon. Members would be astounded at the scope and tenor of the Bill. It seemed to him that they might as well talk about the manner of the discussion as the matter. He did not recollect for 20 years hearing such language as had fallen from speakers in that discussion, but if there was any chance of anything he said in the House ever being reported, he would say that anything was better than passing the Bill, which was really in effect to put the Court of Chancery at the very head and front of our legal system.

DR. BALL objected to the Judge of the Admiralty Court being taken to the Court of Probate and Divorce. If, however it was done, his salary should be raised to £5,000.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was a mistake to suppose that the Judge of the Admiralty Court was not in a position to assist the Judge of Divorce in the Supreme Court. Half of the time of the Admiralty Judge would be unoccupied, and could be devoted in the way proposed. Future Judges of the Admiralty Court would receive £5,000 a-year, and the reason why the present Judge was not included in that arrangement was that he received more from the offices he now held.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that he certainly understood the hon. and learned Attorney General, replying to an Amendment of his own, to state that the three additional Judges should be taken from the Equity branch of the Law, and that the only reason for choosing them from the Common Law Bar was the addition of Ireland and Scotland.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that that was a misapprehension on the part of hon. and learned Gentleman. If the Amendment were adopted the Judges would not be able of themselves to make any increase in their numbers, and an increase in that respect would require the passing of an Act of Parliament.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he did not agree that they were to be precluded from appointing an additional Judge should it be considered necessary in the working of this Bill to do so.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, the Order in Council to increase or decrease the number of Judges might be made on the recommendation of the Judges. Did anyone think that the Judges would recommend a decrease in the number of their Order? He should like to have that matter made clear. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

MR. GREGORY thought it desirable that the Committee should have some further explanation on the subject.

MR. JAMES said, that that was a lamentable instance of the influence of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), supported by the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), over the Attorney General and the Solicitor General. The effect of the Bill would be that three Judges of the Common Law staff would be cut off, and that they would be reduced to 15 Judges. At that moment they were reduced to that number, three of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench being engaged in the Trial at Bar; and the consequence was that the business was falling greatly into arrears. He regarded the course proposed by the Government as a retrograde step. The country did not want to have the number of Judges reduced. That reduction of our judicial strength, moreover, had been effected without the least consideration whether the present number of Judges could do the work or not, but simply with the object of carrying out the economical views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Under the present system there had simply been a block in our procedure, because the Judges were not physically capable of getting through the work which came before them. People talked loudly about the law's delay, but that delay arose from a want of judicial strength, and our arrears were increasing day after day. The evil of the present system in this respect would be increased and rendered permanent by the Amendment, which he hoped, therefore the House would reject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in explanation, said he did not see that the objections of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton were well founded. The only effect of the Amendment would be to prevent the Judges from adding to their own number, without in any way precluding their number being increased by Act of Parliament.

MR. STAVELEY HILL agreed in the view expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Mr. James), and was of opinion that it would be a great injustice to suitors if the number of Judges were reduced to 15.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON supported the proposal of the Government.

MR. GLADSTONE further explained the object of the clause, and defended the proposal of the Attorney General.

MR. WHALLEY concurred with the Attorney General so far as regarded the words proposed to be added to the clause; but the necessity for the Amendment showed that the Bill had been negligently drawn, and he held that any Member who would help by talking to dismiss the Bill altogether would be rendering a service to his country.

MR. LOPES took exception to the proposal, maintaining that the number of 15 Judges was entirely inadequate.

MR. AMPHLETT said, the discussion that had taken place on the question, and which occupied more than an hour, appeared to him to be a senseless one, but one impression was to be gathered from it, and that was that the number of Judges was cut down too much. He shared that feeling, and considered that the Bill was being spoiled by the cutting down of the number of Judges.

MR. MATTHEWS said, in order to reconcile the objections which had been offered to it he would move the insertion in the Attorney General's Amendment of the words "reduced or," so as to make it run thus—

"Provided always, that the total number of the Judges of the Supreme Court shall not be reduced or increased by any such Order" in Council.

The power of the Queen in Council ought to be limited to decreasing as well as increasing the Judges, particularly as there was some doubt about the words.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 30 (Rules of court to provide for distribution of business) amended, and agreed to.

Clause 31 (Assignment of certain business to particular Divisions of High Court subject to rules).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved, as an Amendment, the omission in page 20, line 24, of the words "and the London Court of Bankruptcy respectively." He proposed that the business of the Court should be transferred to the Court of Exchequer, as being upon the whole the most satisfactory arrangement that could be made, and it would only be temporary.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 24, to leave out the words "and the London Court of Bankruptcy respectively."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. JAMES feared that the object of the Amendment was to cast upon the Court of Exchequer the additional duty of undertaking the business of the Court of Bankruptcy. If that was intended to be the effect of the Amendment, he should certainly oppose it on the ground that the Court had not leisure for any additional business with its existing number of Judges.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT was of opinion that Clause 31 was not required at all, as preceding clauses sufficiently provided for the distribution of the business. Moreover, the Judges themselves had ample power to draw up rules as to the distribution of business.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in defending the Amendment, said, its object was to clear the way for another Amendment. He must explain that he proposed the Amendment for the following reasons:—At present, no doubt, from the illness of one Judge and a vacancy, there were considerable, though temporary, arrears of business in the Court of Chancery. The question, therefore, arose where best could the bankruptcy portion of the business of that Court be transferred, pending suitable arrangements being made for the general distribution of the business. With Judges in Chancery who had to conduct the business of their Courts single-handed, it was impossible that the bankruptcy business could have any more fair play than it had had under the Act of 1869. But there were six Judges of the Court of Exchequer, and he would admit that they were not underworked; but they had less to do than the Judges in any of the other Courts in Westminster Hall, and one could, pending final arrangements, be, without inconvenience, intrusted with the disposal of appeals in Bankruptcy. That was an arrangement which, in the opinion of those who framed the Bill, was vital to the success of the measure, and one which he hoped the Committee would not hesitate to adopt. The Amendment, although only of a temporary character, was essential to the proper working of the 33rd clause, and therefore he hoped it would receive the support of the Committee.

MR. AMPHLETT admitted that the Bankruptcy Act had not had fair play, but that was the fault of the Government. He trusted the Court of Bankruptcy would be kept in the Chancery Division. He thought it would be most injudicious to transfer the business of the Bankruptcy Court to the Court of Exchequer, as thereby Vice Chancellor Bacon, who had just got his Court into good order, would be dispossessed of it. He therefore hoped that nothing would be done to interfere with the position of Vice Chancellor Bacon. At the same time, it was absolutely necessary that they should have Judges in Bankruptcy of higher rank and judicial experience than Registrars.

Dr. BALL thought the Bankruptcy business, being of a very peculiar character, ought not to be thrust on the Exchequer Judges, who would be required to go on circuit, whereas the administration of Bankruptcy ought to be intrusted to a Judge who should constantly sit in London. He also objected to transferring Bankruptcy business from one experienced Judge to five, who would have to choose one from among themselves.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN supported the view taken of the question by the hon. and learned Member (Dr. Ball), and hoped to sustain it, if the question went to a division.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, that in order to satisfy the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Treasury wished to avoid the necessity of appointing an additional Vice Chancellor. He strongly objected to the proposed transfer of the Bankruptcy business. The effect of the proposal would be to transfer the business of the Court of Bankruptcy to the Exchequer Court, which was at present the most unpopular Court in the country.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL explained that the arrangements were only temporary, being made for the purpose of bridging over the interval between the present time and the future time, when all the Judges would be competent to deal with all these questions of Law and Equity. Common Law men practised in Bankruptcy as well as Equity men; it was common ground; and he thought a much larger number of Common Law barristers than of Equity barristers went into Bankruptcy. This was so well known that it had been originally suggested that one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer should be Chief Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy. The five Judges of the Court of Exchequer would divide the Bankruptcy business between them. With regard to the objection that had been made, that they would have to go on circuit, he did not apprehend there would ever be fewer than 16 Judges, so that two could remain in town during the Assizes, and they would be fully able to attend to the Bankruptcy business. Further, a re-arrangement of Judicial force would enable the Judges to do more business. It was not necessary to have four Judges sitting in Banco disposing of cases less important than were disposed of by one Vice Chancellor. If business were done by one or two Judges in such Court, the remaining three or four would be available, and thus more work would be done by the same number of Judges than was done at present.

Mr. WEST thought the question was one of such importance that Progress ought to be reported. He would move, therefore, that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. West.)

Mr. GLADSTONE expressed his willingness to accede to the suggestion.

Mr. JAMES said, the result of reporting Progress now would be, that this subject would come up again at the Two o'clock sitting, when many of the legal Members, himself included, could not attend. The question had been fully discussed, and as a division would probably be taken soon after Two o'clock to-morrow, it would be much more convenient for those hon. Members who were engaged in business, if a decision were at once arrived at.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that there was a great deal of force in the appeal just made by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. James). He should therefore propose to postpone the clause, and not renew the discussion upon it to-morrow at Two o'clock.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 138: Majority 7.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House resolve into Committee on this Bill, To-morrow, at Two of the clock."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Mr. COLLINS rose to Order. He wished to know whether a clause could be postponed when the discussion upon it had once begun? He thought the clause having been put should be struck out, and brought up again.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, that an Amendment to the clause having been put from the Chair, the clause must either be negatived, and brought up subsequently, or it must be proceeded with at Two o'clock to-morrow.

MR. DODSON said, that was a question which might be raised when the House was again in Committee on the Bill, but it could not be entertained by the House itself.

MR. JAMES said, that the question in that case would have to be discussed in the absence of himself and many other. After the assurance of the hon. and learned Attorney General, he should, however, leave the matter in his hands.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could only say that he would do his best to keep faith with his hon. and learned Friend.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee to sit again To-morrow at Two of the clock.

CONSPIRACY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Vernon Harcourt, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. James.)

[BILL 190.] SECOND READING.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, in moving, according to Order, that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that it did not deal either with the vexed question of the Master and Servant Act, or the question of contract. The measure dealt simply with the question of conspiracy, and that only in the case of master and servant; and it provided that no prosecution for conspiracy should be instituted unless the offence was indictable by statute or was punishable under the provisions of some statute with reference to violent threats, intimidation, or molestation; that no prosecution should be instituted except with the consent of the Attorney or Solicitor General; and that persons convicted upon such prosecution should not be liable to any greater punishment than that provided by law for such cases as aforesaid. With regard to the magistrates, many of whom were employers of labour, it was particularly necessary in their case, that no prosecution should be instituted without the sanction of the Attorney General and Solicitor General, and with regard to the maximum penalty, he deemed it necessary that a change should be made in that provision of the law. The hon. and learned Member concluded by hoping that the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to bring the law down to the legislation of 1871.

MR. BRUCE said, he did not rise to offer any opposition to the second reading, but he could have wished that his hon. and learned Friend had accepted the challenge thrown down to him from the Treasury bench, and had brought in a Bill dealing with the general law of conspiracy. In assenting to the second reading, the Government must not be understood as entertaining no objection to the Bill. They would, when the proper time arrived, object to making these prosecutions subject to the approval of the Law Officers; but they would not object to fixing more definitely than had hitherto been the case the punishment applicable to offences of this nature.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 157.]

(Mr. P. J. Smyth, Mr. M'Mahon, Mr. Ronayne, Sir John Gray, Mr. Downing, Mr. Butt.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [17th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the same liberty of holding public meetings existed in Ireland as in England, but under an Act which the Bill proposed to repeal, meetings were not permitted of persons who professed to represent their fellow-subjects. It was probable that a Home Rule convention, or something of the kind—would if this Bill was allowed to pass—be convened in Dublin, and the question was whether it was desirable that a body of this nature should be allowed to assemble in Dublin, and represent themselves to the people as a sort of Irish Parliament. There were some objects of the Home Rule Convention with which he sympathized, and he hoped that they might be able to delegate to some local body both in Ireland and Scotland, matters of a peculiarly local character; but he thought that such an object would be more likely to be promoted by rejecting the present

Bill. It would be much better that the Imperial Parliament should declare consistently that there were certain objects which Home Rulers could never obtain, instead of encouraging false hopes. He trusted that the House would reject the second reading.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was gratified to hear the declaration just made by the noble Marquess, and the more so, because the House had seen an hon. Gentleman professing Home Rule principles led up to the Table in the early part of the evening by the noble Marquess. [Mr. BRUCE said a few words which were not heard.] He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman repudiate the election utterances of the hon. Gentleman who had taken his seat that evening.

MR. BUTT said, that the Bill had been introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Smyth), but as he was not in his place, he did not like to see the Order become a dropped Order. He entertained no doubt that he should one day see the noble Marquess, or some one in his position, bring in a Bill conceding everything that the Home Rulers asked. He had himself heard speeches at meetings in England which if made in Ireland would have made the assembly amenable to the law.

Question put, and negatived.

SEDUCTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Eykyn, Mr. Mundella,
Mr. Whitwell.)

[BILL 10.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1, agreed to.

On the Motion of MR. CHARLEY, Clauses 2, 3, and 4 struck out of the Bill; and new clauses (Repeal of sections 50 and 51 of 24 and 25 Vic. c. 100), and (abusing a girl under twelve years of age) inserted in place thereof.

MR. BRUCE said, that the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had struck out the whole of his Bill, and had replaced it by two clauses; and as he approved of the object which those clauses effected, he should no longer oppose the measure.

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. WHARTON moved a new clause providing; at the discretion of the court, that whipping may be added to other punishment, if the girl is under 12 years old. Where a man was a brute he should be treated as one.

New Clause (Whipping may be added to other punishment if the girl is under twelve years old.)—(Mr. Wharton.)—brought up, and read the first time.

MR. BRUCE said, he felt bound to resist the proposal, on the ground that it affirmed a vindictive principle which it was not desirable to carry further than was necessary.

MR. WHARTON said, he intended this clause to act as a deterrent merely. He was induced to move it, from observing what a beneficial effect a like punishment had upon a somewhat kindred crime—namely, that of garrotting.

MR. BRUCE said, he must point out that garrotting had in a great measure ceased before the Act inflicting whipping as a punishment for it was passed. Moreover, he considered that as they had already passed a clause inflicting penal servitude for at least five years, they ought not to add corporal punishment, the deterrent effect of which, to say the least, he considered of doubtful effect.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in supporting the clause, said, he agreed with his hon. Friend who moved it, that whipping should be inflicted in cases of this sort. He would make the brutes who committed such crimes wince and howl.

Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 25: Majority 14.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 223.]

MEDICAL ACT AMENDMENT (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bill to amend the Medical Act as regards the University of London, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Sir PHILIP EGERTON, and Mr. ROBERT FOWLER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 224.]

ULSTER TENANT RIGHT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BUTT, Bill to make provision for more effectually securing the Ulster Tenant Right, and to amend "The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870," ordered to be brought in by Mr. BUTT, Mr. CALLAN, and Mr. P. J. SMYTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 225.]

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT (APPLICATION FOR SCHOOL BOARD) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HEYGATE, Bill to amend "The Elementary Education Act, 1870," in respect of the period which must elapse between the rejection and renewal of a Resolution for application for a School Board," ordered to be brought in by Mr. HEYGATE, Mr. AKROYD, and Mr. FRANCIS S. POWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 228.]

RAILWAYS AMALGAMATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. STAPLETON, Bill to provide for the Amalgamation of Railways, and to enable local authorities to influence the administration of the Amalgamated Railways, ordered to be brought in by Mr. STAPLETON and Mr. DICKINSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 227.]

PRISONERS ON REMAND BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HENRY B. SHERIDAN, Bill to regulate the treatment of persons in custody charged with crime or misdemeanor, whether on remand or committed for trial, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HENRY B. SHERIDAN, Mr. LOCKE, and Mr. M'LAGAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 226.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

Scotland, Church of—Patronage

Moved to resolve, that whereas the presentation of ministers to churches in Scotland by patrons under the existing law and practice has been the cause of much division among the people and in the Church of Scotland, it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should take the whole subject into consideration with the view of legislating as to the appointment and settlement of ministers in the Church of Scotland (The Earl of Airlie) June 17, 1032; after long debate, Motion withdrawn

Moved, "That, whereas the presentation of Ministers to Churches in Scotland by patrons under the existing law and practice has been the cause of much division among the people and in the Church of Scotland, it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should take the whole subject into consideration, with a view of legislating as to the appointment and settlement of Ministers in the Church of Scotland" (Sir Robert Anstruther) June 17, 1090; after short debate, Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put" (Mr. Craufurd); after further debate, Previous Question and Motion withdrawn

Scotland—Church Rates

Question, Mr. M'Laren; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 19, 102

Moved, "That the levying of local rates and assessments on lands and houses for the erection and repair of Churches and Mansees in Scotland, for the supposed benefit of a minority of the population, is unjust in principle, and the cause of great dissatisfaction amongst the people; and looking to the hopes held out by the Government on the subject, this House is of opinion that a Bill should be introduced by the Government during the present Session of Parliament, to remove the existing grievance" (Mr. M'Laren) June 27, 1522 [House counted out]
